SAINT ALPHONSUS DE LIGUORI

INDEX

He was born in Marinella, in the suburbs of Naples, on the 27th of September, 1696, the feast of Saints Cosmas and Damian, and baptized two days after, on the feast of St. Michael the Archangel. Amongst the names given him, Alphonsus, Maria, were the leading ones, and by these, to the exclusion of the others, he is usually known. His father Joseph, of the noble house of Liguori, was alike distinguished for talent (especially military) and for virtue: and his mother Catherine (also of a noble house) was sister to the celebrated servant of God, Emilio Jacomo Cavalieri, Bishop of Troy in partibus, who died in the odor of sanctity. Indeed she was worthy such a brother, being scarcely, if at all, inferior to him in sanctity of life.

Alphonsus, in early youth, nay, we might almost say, in infancy, even then, edified all with whom he conversed; and those who have written his life in detail, mention numerous instances of virtue, which we cannot afford to specify. He had a remarkable disinclination for the amusements of children, and never took part in them, unless when charity, or the fear of singularity, ruled it otherwise. He evinced the most tender devotion to mysteries, which most children of his age can scarce be brought to understand, and even amongst the youths with whom he was obliged to associate in the college of nobles, under the conduct of the priests of the oratory, his conduct never varied; his devotion to the sacrament of the altar, and the Mother of God, continually gaining strength. His progress in human learning kept pace so well with his progress in the science of the saints, that when he had completed his legal studies, he required a dispensation of three years for admission to the degree of doctor in canon and civil law.

He practised for some time at the bar, and was fast growing into repute, when an incident occurred, to which, in the dispensations of Providence, we are indebted for the apostolic labors and learned writings of our Saint. Alphonsus having been retained as counsel for the defence, in a case of great interest and importance, his pleading was so ingenious and so eloquent, that the president, Signor Caravita, felt disposed to give judgment in favor of his client, when the counsel on the other side, instead of replying, simply begged of Alphonsus to reconsider his argument, and see whether it was not unsound. Alphonsus, to his great confusion and surprise, perceived it to be flawed by reason of his having overlooked one negative particle in the process. The court and audience complimented him upon his able defence, and acquitted him of any blame upon the score of negligence; attributing his oversight to the warmth so natural to a young lawyer in his situation. Alphonsus, however, did not so readily acquit himself; but, having bowed to the court, was heard to say, as he withdrew, "false world, I know you, and have done with you;"—he had given up the bar.

Almighty God was pleased to enlighten his mind, during a retreat of three days, which he made under the direction of his confessor; at the end of which period he was confirmed in his resolution, to attend solely to the care of his salvation. Alphonsus having now nothing to divide his attention with the pursuit of virtue and sacred science, devoted himself unreservedly to the attainment of both,—and applied his powerful intellect so vigorously to the study of theology, as rapidly to fit himself for the office of a teacher in Israel. The rapid and steady progress of Alphonsus in piety and learning induced Cardinal Pignatelli, the then Archbishop of Naples, to hasten his promotion to tonsure and minor orders; unwilling that the church should longer remain without numbering such a youth as he amongst her ministers. Immediately that Alphonsus was advanced to minor orders, he entered upon the discharge of his functions, and kept it with faith and assiduity. Anxious, not only to preserve that purity of life to which he was exhorted by the ordaining bishop, but, moreover, continually to amass new treasures of grace, he regularly attended the religious exercises of the fathers of the mission; a practice which he persevered in up to the time of his ordination to the priesthood. No sooner had Alphonsus received deaconship, than the Cardinal Archbishop, not content with permitting, exhorted him to preach; and the obedient levite, in compliance with the desire of his pastor, preached his first sermon in the parish church of St. John, in Porta, upon the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar.

On the 27th of December, 1726, Alphonsus, being in the thirty-first year of his age, was ordained priest. We shall not dilate upon the raptures of Alphonsus, when he found himself on the summit of the holy mountain. We pass over the sentiments of faith, love, and gratitude, with which he immolated, for the first time, the sacred victim of the altar. We speak not of the redoubled fervor with which he applied himself to all his usual practices of piety, and more especially to the loving adoration of the Blessed Sacrament; we press onward to his apostolical labors, and taking a hasty survey of all he did, and taught, and weighing his title to greatness in the balance of the sanctuary, over which is inscribed, "qui fecerit et docuerit sic homines, hic magnus vocabitur in regno cœlorum," we shall see whether his title be such, that in the kingdom of Heaven he is called great.

As a matter of course, the pulpit labors of Alphonsus increased on his advancement to the priesthood; and to these were added the toilsome and revolting duties of the confessional. So great, in fact, was the esteem in which Alphonsus was held by his Archbishop, that he had no sooner been ordained priest, than he was appointed to conduct the retreat of the clergy, although there were amongst them many apostolic and eloquent men of older standing than he. He was peculiarly fitted for the confessional, not by the qualities which he possessed (all of which are indispensable to every good confessor), but by the degree in which he possessed them. His tenderness in receiving, his patience in hearing, his sweetness in admonition, were such as few or none have ever met with. The unction with which he represented to the sinner his ingratitude, and the moving words by which he sought to excite him to repentance, were irresistible.

Inspired by his zeal for the salvation of souls, he bethought him of a means whereby to confirm his penitents in their holy resolutions, and instruct them more at large in the science of perfection. On festival days assembling them around him, in some remote and silent quarter of the city, he there addressed them on spiritual subjects. There, encircled by persons of the meanest condition, he was all the better pleased on that account, as they afforded him an opportunity of enlightening them upon many portions of the Christian doctrine, of which they had, till then, been ignorant. After a time several priests, and some laymen of a spiritual life, joined him in his conferences, when the assembly having been represented to the governor as of a suspicious character, was dissolved, though not without the innocence of its object having been recognised. The priests, upon this, retired to a house in the city, and spent their time in exercises of penance and devotion, and those of no ordinary character, but, to Alphonsus, scarce any extremity of vigor, scarce any pitch of fervor was unknown. Alphonsus took care that the dispersion of his hearers should not be prejudicial to the poor people who shared most of his attention, for he caused the more enlightened and zealous of his penitents to assemble their less favored brethren, and speak to them on spiritual subjects, with the consent of the Archbishop, in private houses, and hired rooms, and at length, even in public oratories and chapels.

Father Matteo Ripa, a truly apostolic priest, having returned from China, with some youths of that nation, destined for the sacred ministry, succeeded in 1729 in establishing a college for the Chinese mission. To this college Alphonsus withdrew, as well to escape the distractions of his father's house, as to perfect himself in the ministry of the divine word, under such a master as Matteo Ripa. Alphonsus lived in the college on no other footing than that of a guest, although for a time he had some thoughts of China, which he relinquished in obedience to his confessor, Father Pagano. Our Saint meanwhile continued to preach in all the churches of Naples to immense congregations, and with abundant fruit. At stated periods of the year, he conducted missions in various quarters of the kingdom, and while laboring for the sanctification of others, took such measures for his own, as are taken only by saints such as he.

He addressed himself to God in prayer, and took counsel of several learned and pious men, all of whom assured him that it was the will of God he should become the founder of a new congregation of missionary priests for the spiritual aid of those souls who are most destitute. The Bishop of Scala engaged him to establish the first house of the future Order in his diocess. He set off for Scala, and on the ninth of November, 1732, after having celebrated a Mass of the Holy Ghost, and sung the "Te Deum," in thanksgiving for all the protection vouchsafed him in this matter, he laid the foundation of his new society. His first companions numbered twelve, consisting of ten priests, and two candidates for orders, together with a serving lay-brother, Vito Curzio by name, a rich gentleman of Acquaviva di Bari, who, admonished by a vision at Naples, had chosen that humble post amongst the brethren of the new congregation.

The life which Alphonsus and his companions led in Scala, resembled nothing so exactly as the life of those penitents whom St. John Chrysostom speaks of in his "Mystic Ladder." Their lodging was small and incommodious; their beds a little straw shaken on the floor; their bread black, hard, and coarse; their other food disgusting from its insipidity, and taken kneeling, their religious exercises incessant. From time to time they dispersed themselves over the country to conduct the missions, and gathered in such harvests of souls (Alphonsus always foremost in labor and success), as caused the bishop to thank God with all the fervor of his heart, for having provided his diocess with these apostles, and above all, with Alphonsus, who was the great instrument in the hands of the Almighty, and next to God best entitled to its gratitude.

Whilst Alphonsus and his brethren, laboring thus for their neighbors' salvation, and their own, seemed like the primitive Christians to have one only heart, and one only soul, the enemy contrived to sow his tares amongst them, and scatter the infant congregation. Our Saint thinking it high time to have a code of rules framed for the government of his congregation, wished to collect the views of his brethren upon the subject. Some would fain combine the care of poor schools with their missionary labors; some were advocates for more absolute, and some for mitigated poverty; some insisted upon increased austerity, and some advised relaxation; nearly all condemned the plan of Alphonsus. The saint at other times so deferential to his brethren, defended his plan, and adhered to it in every particular, notwithstanding the opposition of his companions, who at length deserted him, with the exception of Cæsar Sportelli, as yet a secular, and the lay-brother Vito Curzio.

As soon as it reached Naples that Alphonsus was abandoned by his brethren, those who had originally been hostile to his design, renewed their condemnation of it in no very temperate strain. They taxed the saint with presumption, and held him up to ridicule, not allowing even the Archbishop to escape uncensured for the favor which he showed Alphonsus; but the venerable Archbishop, uninfluenced by these malicious speeches in his opinior of Alphonsus or his design, sent for the holy man, and encouraged him to prosecute his good work, an encouragement which, though well meant, was little needed, as Alphonsus, nothing daunted, went the mission by himself in the confidence that God in his own time would provide him with fellow-laborers. The man of God was not disappointed in his expectations; after a while he was joined by father John Mazzini, and as others began to flow in apace, Alphonsus submitted to the holy see the rules he had drawn up for the government of the congregation, and which met with the entire approval of the Pope.

The congregation being now distributed into different houses, the brethren set about the election of a superior-general, and were unanimous in their choice of Alphonsus, whom they appointed general for life. We shall not go into many details upon the government of the holy superior-general; suffice it to say, that he united the greatest humility with the highest dignity—the greatest meekness with the most unlimited command—and all the virtues of the subject with all the qualities of the superior. He made a yearly visitation of all the houses of his order; and as soon as he had completed the visitation, addressed to each house a circular replete with tender piety and spiritual learning, breathing the most ardent charity towards God and his neighbor, and expressive of the tenderest love for the congregation. He was wont to embody in short and pithy sentences, the whole duty of a missionary of the congregation, or place the observance of the rule in a new and striking light.

In training the students for their missionary labors, every other study was of course subordinate to the great object of the congregation—the ministry of the divine word; and it was the anxious care of Alphonsus to impress them with correct notions upon this all-important matter. He instructed them to avoid defacing the simplicity of the gospel with the frippery of rhetoric, or even the genuine beauties of purely human eloquence. He took especial care that they should fit themselves for the confessional by the study of moral theology; which, he said, should finish only with the life of the student, and without the knowledge of which, a confessor, he said, would damn himself, and bring ruin on his penitents. He instructed them, moreover, in the proper treatment of different classes of penitents, impressing upon them the necessity of sweetness and charity, the danger of severity and harshness, and the importance of using to advantage their discretion in giving or withholding absolution in those cases where the church has left either course open to them.

The sanctity of Alphonsus, and the wonders by which his preaching was attended, began to attract the notice of the entire kingdom, and, amongst others, of Cardinal Spinelli, who immediately fixed his eye upon him for promotion to the episcopacy. Shortly after, the Archbishopric of Palermo becoming vacant, the king determined upon appointing Alphonsus to that dignity, saying, "If the Pope appoint good bishops, I shall appoint still better." Alphonsus, who, upon the mere suspicion of Cardinal Spinelli's designs, had left his unfinished mission in Naples, was dreadfully alarmed when he heard of the king's intention, and bestirred himself so vigorously to counteract it, that he did at length succeed, and was consoled by witnessing the appointment of another. But his joy was of short duration, and his escape from the burthen of the episcopacy proved to be nothing more than a reprieve; for the see of Sant' Agata de' Goti becoming vacant, he was nominated by the Pope himself to the care of that church. Alphonsus having recovered from the desolation into which he was thrown by the announcement of this intelligence, addressed a letter to the Pope, setting forth his unfitness for that high office, as well by reason of his infirm health, and advanced age, as of his spiritual unworthiness. The Holy Father upon receiving the letter of Alphonsus was deeply moved by the pathetic remonstrances of the saint; and, on the evening of the 14th of March, communicated to his Pro-auditor, Cardinal Negroni, his intention of allowing Alphonsus to decline the dignity; but, on the following morning, informed Cardinal Negroni, that God had inspired him during the night to have Alphonsus consecrated. The Pro-auditor then, by command of the Pope, wrote to Alphonsus, acquainting him with the determination of His Holiness, and put him upon his obedience.

The companions of our Saint, in sore affliction at their approaching bereavement, and unwilling to lose his sweet and fatherly government, having assembled in chapter, confirmed him in the perpetual superior-generalship, empowering him at the same time to govern through one of his vicars, when he should find it necessary: and this decree, in order to its greater stability, they submitted to the sacred congregation of bishops and superiors of orders, by whom it was confirmed on the 25th of May, 1762.

Alphonsus having accepted the episcopal office, through pure obedience, set out for Rome accompanied by Father Andrea Villani, a man of approved virtue.

During his residence in Rome, notwithstanding his retired habits, and the scantiness of his retinue (a single servant), he was paid the most distinguished respect by generals of religious orders, bishops, princes, and cardinals. Almost every moment of his sojourn in the Eternal City he spent in austere watchings, disciplines to blood, constant adoration of the most holy Sacrament, and the exercise of acts of mercy. Having been at length formally declared bishop of Sant' Agata de' Goti, by the Sovereign Pontiff, in the secret consistory held on the 14th of June, 1762, Alphonsus was consecrated on the 20th of the same month, the third Sunday after Pentecost, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, in the Church of St. Mary Sopra Minerva, by Cardinal de Rossi, assisted by Monsignor Gorgoni, Archbishop of Emessa, and Monsignor Giordani, Archbishop of Nicomedia, governor of Rome. As soon as he had been consecrated, Alphonsus took leave of the Sovereign Pontiff, unwilling that he should be absent from his church a moment longer than was necessary.

Upon his return to Naples, many persons of the highest distinction, as well as many of his former colleagues, endeavored to detain him there, and dissuade him from his precipitate journey to Sant' Agata. which seemed to portend so constant a residence in that unwholesome town as would prove ruinous to his health. Their remonstrances, however, were ineffectual, and he set out on the 11th of July, accompanied by his brother Hercules, and Father Francis Margotto. His journey through the country was like the triumphal procession of a conqueror. He was met at every stage by reverential multitudes, and welcomed into Sant' Agata by the citizens, and the chapter of the process. Having proceeded to the Church, he spent some time in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, and then addressing the people in a moving strain gave them his benediction and the indulgence usual upon such occasions The very next morning he began the mission to the people, which he continued during eight days, giving each morning spiritual exercises to the clergy, secular and regular, as well as to the gentry; so that shortly after his arrival, the entire aspect of the city and diocess had undergone a most surprising and consoling change.

Alphonsus, in the government of his diocess, simply carried out the principles which he had laid down in a book, entitled "Reflections useful to bishops in the government of their Churches," and published before his elevation to the episcopacy. Though removed in body from his congregation, it ceased not to be directed by his spirit, as he was in constant communication with Father Villani, his Vicar-general, and the superiors of houses, continually exhorting and instructing them by letters full of unction and wisdom alike divine. His elevation to the episcopal dignity no wise prejudiced that eminent spirit of poverty by which he had been distinguished while residing with the congregation. His dress (invariably the habit of the congregation) was of the coarsest texture. He left the best apartments to his household clergy, occupying himself a couple of the most unpretending, and furnished in the meanest style, possessing, in fact, only some straw chairs, a table with an inkstand and a few books, a small wooden bedstead with a straw bed, and coarse sheets, some pictures of saints and one of our blessed Lady of good counsel, together with a little altar for the celebration of Mass, when his health should not permit him to go to the Cathedral. His table was originally very simple, and every day experienced new retrenchments, until it reached the standard of insipidity, which Alphonsus had laid out for it. His household resembled nothing so closely as a religious community, so regular were the hours of prayer, and silence, and meals, and religious converse.

If Alphonsus, by reason of his pastoral cares, was unable to pray as much as he could have desired during the day time, he abridged to a mere nothing the hours of repose, spending the greater part of the night in meditation, or those appalling acts of penance which we have mentioned. The little time which he contrived to steal from his pastoral cares, or his devotions, he spent not in recreation, but in writing, or dictating letters, or composing works for the good of souls, or reading spiritual or theological books. An application unintermitting as was his, could not, unless by miracle, fail to prejudice his health, and in addition to his other infirmities, he began to be afflicted with grievous headaches. But it mattered not, for even when obliged to go out in his carriage, he had his secretary to read a book to him, so that he contrived not to allow a single moment to pass unoccupied. And, lest by possibility a single imperfection should escape his notice, he appointed a discreet and pious priest to make him acquainted with anything he should observe in him, which might require correction.

Alphonsus having fallen sick in Arienzo during one of his yearly visitations, had no sooner recovered his health sufficiently to travel, than he began to think of returning to Sant' Agata, and the representations of his vicar-general regarding the unsafe condition of a portion of the palace, would have been ineffectual had not the doctors insisted upon his remaining where he was; the damp and insalubrious air of Sant' Agata being peculiarly hurtful to one afflicted as he was with asthma. But neither his infirmities, nor his withdrawal from the usual seat of episcopal government, caused him to suspend for a day the instructions, private as well as public, which he was in the habit of giving his flock. He preached as usual on Sundays and holidays; and on Saturdays, in honor of the blessed Virgin; he continued to give missions, conduct retreats, and attend at conferences; in a word, he never permitted his health to interfere with the discharge of any of those duties which even holy bishops deem themselves justified in devolving upon others. He catechised in person the infants of both sexes, holding out, and awarding with his own hand, little prizes for their encouragement. He gave audience to persons of either sex, or any degree, who wished to consult him upon their wants and occasions, spiritual or temporal, but summarily dispatched all visits of mere compliment; and once a year made a visitation of half the diocess, so that he saw every portion of it once in two years. In travelling he rode upon an ass, or hired mule (his equipage he had early disposed of), and made use of no other conveyance, no matter how great his infirmities, or what the badness of the road. During the course of the visitation, he everywhere addressed the people, confirmed the children, and inspected the churches, even in the poorest and remotest districts; his household, his table, and his devotions, wherever he resided, being the same as in Sant' Agata. To the sick of his entire diocess he was attentive, and not satisfied with relieving their wants when they thrust themselves upon him, took measure to discover such wants as might not have attracted his notice. In the administration of justice in his episcopal court, he was so assiduous and vigilant, and weighed so well both sides of the question, that there never was an appear from his decision to that of the Archiepiscopal Court of Benevento: and with regard to ecclesiastical privileges and immunities, though not so tried, he was full as unflinching an asserter of the church's rights, as was St. Thomas of Canterbury.

There were many things in the clergy requiring reformation, when our saint came to the government of the diocess; and he effected a total change, at once so rapidly and noiselessly, that the people perceived it to be finished almost before they had perceived it to be in progress. To the canonries and other benefices in his gift, he collated none whose moral and intellectual fitness he had not ascertained; the moral, by personal experience, or strict investigation, and the intellectual, by what is technically termed, a "concursus," or an examination, properly speaking, of two or more candidates, but sometimes of one only. Nor was this strictness confined to his choice of dignitaries only, he was equally exact in the appointment of every priest who was to have the cure of souls, and sit in the tribunal of penance. The rules which he drew up for the conduct of his seminary were equally admirable with every other portion of his government; providing not only for the maintenance of discipline and piety within doors, but for the practice of piety by the students in their own homes during the vacation, at the close of which, if they meant to be readmitted, they should bring with them a certificate of their religious conduct, signed on oath by the parish priest.

The regular clergy and conventuals of his diocess, men and women, claimed his most paternal attention. He did his utmost, and with the most perfect success, to improve the character of those peculiarly catholic institutions, especially such as were under the invocation of the Mother of God. His beautiful work entitled the "True Spouse of Jesus Christ, or the Nun Sanctified," will be read with peculiar spiritual advantage by nuns, and with vast profit by any religious whosoever.

If Alphonsus was attentive to the sanctification of the clergy and sacred virgins of his diocess. Oh! how zealously and unremittingly did he not labor for the simple faithful? Not satisfied with his continual preaching by word and example, or his yearly visitations, or the missions he gave in person, or those which he procured by inviting missionaries from other diocesses, or providing the people with virtuous and learned clergy; not satisfied with all this, he tracked vice and scandals to their strongholds.

He exerted himself with the most astonishing activity to put down the absurd and atrocious practice of duelling, often personally interfering to present hostile meetings; and at length memorialing the king to put in force chose laws which had been directed against duelling in the kingdom of Naples. But there was no vice or scandal which he pursued and extirpated with so much zeal as that of immorality, in the more received and restricted sense. It would be impossible to enumerate all the licentious men and abandoned women whom he reclaimed, in very many cases by personal exertion, and often by judicious advice to the civil authorities, who always received it with respect by reason of the esteem in which they held the Saint. Knowing well however that poverty is often the most fatal incentive to vice, he procured honest employment for such young women as he had fears of, and respectable matches for others, giving them portions out of his own revenue. Some whom he reclaimed he sent to asylums of penance; and against those whom he could not reclaim, he called in the arm of the law.

Carefully as Alphonsus provided for the spiritual wants of his flock, he was not less assiduous in ministering to their temporal necessities. He knew well that the man who has not bowels of compassion for his neighbor, cannot love God, and that the funds of the church are the patrimony of the poor. We have already seen how rigid was the economy of Alphonsus in his household concerns, and that this was produced partly by charity; but to whatever it was owing, the poor had all the benefit of it. So chary was he of the patrimony of the poor, as he called the revenues of his church, that he would not entertain his brother Hercules and his two children for more than three days, saying, that to entertain them longer than that would be to defraud the poor. His brother imagining that the revenues of the diocess were more than sufficient for the maintenance of Alphonsus, as a bishop, thought he would relinquish to him the pension which he enjoyed from the estate; but this Alphonsus declined, saying, that the proceeds of his diocess belonged to the poor, and that he required the income for his own support.

He had an alms for every one who asked it, and summoned his vicar-general and others to the aid of his own zeal in discovering such as shame (so ill-consorted with penury) prevented from putting in their petitions with the others. Superannuated priests, old people of every description, widows with families, and more especially young maidens whose poverty might be the occasion of their fall, were the objects of his tenderest care. We have already mentioned his care of the sick; and it was at least equalled by his care of those in prison, both as concerned their spiritual and temporal wants. But all his other acts of love were outdone by one act of stupendous charity, in the year 1765, during which Italy was afflicted in a great and prevailing famine. As if in preparation for the disastrous season, Alphonsus, contrary to custom, had laid up a large store of corn, and as soon as the scarcity began to be felt, distributed it to the poor. After having expended his entire store, he wrote to every one of wealth and distinction, and more especially to his brother Hercules, to contribute to the relief of the starving population. He afterwards gave orders for the secret sale of the carriage and mules which his brother had presented to him, as well as of his pectoral cross, and the ring given him by Monsignor Ganini, substituting for them gilded things of trifling value. But, notwithstanding all his efforts, thousands remained unsupplied, and in the madness of their hunger, attacked the corporate officers; for whose safety Alphonsus has been known to expose his own life to the fury of the mob.

Alphonsus had accepted the bishopric through pure obedience, and ever held it with fear and trembling; but after a time his advanced years and complicated infirmities raised grievous scruples in his mind upon the score of incapacity, inducing him to think of resigning his office into the hands of the Pope, and retiring with his permission to one of the houses of the congregation. Lest, however, as he said, "The cell to which he should retire, might be to him a hell in consequence of his having withdrawn from an office in which God wished him to remain," he took counsel of learned and pious men, and finding them favorable to his resignation, applied to Clement XIII., who had appointed him, for his removal, and received for answer, that his name alone was sufficient for the well-ordering the diocess. He received tills answer with perfect submission to the will of God, as intimated to him by His Holiness; but after a time, his increasing infirmities awakening new scruples in his breast, and supplying him with new reasons for requesting the acceptance of his resignation, he applied to Clement XIV. and received for answer, that one prayer from his bed of pain would be more worth than a thousand visitations and disciplines to blood; for the Saint had put forward his inability to make the visitation of his diocess as a ground for his removal.

Alphonsus again bowed in submission to the will of God, and it was to no purpose that his own scruples, or the representations of bishops his advisers, and others, solicited him to renew his application to that Pope. "If I apply," he said, "my application will not be granted; we shall see what his successor will do for me," an answer which almost tempted those who heard him to smile, Alphonsus being brought to the grave's edge by infirmity and years, while the Pope was yet hale and vigorous. For five weary years after this did Alphonsus continue to govern his diocess, and break to his flock the bread of the divine word. Ascending the pulpit, his feeble step propped upon several supporters, his worn frame and drooping head moved every one to tears, but no sooner had he begun to speak, than he was renewed in youth and vigor; his nerves and sinews relaxed from their habitual rigidity, and he preached with all his natural vehemence and fervor. Upon leaving the pulpit, he relapsed into his former state. By order of the physicians, he was now obliged to procure a carriage and take an airing every day, together with eating meat in lent, and sundry other indulgences which mortified Alphonsus infinitely more than could have done the most grievous austerity.

For thirteen years had Alphonsus borne the burthen of the episcopacy, when, on the 21st of September, 1774, being seated in his arm-chair, he fell into a tranquil slumber, which lasted not only that night, but during a portion of the next day, the servant having orders from the vicar-general not to disturb him. On the 22d, about one o'clock in the afternoon, he awoke, and pulled the bell. Seeing the attendants in tears, he inquired of them, what was the matter? and, on being told that he had not eaten or spoken for two days, "True," he replied, "I have been to attend the Pope, who has just expired," and, as shortly afterwards came to be known, the Pope had actually just expired at that very moment.

Upon the earliest opportunity Alphonsus made application to Pius VI. for permission to retire from his office, and that Pontiff, although at first disposed to act as his predecessor had done, knowing that the bare presence of Alphonsus was enough to sanctify the diocess, was at length induced by the representations of many distinguished persons to accede, though (as he said with great sorrow, to the request of Alphonsus, and accept his resignation.

Immediately that Alphonsus had received the welcome intelligence, "blessed be God," he exclaimed, "who has removed a mountain from my breast;" and, in a few days after, having arranged all matters for his departure, left the diocess amid the lamentations of the entire flock, and directed his course towards San Michele de' Pagni, where there was a house of his order. Having reached his destination, he humbly besought the fathers to receive him once more amongst them. As he ascended the stairs, leading to the choir, he repeated the "Gloria Patri," and exclaimed, "how light is not now this cross upon my breast, which was so heavy when I first mounted the steps of the palace of Sant' Agata!" Here he lived completely after the manner of the other fathers of the congregation, attending all the exercises where and when it was done by the rest of the community, and enjoying every distinction and indulgence, the carriage drives, the two apartments, the silver service, and the invalid fare by mere compulsion, and solely through obedience. For the rest, the Pope had given him permission to retain the portable altar in his chamber for his own use, and that of others, and had assigned him a pension of eight hundred ducats upon the diocess of Sant' Agata, which occasioned him so many scruples, that he wrote concerning it to the Grand Penitentiary, who left the affair in the hands of the Saint's confessor, and thus set him at ease. of this pension, however, the Saint appropriated barely what was necessary and distributed the rest amongst public mendicants, or private pensioners of his. For many years he continued to preach in several of the neighboring churches, and especially in the parish church of St. Michael, where his congregation was engaged in giving the mission. Upon one occasion during a season of terrible drought, wretchedly infirm as he was, he dragged himself along an entire street in a procession, with a halter about his neck, a crown of thorns upon his head, and his garments covered with ashes. He foretold to the people the happy result of the procession; and, it is useless to say, that the prediction was soon verified. During all this time he ceased not to compose works for the sanctification of souls.—Amongst other works composed and published by him after his return to San Michele de' Pagni, he gave to the world the book entitled, "Admirable Dispositions of Divine Providence, for the Salvation of the World, through means of Jesus Christ;" and dedicated it to Pius VI., who was pleased to acknowledge it as an especial favor, and compliment the blessed author in the loftiest, and, at the same time, most affectionate strain. But the health of Alphonsus, which had been all along declining, began rapidly to grow worse. From the 29th of November, 1779, he was unable to say Mass, and continued thenceforward to communicate in one kind; his manner of life being, in other respects, as before described. Indeed, we should rather say, that in proportion to the increase of his decrepitude and weakness, his abstemiousness and general spirit of mortification increased, and he certainly would have persevered in the use of that dreadful implement of penance, the discipline, to his last breath, had he not been forbidden by his confessor, and when obliged to part with it and its fellows, he ordered his lay-brother in attendance to throw into some sewer the box in which he used to keep them.

On the 18th of July, 1787, in addition to his old complaints, he was attacked by a sharp fever, together with a terrible dysentery and retention of urine. These were symptoms so little to be mistaken, that, although he had been absolved three days before by Father Vincenzo Magaldi of the congregation, he confessed again to Father Lorenzo Negri of the congregation also, and after having received absolution, was released from all his usual anxiety, and broke forth into expressions of the liveliest joy and hope, the Lord being doubtless willing to console his servant by a foretaste of Paradise, for all that he had made him suffer during this life, and especially for the grievous temptations against faith, by which he had been assailed some time after his retirement from his diocess. His sufferings lasted for fourteen days, during which he was constantly engaged in acts of piety, keeping his eyes lovingly fixed upon the crucifix and image of the blessed Mother; confessing frequently, and communicating every day.

The news of his mortal illness having been spread abroad, priests, secular as well as regular, and persons of the highest distinction, came from all parts to kiss his hand, bringing kerchiefs, and other things, to sanctify by contact with him, and preserve as relics. At length it become necessary for him to receive the sacrament of Extreme Unction, which he did with the most fervent acts of faith, hope, charity, resignation, and joy. On the 25th of the same month, he received the Blessed Sacrament as a viaticum; and when the time for communicating approached, every moment appeared intolerably long, and unable to contain himself, he incessantly exclaimed, give me the body of my Jesus—when will Jesus come to me?—when shall I possess him? His longings having been at length satisfied, he sunk into a long and deep meditation upon the love of Jesus in the most Holy Sacrament.

Four days before his death he was seized with convulsions so violent as to deprive him of the use of speech. On the thirtieth day of the month, Father Villani not thinking it safe to give him the Viaticum, as he was afraid he should not be able to swallow, one of the fathers desi red him to make a spiritual communion, which he did, showing by his eyes and various signs, that he joined in the devout sentiments suggested by that father. On the day before his death, Monsignor Tafuri came to visit him, and seeing him so near his dissolution, reverently kissed his hand, and placed it on his head. On the day of his death, just before the commencement of his agony, upon hearing the names of Jesus and Mary, he opened his eyes and appeared somewhat to revive. What is even more surprising, on the night before his death, the image of the blessed Mother having been brought near his bed, he not only opened his eyes, but fixing them upon it, smiled sweetly, his countenance all radiant with delight. Whence we may all conclude, that the divine Mother blessed her holy client with one of those visits which it was his daily prayer to have at the hour of death, and which he so often held out to all who should be devout to Mary.

Alphonsus straining the crucifix and image of most holy Mary to his breast, the brethren in tears and prayer around him, calmly and without struggle or contortion, breathed forth his blessed soul, on Tuesday, the 1st of August, 1787.

On the 21st day of December, 1809, the venerable Pontiff Pius VII. issued the decree for the beatification of Alphonsus, and on the 26th of May, 1836, our Most Holy Father, Gregory, after having gone through the glorious proofs of his sanctity, vouchsafed to the Church by the Almighty, after the beatification of his servant, proceeded with the solemn ceremony of canonization. or enrolment amongst the saints.

INTRODUCTION

THIS BEAUTIFUL LITTLE WORK was first published in 1753. It is therefore one of the earliest works of Saint Alphonsus. The Saint entitled it: "A method of conversing continually and lovingly with God"; and to the title, he added a note to say that it had been translated from the French, but that he had "augmented it with holy thoughts, affections and practices." It was surely the Saint's humility that made him thus minimise his part in the composition of the book, for as a matter of fact he entirely recast the little French treatise and made it all his own. His biographer, Father Berthe, could write of it: "In this golden little book are to be found the most familiar thoughts of the holy author." (Life Volume I. Page 575).

It will be easily seen that the treatise has a twofold message. Saint Alphonsus, like the Divine Redeemer before him, always puts the thought of God's justice, and the fear of punishment, before those who are obstinate in sin. But, following again the Redeemer's example, the saintly Doctor preaches in burning words the truth that every soul wishing to serve God may go to Him with perfect, unwavering confidence. To such souls, God shows infinite tenderness and love. This message of confidence to men of goodwill, is the first lesson which the Saint teaches, with convincing force, in the following pages. The second lesson is deduced from the first: those who wish to serve God should speak to Him frequently, confidingly, lovingly.

Be it remembered that this treatise is from the pen of a Doctor of the Church: every sentence of it bears the impress of his authority. A new translation of it is now given to the public in the hope that it will continue its mission of mercy, and lead men, in ever increasing numbers, to speak frequently and lovingly to God.

HOW TO PRAY AT ALL TIMES

"Watch ye, therefore, praying at all times, that you may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that are to come, and to stand before the Son of Man."
—Saint Luke (21:36).

Chapter I

GOD WISHES US TO SPEAK TO HIM WITH CONFIDENCE AND FAMILIARITY

What is man that You should magnify him: or why do You set Your Heart upon him? (Job, 7:17). Such was the astonished cry of Job when he considered the marvellous condescension of God in loving man and in longing to be loved by him. Hence, it is a mistake to think that great confidence and familiarity in treating with God is a want of reverence towards His infinite Majesty. You should, indeed, devout reader, worship Him in all humility and prostrate yourself before Him; especially when you call to mind the ingratitude and sin of which, in the past, you may have been guilty. Yet this should not hinder you from treating Him with the most tender confidence and love. He is infinite majesty; but, at the same time, He is infinite love and goodness. In God you possess the most exalted and supreme Lord; but also a Friend who loves you with the greatest possible love. He is not offended—on the contrary He is pleased—when you treat Him with that confidence, freedom and tenderness with which a child treats its mother. Hear how He invites us to go to Him and even promises to welcome us with His caresses: 'You shall be carried at the breasts and upon the knees they shall caress you. As one whom the mother caresses, so will I comfort you' (Isaiah 66:12). As a mother delights to place her child upon her knees, there to feed or fondle it: so is our merciful God pleased to treat souls whom He loves, who have given themselves wholly to Him, and placed all their hopes in His goodness.

Bear well in mind that you have neither friend, nor brother, nor father, nor mother, nor spouse, nor lover, who loves you more than God. Divine grace is that great treasure whereby we, vile creatures and poor servants, become the dear friends of our Creator Himself: 'For she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use, become the friends of God (Wisdom 7:14). In order to fill our hearts with confidence, He emptied Himself, as Saint Paul says (Philippians 2:7), abasing Himself to our level and conversing familiarly with us: He conversed with men (Baruch 3:38). He went so far as to become an infant, to become poor, to die publicly on a cross; He went so far as to hide Himself under the appearance of bread in order to become our constant Companion and to unite Himself intimately to us: 'He that eats My Flesh and drinks My Blood abides in Me and I in him (John 6:57). In a word, He loves you as though He had no one else to love but you alone. You, too, should love Him alone, and all others for His sake. Of Him, you may say, and, indeed, you should say: 'My Beloved to me and I to Him' (Canticles 2:16). My God has given Himself all to me, and I give myself all to Him; He has chosen me for His beloved, and I choose Him, of all others, for my only love: 'My Beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands' (Canticles 5:10).

Say, then, to him, often:

O my Lord! Wherefore do You love me thus? What good thing do You see in me? Have You forgotten the injuries I have done You? But since You have treated me so lovingly, and, instead of casting me into hell, have granted me so many favours, whom can I desire to love from this day forward but You, my God, my all? Ah, most gracious God, if in time past I have offended You, it is not so much the punishment I have deserved that now grieves me, as the displeasure I have given You, who are worthy of infinite love. But You know not how to despise a heart that repents and humbles itself: 'A contrite and humble heart, O God, You will not despise.' (Psalm 51:17 in the Hebrew or Psalm 50:19 in the Vulgate.) Ah, now, indeed, neither in this life nor in the other do I desire any but You alone: 'What have I in heaven? And besides You what do I desire upon earth? You are the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever.' (Psalm 73:25–26 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 72:25–26) You alone are and shall be forever the only Lord of my heart, of my will; You my only good, my heaven, my hope, my love, my all: "The God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever."

The more to strengthen your confidence in God, often call to mind His loving treatment of you, and the gracious means He has used to help you to overcome your faults and to detach you from the things of this world, in order to draw you to His holy love. Fear, therefore, to have too little confidence in treating with God, now that you are determined to love Him and to please Him by every means in your power. The mercy which He has shown you is a most sure pledge of His love for you. God is displeased with a want of confidence on the part of souls who sincerely love Him, and whom He loves. If, then, you desire to please His merciful Heart, converse with Him henceforward with the greatest possible confidence and tenderness.

"I have graven you in My hands; your walls are always before My eyes" (Isaiah 49:16). In these words, God says to you in effect: 'Beloved soul, why are you timid or distrustful? I have written you in My hands so as never to forget to do you good. Are you afraid of your enemies? Know that the care of your defence is always before Me, so that I cannot lose sight of it.' This is the thought which made David rejoice, as he cried out to God: 'You have crowned us as with a shield of Your good will.' (Psalm 5:12 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 5:13.) Who, Lord, can ever harm us if You do surround us with Your goodness and love?

Let the thought of the gift of our Divine Lord be the greatest motive of your hope: 'God so loved the world as to give His only-begotten Son' (John, 3:16). How can we ever fear, as the Apostle asks, that God would refuse us any good gift, seeing that He has deigned to give us His own Son? He delivered Him up for us all; how has He not also, with Him, given us all things? (Romans 8:32).

'My delights are to be with the children of men' (Proverbs 8:31). If one may so express it—the paradise of God is the heart of man. Does God love you? Love Him in return. His delights are to be with you; let yours be to be with Him—to pass all your lifetime with Him, in whose company you hope to spend a blissful eternity. Accustom yourself to speak to Him alone, familiarly, with confidence and love, as to the dearest friend you have, the Friend who loves you most.

Chapter II

IT IS EASY AND AGREEABLE TO CONVERSE WITH GOD

If, as has been already said, it is a great mistake to speak to God with diffidence—to appear before Him as a timid slave, trembling with alarm before his prince—it would be a still greater mistake to think that conversing with God is wearisome and unpleasant. No—on the contrary her conversation has no bitterness nor her company any tediousness (Wisdom 8:16). Ask those souls who love Him with a true love, and they will tell you that in the sorrows of their life their sweetest and truest consolation is to converse lovingly with God.

Now, you are not required to apply your mind so constantly to prayer as to forget your ordinary work and recreation. "Praying always," means that, without neglecting your ordinary occupations, you treat God as you treat the friends who love you and whom you love. God is ever near you, even within you: 'In Him we live and move and have our being' (Acts 18:28). He who would speak to God has no door to open; God is pleased when you speak to Him without reserve. Tell Him of your business, your plans, your griefs, your fears—of all that concerns you. Above all, do so (as I have already said) with confidence and entire freedom. For God is not wont to speak to the soul which does not speak to Him; in fact, being unaccustomed to speak to God, the soul would scarcely understand Him when He spoke. This is what the Lord complains of, in these words: 'Our sister is little: what shall we do to our sister in the day when she is to be spoken to?' (Canticles 8:8). Our sister is but a child in My love; what shall we do to speak to her if she understands not? It is the will of God that we remember His surpassing power and His rigorous justice if we despise His grace; but, on the contrary, He wishes that we should treat Him as a most affectionate friend if we love Him, and that we should speak to Him confidingly and without restraint.

It is true that God ought to be worshipped always with the greatest reverence; however, when He deigns to make you feel His presence and when He makes known His desire that you should speak to Him as to the Friend who loves you better than any other friend, then you should open your heart to Him with the greatest liberty and confidence. 'She prevents them that covet her, so that she first shows herself unto them' (Wisdom, 6–16). If you only desire His love, He will take the first step, without waiting for you to come to Him, and He will present Himself to you with all the graces and remedies of which you stand in need. He only waits for you to speak to Him, to show that He is near you, ready to hear and to comfort you: 'And His ears are unto our prayers' (Psalm 34:15 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 33:16).

By reason of His immensity, God is present everywhere; but there are two places where He dwells in a particular manner. One is in the highest heavens, where He is present by that glory which He communicates to the blessed; the other is on earth—within the humble soul that loves Him: 'His name is holy who dwells in the high and holy place, and with a contrite and humble spirit (Isaiah 57:15).

(Footnote: Elsewhere Saint Alphonsus has of course written on the third special dwelling of God with men—the sacramental presence of our Lord in the holy Eucharist. In fact, in the earlier editions of the saint's works the present treatise was always published with the Visits to the Blessed Sacrament.)

Our God, then, dwells in the heights of heaven, and yet He does not disdain to occupy Himself with His servants day and night in their homes or in their monastic cells. There He bestows on them His divine consolations, the least one of which surpasses all the delights that the world offers, and which He alone does not desire who has never tasted their sweetness: 'Oh, taste and see that the Lord is sweet.' (Psalm 34:8 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 33:9).

Friends in the world have generally certain days on which they meet and converse; on other days they are apart; but between God and you, if you wish, there need never be one hour of separation: 'You shall rest, and your sleep shall be sweet: the Lord will be at your side (Proverbs 3:24).

You may sleep, but God will place Himself at your side and watch over you continually: 'I will rest with Him and He will be a comfort in my cares and grief.' (Consult Wisdom 8:9 and 8:16). When you take your rest, He does not leave your bedside. He remains there, always thinking of you, that when you awake in the night He may speak to you by His inspirations, and receive from you in return some act of love, of oblation, of thanksgiving. Thus, He desires to continue even in the hours of the night His sweet and gracious converse with you. Sometimes also, He will speak to you while you sleep, and make you hear His voice, so that in waking you may put in practice what He has spoken: 'I will speak to Him in a dream' (Numbers 12:6).

He is there also in the morning, to hear from you some word of affection, of confidence; to be the depository of your first thoughts, and of all the actions which you promise to perform that day to please Him; of all the griefs, too, which you offer to endure willingly for His glory and love. But as He fails not to present Himself to you at the moment of your waking, do not fail, on your part to give Him immediately a look of love, and to rejoice when your God announces to you the glad tidings that He is not far from you (as once He may have been by reason of your sins); but that He loves you, and would be beloved by you; and at that same moment He gives you the gracious precept, 'You shall love the Lord your God with your whole heart' (Deuteronomy, 6:5).

Chapter III

ON WHAT, AND HOW, WE SHOULD CONVERSE WITH GOD

1. IN GENERAL

Never, then, forget His sweet presence, as do the greater part of men. Speak to Him as often as you can, for He does not grow weary of this nor disdain it, as do the lords of the earth. If you love Him, you will not be at a loss what to say to Him. Tell Him all that occurs to you about yourself and your affairs, as you would tell it to a dear friend. Do not look upon Him as a haughty monarch who will converse only with the great and on great matters. He, your God, is pleased to lower Himself to you, and to hear you communicate to Him your smallest and most ordinary concerns. He loves you as much—He has as much care for you—as if He had no one else to think of but you. He is as completely devoted to your interests as though the only end of His providence was to help you, of His almighty power to aid you, of His mercy and goodness to take pity on you, to do you good and to win by His kindness your confidence and love. Manifest to Him, then, freely your whole state of mind and pray to Him to enlighten you that you may perfectly accomplish His holy will. Let all your desires and aims be directed to learn His good pleasure and to do what is agreeable to His divine Heart: 'Commit your way to the Lord'; and 'desire of Him to direct your ways and that all your counsels may abide in Him.' (Psalm 37:5 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 36:5 and Tobit 4:20).

Say not: Why disclose all my wants to God, since He already sees and knows them better than I do? Yes, He knows them; but He acts as if He did not know the needs about which you do not speak to Him and for which you do not seek His aid. Our Saviour knew that Lazarus was dead, and yet He acted as if He did not know until Mary (Magdalen) told Him of it; it was then that He comforted her by bringing her brother back to life.

2. PRAY IN YOUR TRIALS

When you are afflicted with sickness, persecution, temptation, or any other trouble, turn at once to God and ask His help. It is enough for you to lay your affliction before Him—to go to Him and say: 'Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress' (Lamentations 1:20). He will not fail to comfort you, or at least to give you strength to suffer the trial with patience, and in this case it will prove a greater good than if He had freed you altogether from it. Tell Him of all the things that make you fear, or make you sad, and say to Him: 'My God, in You are all my hopes. I offer this cross to You. I resign myself to Your will. Take pity on me and either deliver me from my trial or give me strength to endure it.' He will remember immediately the promise which He made in the Gospel, of consoling and comforting all those who have recourse to Him in tribulation: 'Come to Me all you that labour and are burdened and I will refresh you (Matthew 11:28).

He will not be displeased if you seek comfort from your friends in the hour of trial; but He wishes you to have recourse principally to Him. At least, therefore, when you have had recourse to creatures and they have not been able to console your heart, go to your Creator and say to Him: 'Lord, men have only words; they cannot afford me consolation. I no longer desire to be consoled by them. You alone are my hope; You alone my only love. By You alone do I desire to be comforted and the consolation I ask for, is to do on this occasion what is most pleasing to You. Behold, I am ready to endure this trial for the whole of my life, and for all eternity, if such be Your will. Only help me.'

Do not be afraid of offending Him if you sometimes gently complain, saying: 'Why, Lord, have You retired afar off? (Psalm 1 0:1 in the Hebrew and in the Vulgate.) 'Lord, You know that I love You, and that I desire nothing but Your love. Have pity on me and help me. Do not abandon me.'

If desolation should continue for a long time and grievously afflict you, unite your voice to the voice of your afflicted Jesus and say: 'My God, my God, why have You forsaken me?' (Matthew 28:46). Let the thought humble you that having offended God, you do not deserve His consolations. At the same time, remember that He permits every thing for your good, and do not lose confidence: 'All things work together unto good to them that love God' (Romans 8:28). Say with courage, even when you feel most troubled and disconsolate: 'The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?' (Psalm 27:1 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 26:1). Lord, You will guide me, You will save me; In You do I trust. In You, O Lord, have I hoped; let me never be confounded (Ecclesiasticus 2:11). Reflect that God loves you more than you can love yourself. Why, then, should you be afraid? David brought comfort to his heart saying: 'The Lord is careful for me.' (Psalm 40:17 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 39:18). Let such be your sentiments, too, when you pray; and speak in this manner to God: 'Lord, I cast myself into Your arms; and I desire to think only of loving and pleasing You. Behold me ready to do what You ask of me. You do not only will my good, but You are "careful" for it. To You, then, I leave the care of my salvation. In You I rest, and will rest for evermore, since You will that in You I should place all my hopes': 'In peace, in the self-same I will sleep and I will rest; for You, O Lord, singularly have settled me in hope' (Psalm 4:8 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 4:9–10)

'Think of the Lord in goodness' (Wisdom 1:1). In these words, the inspired writer exhorts us to have more confidence in the divine mercy than dread of the divine justice. For God is incomparably more inclined to bestow favours upon us than to chastise us, as Saint James says: 'Mercy exalts itself above judgment' (2:13). For this reason, Saint Peter exhorts us in all our fears—whether for our temporal or eternal interests—to abandon ourselves entirely to the goodness of God, who has the interests of our salvation at heart: 'Casting all your care upon Him, for He has care of you' (1 Peter 5:7). The royal prophet, David, has the same message of hope when he gives to God the beautiful title of our God and the God who is willing to save us: 'Our God is the God of salvation.' (Psalm 68:20 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 67:21). This means, as (Saint Robert) Bellarmine explains it, that it is the will of God, not to condemn, but to save all. He threatens with His displeasure those who despise Him; but He promises mercy to those who fear Him: in the words of the canticle of our Blessed Lady: 'His mercy is from generation to generation to them that fear Him.'

I place before you, devout reader, all these passages from the sacred scriptures, so that if you are ever troubled by the doubt as to whether you will be saved or no—whether you are of the number of the predestined or no—you may take courage at the thought that you know from God's Word that He desires to save you, if only you are resolved to serve and love Him as He asks of you.

3. PRAY IN YOUR JOYS

When you receive some pleasant news, do not act like some unfaithful and thankless souls who have recourse to God in time of trouble, but forget and forsake Him when things go well with them. Show Him the fidelity that you would show to a sincere friend who rejoices in your happiness. Go at once and tell Him of your joy, and praise Him and give Him thanks, acknowledging your good fortune as a gift from His hands. Rejoice in the fact that you owe your happiness to Him, and place all your joy and comfort in Him: 'I will rejoice in the Lord' (Habakkuk 3:18). 'I have trusted in Your mercy. My heart shall rejoice in Your salvation. (The name "Jesus" means "Saviour" or "Salvation.") I will sing to the Lord, who gives me good things. Yea I will sing to the name of the Lord the most high.' (Psalm 13:6 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 12:6) (This Psalm is thus praying: 'I will joy in God my Jesus.' Say to Him: 'My Jesus, I bless, and will ever bless You, for granting me so many favours, when I deserved at Your hands not favours, but chastisements for the affronts I have offered You.' Say to him, with the sacred Spouse: 'All fruits, the new and the old, my Beloved, I have kept for You' (Canticles 7:13). 'Lord, I give You thanks; I keep in memory Your many acts of kindness, past and present, to render You praise and glory for them forever.'

But if you love your God, you ought to rejoice more in His blessedness than in your own. He who has a dear friend sometimes takes more delight in that friend's good fortune than if it had been his own. Comfort yourself, then, in the knowledge that God is infinitely happy. Often say to him: 'My beloved Lord, I rejoice more in Your blessedness than in any happiness of my own, for I love You more than I love myself.'

4. PRAY AFTER A FAULT

Another mark of confidence highly pleasing to our most loving God is this: that when you have committed any fault, you are not ashamed to go at once to Him and seek His pardon. Consider that God is so willing to pardon sinners that He laments their perdition, when they depart far from Him and live dead to His grace. Therefore, does he lovingly call them, saying: 'Why will you die, O house of Israel? Return all of you, and live' (Ezekiel 18:31). He promises to receive a soul that has forsaken Him, if only it returns to His arms: 'Turn to Me . . . and I will turn to you' (Zechariah 1:3). Would that sinners only knew how mercifully our Saviour awaits them in order to pardon them: 'The Lord waits that He may have mercy upon you' (Isaiah 30:18). Would that sinners realised the desire on the part of God, not, indeed, to chastise them, but to see them converted and to embrace and press them to His Heart: 'As I live, says the Lord God, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live' (Ezekiel 33:11).

He has even still more consoling words: 'Come and accuse Me, says the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made as white as snow' (Isaiah 1:18). In other words, He says: 'Sinners, repent of having offended Me and then come to Me. If I do not pardon you, accuse Me of being unfaithful to My promises; but, no, I will keep My word. If you come to Me and repent, though your soul be dyed deep crimson with crime, by My grace it shall be made white as snow.' Almighty God promises even to forget the sinner's wrong-doing if only he repents: 'I will not remember all his iniquities' (Ezekiel 18:22). As soon, then, as you fall into any fault, raise your eyes to God, make an act of love, and humbly confessing your fault, place unwavering confidence in God, saying to Him: 'Lord, behold, he whom You love is sick' (John 11:3). The heart which You love is sick—is wounded. 'Heal my soul, for I have sinned against You.' (Psalm 41:4 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 40:5). 'You seek penitent sinners. Behold one at Your feet, seeking You. The evil is committed—what must I do? You will not have me lose confidence; even after the sin which I have committed, You desire my good, and I again love You. Yes, my God I lo ve You with all my heart. I am sorry for my sin, and will never more offend You.' 'You are a God, sweet, and mild, and plenteous in mercy.' (Psalm 86:5 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 85:5.) 'Pardon me. Let me hear from You what You did say to Magdalen: "Your sins are forgiven you" (Luke 7:48); and give me strength for the future to be faithful to You.'

Then, in order not to be discouraged, cast your eyes upon Jesus Christ crucified; offer to the Eternal Father his merits, and confidently hope for pardon; since to pardon you he spared not his own Son. Say to him with confidence: 'Look on the face of Your Christ–Your Anointed One.' (Psalm 84:9 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 83:10.) 'My God, have regard to Your Son who has died for me and for His sake grant me pardon.'

Attend, especially, devout soul, to what is commonly taught by masters of the spiritual life, who recommend you to have recourse immediately to God after you have fallen, although you should repeat the fall a hundred times in the day. Having done this, do not be disturbed. If you remain discouraged and troubled because of the fault committed, you will scarcely speak to God; your confidence will grow less your desire to love God will grow cold and you will make little or no advance in the way of the Lord. On the other hand, by having immediate recourse to God, asking His pardon and promising amendment for the future, your very faults will help you to advance in divine love. Between friends who sincerely love one another, it sometimes happens that when one offends the other and then humbles himself and asks pardon, their friendship becomes stronger than ever. Do you act in like manner with regard to God: let your faults only strengthen the bonds of love, which unite you to Him.

5. PRAY IN YOUR DOUBTS

Whenever you are in doubt about anything—whether it regards yourself or others—act like good friends do, who always consult one another in their difficulties. Show the same mark of confidence to God; consult Him; ask Him to enlighten you, that you may decide on what is most pleasing to Him: 'Put You words in my mouth and strengthen the resolution in my heart' (Judith 9:18). Lord, make known to me what You would have me do, to answer, and I will obey You: 'Speak, Lord, for Your servant hears (1 Samuel 3:10 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, 1 Kings 3:10).

6. PRAY FOR YOUR NEIGHBOUR

Recommend to God with confidence not only your own needs but also the needs of others. How pleasing to Him it will be if you sometimes forget yourself and speak to Him of His own glory, of the miseries of others, especially those who mourn in sorrow; of the souls in purgatory, His spouses, who long to behold Him in Heaven; and of poor sinners who live deprived of His grace. Pray to Him for sinners thus:

Lord, You are all goodness and worthy of an infinite love: how, then, can You endure in the world so many souls on whom You have lavished Your favours, and who yet have no desire to know You, who have no desire to love You, who even offend and despise You? Ah, my most amiable God, make Yourself known—make Yourself loved. 'Hallowed be Your name.' 'Your kingdom come.' May Your name be adored and loved by all men. May Your love reign in all hearts. Do not let me depart from You without granting me some grace for the unhappy souls for whom I pray.

7. SPEAK TO GOD OF HEAVEN

It is said that souls who in this life have but little longing for heaven are punished in purgatory with a peculiar pain, called the pain of languor. This surely is only just; because to have but little longing for heaven is to set little value on the happiness of that eternal kingdom which our Lord opened to us by His death. Remember, then, frequently to think of, and long for heaven. Say to God that your life seems an endless span, so great is your desire to go to Him, to see Him face to face, and to love Him. Long to be set free from your exile, from this world of sin, from the danger of losing divine grace, that you may arrive at that land of love where your heart will be given wholly to God. Say to Him over and over again: 'Lord, as long as I live on this earth I am in danger of forsaking You and of losing Your love. When shall I leave this life, wherein I am forever offending You? When shall I go to love You with all my soul and unite myself to You without any danger of losing You again?'

Saint Teresa was ever sighing for heaven in this manner. She used to rejoice when she heard the clock strike, because another hour of life and of the danger of losing God, had passed. She so earnestly desired to die that she might see God, that she was dying with the desire to die. This was the subject of the loving poem which she composed: "I die because I do not die."

Chapter IV

HOW GOD ANSWERS THE SOUL

In a word, if you wish to please the loving Heart of God, endeavour to speak to Him as often as you can, and with the fullest confidence that He will answer and speak to you in return. When you withdraw yourself from conversation with creatures to speak to God alone, He will not speak in a voice that strikes the ear, but in a voice that reaches the heart: 'I will lead her into the wilderness and I will speak to her heart' (Hosea or Osee, 2:14). He will speak by inspiration, by interior light, by manifestations of His goodness, by a tenderness which touches the heart, by assurance of pardon, by a feeling of peace, by the hope of heaven, by intimate happiness, by the sweetness of His grace, by loving and tender embraces of the soul—in a word, He will speak in a voice easily understood by those whom He loves and who have given their hearts to Him.

Chapter V

THE PRACTICE OF PRAYING CONSTANTLY

To conclude this treatise, I will recall briefly, what has been said in the preceding pages, and I will suggest a practice by which you may render all your daily actions pleasing to God.

When you awake in the morning, let your first thought be to raise up your mind to God, to offer to His honour whatever you may have to do or suffer during the day, and to beseech Him to assist you with His holy grace. Then perform your other morning devotions, making acts of love and of gratitude, and praying and resolving to spend the day as if it were to be the last of your life.

Father Saint-Jure recommends you to make a compact every morning with God, that every time you make a certain sign, such as placing your hand upon your heart, or raising your eyes to heaven or to the crucifix, or the like, you intend thereby to make an act of love, of desire to see God loved by all, of oblation of yourself, and other acts of the same kind. When you have made these acts, place your soul in the wound of the side of Jesus and under the mantle of Mary, and beg of the Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus and Mary, to protect you during the day. Then, before all things else, be sure to make your meditation, or mental prayer, at least for half an hour. Meditate especially on the sufferings and contempt which Jesus endured in His Passion. This is the subject dearest to fervent souls, and the one best calculated to set hearts aflame with divine love. If you desire to make progress in the spiritual life, there are three devotions which must be particularly dear to you: Devotion to the Passion of our Lord, to the Most Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

In all your meditations repeat again and again acts of contrition, of the love of God and of oblation of yourself. The venerable Father Charles Caraffa, (1561–1633) founder of the Congregation of Pious Workers, says that one fervent act of love made thus in the morning is sufficient to maintain the soul in fervour throughout the whole day.

Perform your more important acts of devotion with great care, such as going to confession, receiving Holy Communion, reciting the divine office, and other similar duties. Whenever you are going to begin some external occupation, like study or work, or the duty of your state in life, do not forget to offer it to God, praying His assistance to enable you to perform it well. Afterwards follow the example of Saint Catharine of Siena and retire often to the cell of your heart in order to unite yourself to God. In a word, whatever you do, do it with God and for Him. When you leave your room, or go out of the house—and when you return—say a Hail Mary, and thus recommend yourself to the Blessed Virgin. At your meals, whether you find them pleasant to your taste, or not to your liking, offer all to God. On rising from table, say, as grace, some little prayer like this: 'Lord, how good You are to one who has offended You!' During the day give some time to spiritual reading; and make a visit to the Blessed Sacrament and to our Lady. In the evening say the Rosary, examine your conscience, make acts of faith, hope, charity and contrition; promise to serve God more fervently and to receive the holy sacraments during life and at death, and form the intention of gaining all the indulgences within your power. When you go to bed, reflect that you have deserved to lie in the fire of hell; then, with a crucifix in your arms, compose yourself to sleep, saying: 'In peace, in the self-same I will sleep and I will rest.' (Psalm 4:8 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 4:9.)

(Here, in passing, {Saint Alphonsus adds,} I would remind the reader of indulgences which are attached to various acts of devotion; and also I would remind him of the desirability of renewing each morning the intention of gaining all the indulgences possible during the day. For reciting the acts of faith, hope and charity there is an indulgence of seven years and seven quarantines each day. {A Quarantine is the remission of as much temporal punishment as would be blotted out by an ecclesial penance of forty days.} If they are recited daily for a month, a plenary indulgence may be gained on the condition of going to confession and Communion and of praying for the intentions of the Church; this indulgence may be applied to the souls in purgatory or to oneself at the hour of death.) [Since the revisions of Vatican II, all indulgences are now classed either as 'partial' or as 'plenary.' Let us recall, however, that God is never outdone in generosity.]

(In like manner, form the intention of gaining also all the indulgences granted for saying the Rosary on beads properly blessed, the Angelus three times a day, the Litany of our Blessed Lady, the 'Salve Regina' {Hail Holy Queen}, the 'Ave Maria' { Hail Mary}, and the 'Gloria Patri' {Glory be to the Father}; for saying, "Blessed be the holy and Immaculate Conception of the most Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God"; as also for saying, "Blessed and praised every moment be the most holy and divine Sacrament"; for reciting the prayer 'Anima Christi' {Soul of Christ or 'Soul of my Saviour'—the hymn}, et cetera; for bowing the head at the 'Gloria Patri' and at the most holy names of Jesus and Mary; as also for hearing Mass; for making half an hour's mental prayer—for this there is a partial indulgence, and also, if the meditation is made daily, a plenary indulgence on the usual conditions of confession, Communion and praying for the intentions of the Church; for genuflecting before the Blessed Sacrament; for kissing the cross.)

{Footnote from the 1957 Redemptorist editor regarding genuflecting before the Blessed Sacrament: The recent edition of the Raccolta, (the book formally listing indulgenced prayers) No. 116a, quotes this indulgence in these terms: "Any exterior act of reverence when passing a Church or Chapel where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved," 100 days 'Toties Quoties' ('as often as it is done'). For kissing the cross, the new Raccolta gives no indulgence.}

In order to keep yourself recollected and united to God as far as the imperfections of human nature permit, endeavour, by means of what you see and hear, to raise your mind to God and to recall the things of eternity. For instance, when you see running water, reflect that your life is rushing on in like manner and taking you nearer to death. When you see a lamp going out for want of oil, reflect that thus your life will one day flicker out and be extinguished. When you see graves or the bodies of the dead, think of what will happen to yourself one day. When you see worldly people rejoicing in their wealth or distinction, have pity on their folly, and say to yourself: 'For me God is sufficient': 'Some trust in chariots, some in horses, but we in the name of the Lord' (Psalm 20:7 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 19:8). 'Let them glory if they wish in vanity. Be it mine to glory only in the grace of God and in His holy love.' When you see monuments erected to the dead, or take part in the funeral ceremonies of the great ones of this world, ask yourself the question: 'If their souls are lost, what will all this pomp avail them?' When you look out over the ocean and see it now calm and tranquil and now lashed to fury by the winds, consider the difference there is between a soul in sin and a soul in the state of grace. When you see a tree that is withered, reflect on the fact that a soul without God is fit for nothing but to be cast into the fire.

If you ever happen to see one who has been guilty of some great crime, trembling with shame and fear in the presence of his judge, or his father, or of his Bishop, consider what the terror of the sinner will be in the presence of Jesus Christ, his judge. When thunder crashes through the heavens, and you grow alarmed, reflect how those miserable souls that are damned tremble as they hear continually in hell the thunders of the divine wrath. If you ever see one who has been condemned to suffer a painful death, and who says, "Is there, then, no longer any means of my escaping death?" consider what will be the despair of a soul when it is condemned to hell, as it says: "Is there, then, no longer any means of escaping from eternal ruin?"

When you behold beautiful scenes in the country or along the sea coast, or when you look at flowers or fruit, and are pleased by the sight or the perfume, say: 'For me God has created these lovely things in this world, that I may love Him. What delights has He not prepared for me in heaven?' Seeing fair plains and beautiful hills, Saint Teresa used to say that they reproached her with her ingratitude to God. The Abbot de Rance, founder of La Trappe, declared that the beauty of creation around him obliged him to love God. Saint Augustine had the same thought: "The heavens and the earth and all Your works cry out to me to love You." There is a story told of a certain holy man, that in passing through the fields he would strike with a little stick the flowers and plants which he found on his way, saying, "Be silent; do not reproach me any longer for my ingratitude to God. I have understood you; be silent; say no more." When Saint Mary Magdalene of Pazzi held in her hand any beautiful fruit or flower, she used to feel herself glowing with divine love, saying to herself, "Behold, my God has thought from eternity of creating this fruit, this flower, in order to give it to me as a token of the love which He bears towards me."

When you see rivers or streams, reflect that as their waters run towards the sea, and never remain still, so ought you ever tend towards God, who is your only good. When you happen to be in some vehicle drawn by horses say: "See what labour these innocent animals go through for my service; and how much pains do I myself take in order to serve and please my God?" When you see a little dog, which for a miserable morsel of bread is faithful to its master, reflect how much greater reason you have to be faithful to God, who has created and preserved you, and heaps upon you so many blessings. When you hear the birds sing, say: "Hearken, O my soul, to the praise which these little creatures are giving to their Creator; and what are you doing?" Then do you also praise him with acts of love. On the other hand, when you hear the cock crow, recall to your memory that there once was a time when you also, like Peter, denied your God; and renew your tears and your contrition. If you see the house or the locality in which you fell into some sin, turn to God and say in your heart: 'The sins of my youth and my ignorance; remember not, O Lord.' (Psalm 25:7 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 24:7).

When you see valleys fertilised by waters that descend on them from the heights of the mountains, consider that grace in a similar manner leaves those who are proud, to flow into hearts that are humble. When you see a church beautifully adorned, consider the beauty of a soul in grace, which is truly the temple of God. When you look upon the sea, consider the greatness and immensity of God. When you see fire, or candles lighted on the altar say: "For how many years ought I to have been burning in hell? But since You, O Lord, have not yet condemned me to that place of woe, grant that my heart may now burn with Your holy love, even as this fuel or these candles." When you behold the heavens and the stars, say with Saint Andrew of Avellino (1521–1608): "My feet will one day tread upon those stars."

Recall also frequently the mysteries of our Saviour's love; and when you see straw or a manger or a rocky cave, remember the Infant Jesus and the stable at Bethlehem. When, you see a hammer, or a saw, or a plane, or an axe, recall how Jesus laboured like any ordinary young working man in the cottage at Nazareth. If you see cords, thorns, nails, or beams of wood, think of the sorrows and death of the Most Holy Redeemer. When Saint Francis of Assisi happened to see a lamb, he shed tears, as he exclaimed: "My Lord like a lamb was led to die for me." When you look at an altar, a chalice, or a chasuble, recall to mind the great love which Jesus has shown us in giving Himself to us in the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist.

Following the example of Saint Teresa, often offer yourself to God during the day, and say: "Behold me, O Lord, ready to do what You will. Make known to me Your holy will; I am eager to do all that You ask of me."

As the hours go by, make repeated acts of divine love, for—to quote Saint Teresa again—these acts of love are the fuel by which divine love is kept burning within the heart. One day, when the Venerable Sister Seraphine of Capri (Serafina di Dio, 1621–1699) happened to see the convent mule, the thought occurred to her that the poor animal could not love God. She expressed her compassion in these words: "Poor brute you can neither know nor love God." Then a wonderful thing happened—tears welled into the animal's eyes and forthwith began to flow abundantly. Do you imitate the saintly sister's example. When you see, creatures incapable of knowing or loving God, use the intelligence that He has given you to repeat many acts of love.

If anything painful or disagreeable happens to you, immediately offer to God what you have to suffer, and unite your will to His. Accustom yourself to repeat in every trial: 'It is the will of God; it is my will also.' Acts of resignation are the acts of love dearest to the Heart of God.

When you have to arrive at some decision, or to give some important advice, ask God's help before you do so. Repeat as often as you reasonably can during the day: 'Incline unto mine aid, O God,' as Saint Rose of Lima was accustomed to do. To obtain this help of God turn frequently to the crucifix or to the picture of our Blessed Lady (which, of course, you will have in your room) and do not fail to invoke frequently the names of Jesus and Mary, especially in time of temptation. God, being infinitely kind, has the greatest desire to communicate His graces to us. The Venerable Father Alphonsus Alvarez saw our Lord, on one occasion, with His hands filled with graces, going about seeking souls to whom He might dispense them. But He will have us ask Him for them: Ask and you shall receive; otherwise, He will withdraw His hands. He will, on the contrary, stretch them out to us and willingly open them to us if we invoke Him. Who ever had recourse to God, asks Ecclesiasticus, and God despised him by refusing to hear him? 'Who has called upon Him, and He despised him?' (2–11). David declares that God shows not only mercy, but great mercy, to those who invoke Him: 'For You, O Lord, are sweet and mild; and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon You.' (Psalm 86:5 in the Hebrew or, in the Vulgate, Psalm 85:5).

How good and kind God is to those who lovingly seek Him! 'The Lord is good to the soul that seeks Him' (Lamentations 3:25). He is found even by those who do not seek Him: 'I was found by them that did not seek Me' (Romans 10:20); with far greater willingness He will anticipate those who seek Him in order to serve and love Him.

I conclude with a thought from Saint Teresa. It is this: 'The souls of the just should do on earth, through a spirit of love, what the Blessed do in heaven. In heaven, the saints occupy themselves only with God; all their thoughts are for His glory; all their pleasure is to love Him. Do you act in the same way. During your life on earth let God be your only happiness, the only object of your affections, the only end of all your actions and desires, until you arrive at that eternal Kingdom, where your love will be consummated and made perfect, and your desires will be completely fulfilled and satisfied.'

APPENDIX

Method of MENTAL PRAYER or Meditation According to Saint Alphonsus.

I. PREPARATION

A recollected life and regular Spiritual Reading are the best remote preparation.

For the immediate preparation, make three short but fervent acts.

(1) An Act of Adoration of God present to the soul.

Example: 'O my God, I believe You are really here present; I bow down and adore You. You are so good, I am so sinful; You are so great, I am only nothingness'; et cetera.

(2) An Act of Sorrow for Sin.

Example: 'O my God, I am heartily sorry for all my sins of thought, word, deed, and omission, and by the help of Your holy grace I will never sin again.'

(3) A Petition for Light and Strength.

Example: 'O my God, give me light to see Your holy Will, give me grace to do Your Will. O Wisdom of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, direct me in all my ways. O Love of the Sacred Heart, consume me in Your fire.

Add a Hail Mary to the Blessed Virgin and an ejaculation to Saint Joseph, your Patron Saints and Angel Guardian.

II. BODY OF THE PRAYER

Use the mind in thinking on some subject as much as is necessary in order to pray fervently. But do not imagine that very much is necessary in order to pray. Do not wait for a great fire to burn up in your soul, but cherish any little spark you may feel.

To help your mind, read a text of Scripture or a short Meditation out of a book. Saint Teresa used a book in her Meditations for seventeen years.

Meditate for a few minutes on any thought that has struck you; that is, think for a short time on what it means, what lessons it teaches you, and ask yourself: 'What have I done about this hitherto? What shall I now do?' But remember, you think only in order that you may pray.

The great benefit of Mental Prayer consists less in meditation or thinking than in acts, prayers and resolutions, which are the fruits of Meditation. The thinking is the needle which draws after it the golden thread of acts, prayers and resolutions. The thread is more important than the needle. The chief part of the time of Meditation should, then, be spent in making:

I. ACTS AND AFFECTIONS

Examples.—Acts of Humility: "My God, I am nothing in Your sight."

Act of Thanksgiving: "My God, I thank You for Your goodness."

Act of Love: "My God, I love You with my whole heart. I wish to please You in all things. I will only what You will. I love You because You are infinitely good. Do with me and mine all that pleases You, because it is Your will."

Acts of love and of contrition are golden chains binding us to God. Saint Thomas says: "Every act of love merits eternal life." Make then many simple but fervent acts of love and sorrow.

2. PRAYERS OF PETITION

In mental prayer, it is extremely useful, and, perhaps better than all else, to make many earnest petitions for the graces you want.

Always ask, above all, for

(a) the perfect forgiveness of all past sin;

(b) the perfect love of God; and

(c) the grace of a holy death.

"At first," said Father Paul Segneri, S.J., "I used to employ my time of prayer in reflections and affections, but God opened my eyes, and then I gave myself to petitions, and if I have any good, it comes from this practice."

3. RESOLUTIONS

"The progress of a soul," says Saint Teresa, "does not consist in thinking much of God, but in loving Him, and this love is gained by resolving to do much for Him." Make one practical resolution that you mean to keep during the day.

III. CONCLUSION

Three short fervent acts:

(1) Thank God for the light He has given you.

(2) Renew your resolution to abstain from some fault or to do some good thing, during the day.

(3) Ask the Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus and Mary, to help you to keep it.

At the end of meditation, always pray for poor sinners and for the souls in Purgatory.

N.B.—The acts and prayers of petition should occupy the most of the time. Thus, in a half-hour's prayer, give three minutes to the preparation: think for five minutes and then pray.

PREPARATORY PRAYER

My Lord Jesus Christ, Thou hast made this journey to die for me with love unutterable, and I have so many times unworthily abandoned Thee; but now I love Thee with my whole heart, and because I love Thee, I repent sincerely for ever having offended Thee. Pardon me, my God, and permit me to accompany Thee on this journey. Thou goest to die for love of me; I wish also, my beloved Redeemer, to die for love of Thee. My Jesus, I will live and die always united to Thee.

STATIONS OF THE CROSS

STATION 1: JESUS IS CONDEMNED TO DEATH

Station 1

JESUS IS CONDEMNED TO DEATH

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how Jesus, after having been scourged and crowned with thorns, was unjustly condemned by Pilate to die on the Cross.

My adorable Jesus, it was not Pilate, no, it was my sins that condemned Thee to die. I beseech Thee, by the merits of this sorrowful journey, to assist my soul in its journey towards eternity. I love Thee, my beloved Jesus; I repent with my whole heart for having offended Thee. Never permit me to separate myself from Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 2: JESUS BEARS HIS CROSS

Station 2

JESUS BEARS HIS CROSS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how Jesus, in making this journey with the Cross on His shoulders thought of us, and for us offered to His Father the death He was about to undergo.

My most beloved Jesus, I embrace all the tribulations Thou hast destined for me until death. I beseech Thee, by the merits of the pain Thou didst suffer in carrying Thy Cross, to give me the necessary help to carry mine with perfect patience and resignation. I love Thee, Jesus my love; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to separate myself from Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 3: JESUS FALLS THE FIRST TIME

Station 3

JESUS FALLS THE FIRST TIME

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider this first fall of Jesus under His Cross. His flesh was torn by the scourges, His head crowned with thorns, and He had lost a great quantity of blood. He was so weakened that he could scarcely walk, and yet he had to carry this great load upon His shoulders. The soldiers struck Him rudely, and thus He fell several times in His journey.

My beloved Jesus, it is not the weight of the Cross, but my sins, which have made Thee suffer so much pain. Ah, by the merits of this first fall, deliver me from the misfortune of falling into mortal sin. I love Thee, O my Jesus, with my whole heart; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to separate myself from Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 4: JESUS MEETS HIS MOTHER

Station 4

JESUS MEETS HIS MOTHER

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider the meeting of the Son and the Mother, which took place on this journey. Jesus and Mary looked at each other, and their looks became as so many arrows to wound those hearts which loved each other so tenderly.

My most loving Jesus, by the sorrow Thou didst experience in this meeting, grant me the grace of a truly devoted love for Thy most holy Mother. And thou, my Queen, who wast overwhelmed with sorrow, obtain for me by thy intercession a continual and tender remembrance of the Passion of thy Son. I love Thee, Jesus my love; I repent of ever having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 5: JESUS IS HELPED BY SIMON

Station 5

JESUS IS HELPED BY SIMON

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how the Jews, seeing that at each step Jesus from weakness was on the point of expiring, and fearing that He would die on the way, when they wished Him to die the ignominious death of the Cross, constrained Simon the Cyrenian to carry the Cross behind our Lord.

My most sweet Jesus, I will not refuse the Cross, as the Cyrenian did; I accept it; I embrace it. I accept in particular the death Thou hast destined for me; with all the pains that may accompany it; I unite it to Thy death, I offer it to Thee. Thou hast died for love of me; I will die for love of Thee, and to please Thee. Help me by Thy grace. I love Thee, Jesus my love; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 6: VERONICA WIPES THE FACE OF JESUS

Station 6

VERONICA WIPES THE FACE OF JESUS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how the holy woman named Veronica, seeing Jesus so afflicted, and His face bathed in sweat and blood, presented Him with a towel, with which He wiped His adorable face, leaving on it the impression of His holy countenance.

My most beloved Jesus, Thy face was beautiful before, but in this journey it has lost all its beauty, and wounds and blood have disfigured it. Alas, my soul also was once beautiful, when it received Thy grace in Baptism; but I have disfigured it since by my sins; Thou alone, my Redeemer, canst restore it to its former beauty. Do this by Thy Passion, O Jesus. I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 7: JESUS FALLS A SECOND TIME

Station 7

JESUS FALLS A SECOND TIME

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider the second fall of Jesus under the Cross—a fall which renews the pain of all the wounds of the head and members of our afflicted Lord.

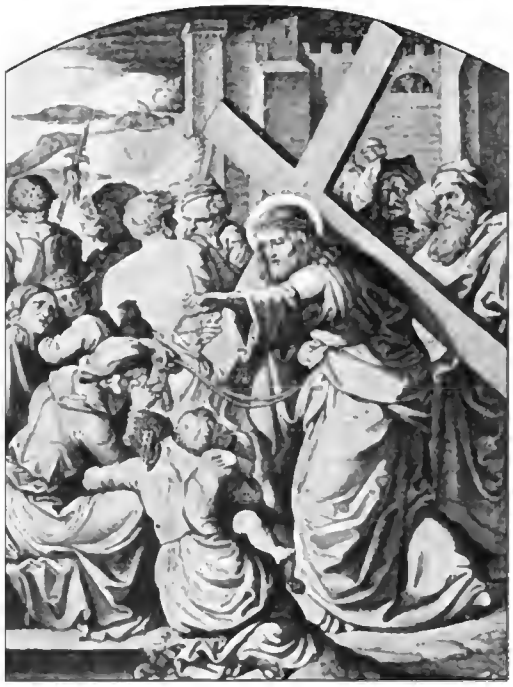
My most gentle Jesus, how many times Thou hast pardoned me, and how many times have I fallen again, and begun again to offend Thee! Oh, by the merits of this new fall, give me the necessary help to persevere in Thy grace until death. Grant that in all temptations which assail me I may always commend myself to Thee. I love Thee, Jesus my love; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.



STATION 8: JESUS SPEAKS TO THE WOMEN

Station 8

JESUS SPEAKS TO THE WOMEN

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how those women wept with compassion at seeing Jesus in such a pitiable state, streaming with blood, as He walked along. But Jesus said to them: Weep not for Me, but for your children.

My Jesus, laden with sorrows, I weep for the offences I have committed against Thee, because of the pains they have deserved, and still more because of the displeasure they have caused Thee, who hast loved me so much. It is Thy love, more than the fear of hell, which causes me to weep for my sins. My Jesus, I love Thee more than myself; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 9: JESUS FALLS A THIRD TIME

Station 9

JESUS FALLS A THIRD TIME

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider the third fall of Jesus Christ. His weakness was extreme, and the cruelty of His executioners was excessive, who tried to hasten His steps when He had scarcely strength to move.

Ah, my outraged Jesus, by the merits of the weakness Thou didst suffer in going to Calvary, give me strength sufficient to conquer all human respect, and all my wicked passions, which have led me to despise Thy friendship. I love Thee, Jesus my love, with my whole heart; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 10: JESUS IS STRIPPED OF HIS GARMENTS

Station 10

JESUS IS STRIPPED OF HIS GARMENTS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider the violence with which the executioners stripped Jesus. His inner garments adhered to His torn flesh, and they dragged them off so roughly that the skin came with them. Compassionate your Savior thus cruelly treated, and say to Him:

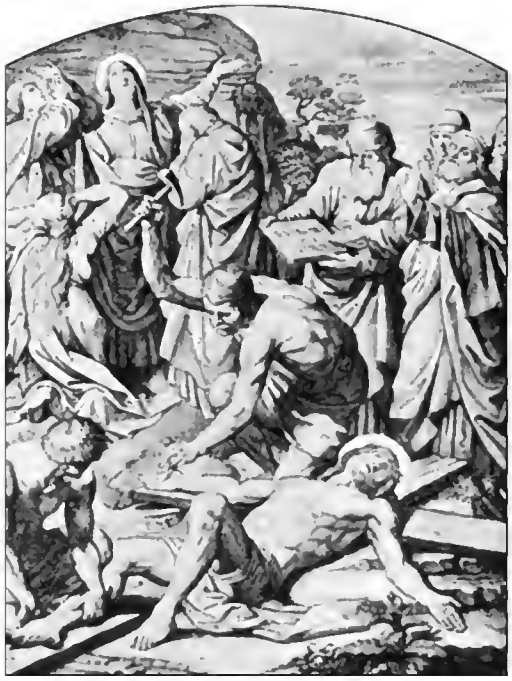
My innocent Jesus, by the merits of the torment Thou hast felt, help me to strip myself of all affection to things of earth, in order that I may place all my love in Thee, who art so worthy of my love. I love Thee, O Jesus, with my whole heart; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.



STATION 11: JESUS IS NAILED TO THE CROSS

Station 11

JESUS IS NAILED TO THE CROSS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how Jesus, after being thrown on the Cross extended His hands, and offered to His Eternal Father the sacrifice of His death for our salvation. These barbarians fastened Him with nails, and then, raising the Cross, allowed Him to die with anguish on this infamous gibbet.

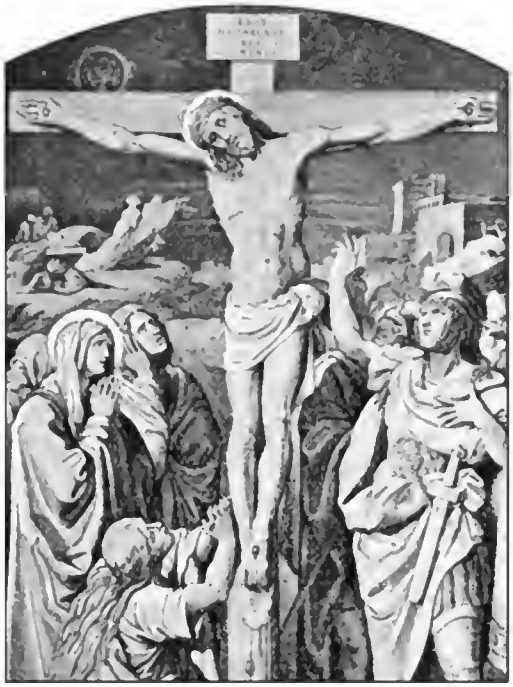
My Jesus! loaded with contempt, nail my heart to Thy feet, that it may ever remain there, to love Thee, and never quit Thee again. I love Thee more than myself; I repent of having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.



STATION 12: JESUS DIES ON THE CROSS

Station 12

JESUS DIES ON THE CROSS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how thy Jesus, after three hours' Agony on the Cross, consumed at length with anguish, abandons Himself to the weight of His body, bows His head, and dies.

O my dying Jesus, I kiss devoutly the Cross on which Thou didst die for love of me. I have merited by my sins to die a miserable death; but Thy death is my hope. Ah, by the merits of Thy death, give me grace to die, embracing Thy feet, and burning with love for Thee. I yield my soul into Thy hands. I love Thee with my whole heart; I repent of ever having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 13: JESUS IS TAKEN DOWN FROM THE CROSS

Station 13

JESUS IS TAKEN DOWN FROM THE CROSS

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how, after the death of our Lord, two of His disciples, Joseph and Nicodemus, took Him down from the Cross, and placed Him in the arms of His afflicted Mother, who received Him with unutterable tenderness, and pressed Him to her bosom.

O Mother of sorrow, for the love of this Son, accept me for thy servant, and pray to Him for me. And Thou, my Redeemer, since Thou hast died for me, permit me to love Thee; for I wish but Thee, and nothing more. I love Thee, my Jesus, and I repent of ever having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

STATION 14: JESUS IS PLACED IN THE TOMB

Station 14

JESUS IS PLACED IN THE TOMB

V. We adore Thee, O Christ, and we bless Thee.
R. Because by Thy holy Cross, Thou hast redeemed the world.

Consider how the disciples carried the body of Jesus to bury it, accompanied by His holy Mother, who arranged it in the sepulchre with her own hands. They then closed the tomb, and all withdrew.

Oh, my buried Jesus, I kiss the stone that encloses Thee. But Thou didst rise again the third day. I beseech Thee, by Thy resurrection, make me rise glorious with Thee at the last day, to be always united with Thee in heaven, to praise Thee and love Thee forever. I love Thee, and I repent of ever having offended Thee. Never permit me to offend Thee again. Grant that I may love Thee always; and then do with me what Thou wilt.

Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be.

Dear Jesus, Thou dost go to die
For very love of me:
Ah! let me bear Thee company;
I wish to die with Thee.

V. Have mercy on us, O Lord.

R. Have mercy on us.

ENDING

After this, say the Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be, five times, in honour of the Passion of Jesus Christ, to gain other indulgences granted those who recite them. Lastly, say one Our Father, Hail Mary and Glory Be, for the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff. Optional; Stabat Mater or Stabat Mater–Latin.

St Alphonsus Liguori, Pray for us! Amen.

PRAYERS

GLORY BE

Glory Be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit. As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

HAIL MARY

Hail Mary, Full of Grace, The Lord is with Thee. Blessed art Thou among women, and Blessed is the Fruit of Thy Womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and at the hour of death. Amen.

OUR FATHER

Our Father, Who art in Heaven, Hallowed be Thy Name. Thy Kingdom come, Thy Will be done, On earth as it is in Heaven. Give us this day Our daily bread, and Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Amen.

ACT OF CONTRITION

O my God, because You are so good. I am very sorry that I have sinned against You; and with the help of Your Grace, I will try not to sin again. Amen.

STABAT MATER

At the Cross her station keeping, stood the mournful Mother weeping, close to her Son to the last.
Through her heart, His sorrow sharing, all His bitter anguish bearing,
now at length the sword has passed.

O how sad and sore distressed was that Mother, highly blest, of the sole-begotten One.

Christ above in torment hangs, she beneath beholds the pangs of her dying glorious Son.

Is there one who would not weep, whelmed in miseries so deep,
Christ's dear Mother to behold?

Can the human heart refrain from partaking in her pain, in that Mother's pain untold?

For the sins of His own nation,
She saw Jesus wracked with torment,
All with scourges rent:

She beheld her tender Child,
Saw Him hang in desolation,
Till His spirit forth He sent.

O thou Mother! fount of love!
Touch my spirit from above,
make my heart with thine accord:

Make me feel as thou hast felt;
make my soul to glow and melt with the love of Christ my Lord.

Holy Mother! pierce me through, in my heart each wound renew of my Savior crucified:

Let me share with thee His pain, who for all my sins was slain, who for me in torments died.

Let me mingle tears with thee, mourning Him who mourned for me,
all the days that I may live:

By the Cross with thee to stay, there with thee to weep and pray, is all I ask of thee to give.

Virgin of all virgins blest!,
Listen to my fond request:
let me share thy grief divine;

Let me, to my latest breath, in my body bear the death of that dying Son of thine.

Wounded with His every wound, steep my soul till it hath swooned,
in His very Blood away;

Be to me, O Virgin, nigh, lest in flames I burn and die,
in His awful Judgment Day.

Christ, when Thou shalt call me hence,
by Thy Mother my defense,
by Thy Cross my victory;

While my body here decays,
may my soul Thy goodness praise,
Safe in Paradise with Thee.

STABAT MATER–LATIN

Stabat mater dolorosa juxta Crucem lacrimosa, dum pendebat Filius.

Cuius animam gementem, contristatam et dolentem pertransivit gladius.

O quam tristis et afflicta fuit illa benedicta, mater Unigeniti!

Quae moerebat et dolebat, pia Mater, dum videbat nati poenas inclyti.

Quis est homo qui non fleret, matrem Christi si videret in tanto supplicio?

Quis non posset contristari
Christi Matrem contemplari dolentem cum Filio?

Pro peccatis suae gentis vidit Iesum in tormentis, et flagellis subditum.

Vidit suum dulcem Natum moriendo desolatum, dum emisit spiritum.

Eia, Mater, fons amoris me sentire vim doloris fac, ut tecum lugeam.

Fac, ut ardeat cor meum in amando Christum Deum ut sibi complaceam.

Sancta Mater, istud agas, crucifixi fige plagas
cordi meo valide.

Tui Nati vulnerati, tam dignati pro me pati, poenas mecum divide.

Fac me tecum pie flere, crucifixo condolere,
donec ego vixero.

Juxta Crucem tecum stare, et me tibi sociare
in planctu desidero.

Virgo virginum praeclara, mihi iam non sis amara,
fac me tecum plangere.

Fac, ut portem Christi mortem, passionis fac consortem, et plagas recolere.

Fac me plagis vulnerari, fac me Cruce inebriari, et cruore Filii.

Flammis ne urar succensus, per te, Virgo, sim defensus in die iudicii.

Christe, cum sit hinc exire, da per Matrem me venire ad palmam victoriae.

Quando corpus morietur, fac, ut animae donetur paradisi gloria. Amen.

PREFACE

TO THE CENTENARY EDITION OF THE WORKS OF ST ALPHONSUS

The present volume is the first of a new and only complete edition in English of the ascetical and dogmatical works of St Alphonsus de Liguori. The works of the Saint, relating to Moral Theology and written by him in Latin, will remain untranslated. In regard to the arrangement of matter, this English edition is based on the French translation, from the Italian, published in twenty-seven volumes, of Fathers Leopold Dujardin and Jules Jacques, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. It will contain many of the explanatory notes with which their translation is enriched. These notes will enable the reader to understand more fully the writings of the holy Doctor. It was usual with the saintly author to insert in his works Latin Scripture texts and Latin quotations from the Fathers. This method, which has been adopted in the published German and French translations, is also followed in this new English edition. The Latin texts will, however, be given as foot-notes. The sacred poetry composed by St Alphonsus will be found interspersed through the different volumes of the ascetical works. The editor has availed himself of the few works already translated into English by the late Bishop Coffin, C.SS.R, and by others. But whatever he has used he has thoroughly revised and made to conform to the general plan of the present publication. Besides the table of contents, each volume will contain an alphabetical index. This new and complete edition bears the name of "The Centenary Edition" in commemoration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the death of St Alphonus, occurring in the year 1887.

In regard to the value and merits of the writings of St Alphonsus, the editor believes that it will prove interesting to insert here the sanctions and approbations conferred upon them by the sovereign Pontiffs.

The learned Pope Benedict XIV approved very highly of the writings of the Saint, and in a letter addressed to him in regard to his Moral Theology, expressed the belief that his work would prove most welcome and useful to the whole Christian world.

Clement XIV entertained the highest esteem for the Saint. This was the Pope at whose death St Alphonsus assisted in so wonderful a manner.

Pius VII wished to possess as relics the three fingers of the right hand with which the Saint had written his works and defended the honour of God, of the Blessed Virgin, and of our holy religion. He also confirmed the judgement pronounced, May 3rd, 1803, by the Sacred Congregation of Rites that in the printed as well as unprinted works of St Alphonus there is nothing that deserves censure. A second decree of the same Congregation, of the year 1815, met also with his approbation. In this decree we read these words: "The omnipotent word of God that calls the stars that they should shine in the firmament of the Church militant, has also called his Venerable Servant Alphonsus Liguori that he should shine by the light of apostolic virtues. He was obedient to the call, and like the sun that sends its rays everywhere, he has send forth rays of virtues, worthy of an apostle, when he contemned the honours of the world or showed by his voice and his writings, the road to justice to those who were wandering about in the dark night of this world, that they might be able to pass from the power of darkness into the light and the kingdom of God; or when he gave the best rules to his disciples whom he called member of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer; or when, as Bishop, he united fortitude to meekness, and adorned his crown with the ornaments of the other virtues like so many heavenly jewels. To adjudge to so great and illustrious a man the honour of the saints, may be regarded in these days a joyful event for the Church, because the faithful may learn there-from that though the times and years do indeed change and pass away, yet the Church of Christ cannot change nor perish; that the spirit of our holy Fathers has not become extinct; and that the Spouse of Christ never grows old, but amid the perishableness and changeableness of the years is ever blooming in continual youth and beauty. Thence, all those who have the care of souls, and all those who preach the word of God, may learn how very much of that which is noble and salutary in Alphonsus Mary de Liguori they may imitate."

The finest eulogy of St Alphonsus was, however, pronounced by Pius VII in his Bull of Beatification, September 6th, 1816. He says: "Alphonsus was in God's hands a sharp arrow which, discharged against vice, strikes now in one piece, now in another, in order to promote the honour of God and the salvation of souls. As a sharp arrow, heated by the fire of love, he has wounded the hearts of not a few priests, and so inflamed them that they also left all things and followed their Redeemer. Thus he established the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, whose priests have the special duty to preach to the people living scattered in the country. One cannot wonder enough how many enmities he has removed, how many wandering sinners he has led back to the right road and to Christian perfection, by word and example, and by his numerous writings. Besides, he was so devoted a client of the Mother of God, that it was always a pleasure to him to praise this sublime Mother and Virgin, and to write about her glories books filled with holy learning. (This is beautiful praise of his book The Glories of Mary.) Bowed down physically by age, labour and very grievous illness, yet mentally strong and ardent, he never ceased to speak and to write about heavenly things till his ninetieth year, when full of joy, he died a saintly death."

Pope Leo XII in a Brief dated February 19th, 1825, addressed to Signor Marietti of Turin, approving of his complete edition of the works of St Alphonsus, classes the saint among the number of pious and learned writers raised up by Divine Providence to stem the torrent of bad publications which at that time was rushing down on society, and says of him, "that he is pre-eminent for a most tender piety and devotion, and for a singular zeal with which in his writings he urges the frequentation of the Sacraments, and inculcates the love of Jesus Christ, and confidence in His merits and mercy, together with devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mother of God, and to the saints, which are indeed the surest bulwarks against every kind of demoralisation." And of Signor Marietti himself His Holiness says, "that in collecting and publishing the works of such a writer he had deserved well, not only of religion, but, if it did but know its own real good, of society in general."

Pope Pius VIII when as Cardinal Castiglione he held the office of Pœnitentiarius Major, exhibited on different occasions his great affection for St Alphonsus. For example, he congratulates the Bishop of Marseilles because he promoted among the faithful a veneration for the Saint, "who not only in our day has adorned the august episcopate with the lustre of his virtues, but has made it resplendent by a doctrine that is sound and according to God (sana ac secudum Deum), and who has written so many books in which, according to the laudable judgement (of the Holy See), nothing is contained worthy of censure." In another letter he expresses his joy that the veneration of St Alphonsus is extending more and more every day. For "St Liguori was conspicuous by the light of all the virtues that can be imitated by the clergy, and his writings are a pure fountain (fons purus), from which one may draw sacred science without endangering the piety of faith, as St Jerome expresses himself."

Gregory XVI of holy memory, loved to praise the profound learning and eminent sanctity of St Alphonsus. He placed his name in the ecclesiastical calendar, and extended his Mass and office to the universal Church. "He is resplendent," said the great Pope, "even among the brilliant lights that adorns the Catholic Church. It was under Pope Gregory XVI, that the decision was given by the Sacra Pœnitentiaria that, according to the words, Nihil censura dignum repertum est—there is nothing found worthy of censure,—the opinions of St Alphonsus may be followed in the pulpit as well as in the confessional, even if one has not maturely examined the reasons upon which the opinions are founded, provided only that one does not regard it as a reproach to those who follow the opinions of other approved authors. This decision induced the Cardinal Archbishop of Besançon, Rohan-Chabot, earnestly to exhort his clergy to adhere to the practice of St Alphonsus, in order that uniformity might be attained.

Pope Pius IX in a letter to the Rev. Fr Hugues, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, dated November 25th, 1846, is pleased to express his joy and consolation on hearing that that German edition of the works of St Alphonsus had met with so great success, "at a moment, too, when by the insidious devices of the enemies of religion so many pestilential books are in circulation on every side, to corrupt and deprave the minds and morals especially of those not on their guard against them." "Wherefore," His Holiness continues, "we greatly commend your pious undertaking, and we encourage you to continue with still greater diligence in endeavouring to spread the most wholesome writings of St Alphonsus every day more and more. To read them cannot but be of the greatest advantage, not only to Christian in general, but also to ecclesiastics, and to those especially who have the care and the direction of souls. For the works of that most holy and most learned man, written with an extraordinary tenderness of piety and devotion, breathe in every page a special love for Jesus Christ, and confidence in His merits and mercy; they inspire the highest devotion to the Virgin Mother of God and to the saints; they inflame men's hearts with the desire of frequenting the most holy Sacraments, and furnish a most copious supply of excellent admonitions, counsels and injunctions for procuring and carrying on the work of the salvation of souls."

It was Pope Pius IX who graciously responded to the petitions of many Cardinals, Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops and other dignitaries, by declaring St Alphonsus a Doctor of the Church—a distinction that had not been conferred on any ecclesiastical writer or theologians for six centuries. The following is a translation of the decree which placed the name of St Alphonsus in the category of the Doctors of the Church:

"Among those who have done and taught, and whom Our Lord Jesus Christ has declared should be great in the kingdom of heaven, is rightly counted St Alphonsus Maria de Liguori, Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, and Bishop of St Agatha of the Goths. He shone as a watch-light on its tower, giving examples of all virtues to those who follow Christ and are of the household of God. Already, because of the brightness of his light, he has been reckoned among the Saints, the domestics of God. But what he reduced to practise his holy life, he taught also in word and by writing. He stands distinguished for exposing and destroying the lurking-places of unbelievers and Jansenists, so widely spread about. And, over and beyond this, he has cleared up questions that were clouded; he has solved what was doubtful, making a safe path, through which the directors of Christian souls may tread with foot unhurt, between the involved opinions of theologians whether too loose or too rigorous.

"And besides this, he has signally cast light on the doctrines of the Immaculate Conception, and of the Infallibility of the Sovereign Pontiff teaching ex cathedra; and he strenuously taught these doctrines, which in our day have been defined as of faith.

"He has, finally, made clear dark passages of the Holy Scriptures, both in his ascetic writings, which are freighted with a celestial odour, and in a most salutary commentary, in which, for the nourishment of piety and the instruction of the soul, he has given expositions of the Psalms, as well as of the hymns recited in the Divine Office, for the benefit especially of those obliged to its recitation.

"Pius VII of holy memory, was greatly moved by the exceeding wisdom of Alphonsus, and spoke in his praise as follows: 'In the dark night of the world, he has shown by his voice and his writings the road of justice to the wandering, by which they may pass from the power of darkness to the light and the kingdom of God.'

"Nor were less remarkable words used by Pope Gregory XVI of holy memory, when he raised, by decretal letters, St Alphonsus to the honours of canonisation. Pope Gregory XVI said that there were in the writings of the Blessed Alphonsus 'a wonderful force, an abundance and variety of doctrine.' But in our days the 'nations declare his wisdom, and the Church shows forth his praise.' So that very many cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, almost all the prelates of the whole Catholic universe, the generals of religious orders, the theological faculties of the most celebrated universities, illustrious chapters of canons and learned men of every ecclesiastical body, have presented petitions to our Holy Father, Pius IX, Supreme Pontiff, in which they express their common desires that St Alphonsus Maria di Liguori may be adorned with the title and the honours of Doctor of the Church. His Holiness, graciously accepting these prayers, committed to the Congregation of Rites, according to custom in matters of this kind, the examining of so very grace a question. Consequently, in ordinary meetings held at the Vatican on the day below mentioned, hearing the Most Eminent and Reverend Cardinal Constantine Patrizi, Dean of the Sacred College, Prefect of the said Congregation, and reporter of the Cause; full attention having been given to the animadversions of the Rev. Fr D. Peter Minetti, Promoter of the Holy Faith, with the answers of the Promoter of the Cause; and also the opinions of the theologians not engaged in the Cause (pro veritate); and finally, all relating to the matter on the one side and the other having been most severely weighed, the Most Eminent and the Most Reverend Cardinals of the Sacred Congregation of Rites have judged by unanimous consent that it should be answered:

"To give counsel to His Holiness in favour of the granting or declaration, and extension to the whole Church, of the title of Doctor, in honour of St Alphonsus Maria di Liguori, with special Office and Mass, the Credo; the antiphon O Doctor at the Magnificat of the First and Second Vespers; the Sapientiam (from the Common of Doctors) for the lessons of the First Nocturn; and the In medio Ecclesiæ, for the Responsory of the Eighth Lesson. Dated March 2nd, 1871.

"Afterwards, a faithful account having been made of all and singular of the above, to our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, by the undersigned Secretary of the said Congregation, His Holiness approved and confirmed the rescript, and of his supreme authority ordered that a General Decree, urbis et orbis should be sent forth, on the twenty-third day of the same month and year.

"CONSTANTINE, CARD. PATRIZI,

"Bishop of Ostia and Villetri, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Rites.

The editor wishes to add one more testimony in regard to the value and the merits of the works of St Alphonsus. In a letter of His Holiness Pope Leo XIII addressed to Fathers Dujardin and Jules Jacques, priests of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, we read as follows:

"Beloved Sons: Health and Apostolic Benediction:

"Although the writings of the holy Doctor Alphonsus Maria de Liguori have already been spread throughout the world, not without very great profit to the Christian religion, yet it is desirable that they be propagated more and more, and be found in the hands of all. For he very well knew how to adapt Catholic truths to the comprehension of all, to provide for the moral direction of souls, to excite in a wonderful way true piety in the hearts of all, and 'to show to those who wander in the dark night of the world the road by which they may pass from the power of darkness to the light and to the kingdom of God' (Decree of December 21st, 1815). And assuredly he has protected by the most solid reasons divine revelation against the attacks of the Deists; he has defended with zeal the truths of our faith; he has very efficaciously maintained the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God; he has fought very energetically in behalf of the primacy and infallible authority of the Roman Pontiff; with as much learning as piety he has thrown light upon the designs of Divine Providence in the work of saving man through Jesus Christ; he has written commentaries on the Psalms and Canticles in a manner best adapted to nourish the piety of the clergy; he has shown the glory of the Church in the victories of the martyrs; in a history of heresies and a dogmatical work he has vigorously refuted all heresies, but has chiefly overthrown Jansenism and Febronianism, the errors of which had already spread, carrying with them the germs of so many monstrous opinions that to-day shake the foundations of religions and civil society, and which he himself attacked with such perspicacity that most of the propositions condemned in the Syllabus a century after are expressly refuted by his writings. 'One might even truly say that there is no error in our time that has not been refuted, at least for the greater part, by St Alphonsus' (Apostolic Brief, July 7th, 1871). And without speaking of the Moral Theology, which is everywhere held in the highest esteem, and which offers to directors of souls a perfectly sure rule of conduct, he has by means of numerous learned ascetical works enkindled, as it were, by burning coals, nourished and augmented languishing love principally toward Our Lord Jesus Christ and His sweetest Mother, for whom, to the great advantage of the people, he knew how to inflame the coldest hearts. And, 'what is above all worthy of remark, though he wrote so many things, it must be acknowledged that, after an attentive examination, these writings may be read by the faithful without the least danger to their faith' (Bull of May 26th , 1839, n. 7). We therefore congratulate you, Beloved Sons, that you have translated into French all the dogmatical and ascetical writings that are published, either in Latin or in Italian, by your very holy and very learned Father; first, because the French language, being known nearly to all peoples, can extend more the fruits of the works of the eminent Doctor; and secondly; because it is to you in preference to others that has been entrusted this difficult task—you, who otherwise should have written about the character, the learning and the holiness of these same writings, and who, as sons, could more easily and more perfectly acquire the spirit of your Father. Moreover, we congratulate ourselves because of your undertaking in this, that the holy author often glories in his writings that he has followed the doctrine of the Angel of the schools. Such deference of the new Doctor of the Church in regard to the latter is a new eulogy and a new glory of the doctrine of St Thomas. Hence follows a recommendation of great weight in favour of the restoration of Christian philosophy, which, by our recent encyclical letter, we have so strenuously urged that it should be carried into effect according to the spirit of the angelic Doctor. We therefore bespeak for this new publication of the works of St Alphonsus a very great success, corresponding to our and your desires; and in this expectation as an omen of celestial favour, we grant most affectionately, Beloved Sons, to you and to the whole Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, the Apostolic Benediction as a mark of our paternal benevolence.

"Given at Rome, at St Peter's, August 8th, 1879, the second year of our Pontificate.

"LEO XIII, POPE."

It was towards the year 1758, at the age of sixty-two, after more than thirty years of apostolic labour, that St Alphonsus published this excellent work, which has converted and sanctified so many souls.

In the order of the ascetical works the PREPRATAION FOR DEATH is put, not without reason, in the first place. It is death that predominates in some way over our life on earth; it should also predominate over our thoughts and our whole conduct. Man, the Christian, begins to live well only when he prepares himself to die well. This method is precisely that which is followed in the exercises of spiritual retreats and of the missions during which we begin to meditate on the Last Things of man, in order to enter at first what we call the Purgative Way. This is al so the order that our Author has followed in the Considerations that compose the present work.—ED.

THE AUTHOR'S PROTEST

In obedience to the decrees of Urban VIII, I declare that I have no intention of attributing any other than a purely human authority to the miracles, revelations, favours, and particular cases recorded in this book; and the same as regards the titles of SAINTS and BLESSED, applied to servants of God not yet canonised, except in those cases which have been confirmed by the Holy Roman Catholic Church and the Apostolic See, of which I declare myself to be an obedient son; and therefore I submit myself and all that I have written in this book to her judgement.

THIS SHOULD BE READ

Some persons asked me to write a book on the Eternal Maxims, for the use of those who desire to establish themselves in virtue and to advance in a spiritual life. Others requested me to prepare a collection of matter for the sermons of the missions and of the spiritual exercises. Not to multiply books, labour, and expense, I resolved to compose the work in the present form, with the hope that it might answer both purposes. To render it useful as a book of meditations for seculars, I have divided the considerations into three points. Each point will serve for one meditation, and therefore I have annexed to each point affections and prayers. I entreat my readers not to grow weary, if, in those prayers, they always find petitions for the grace of perseverance and of divine love. For us, these are the two graces most necessary for the attainment of eternal salvation.

The grace of divine love is, according to St Francis de Sales, the grace which contains in itself all graces; because the virtue of charity toward God brings with it all other virtues. Now all good things come to me together with her.[1] He who loves God is humble, chaste, obedient, and mortified; in a word, he possesses all virtues. "Love," says St Augustine, "and do what you wish,"[2] They who love God labour to avoid whatever is offensive to Him, and seek to please Him in all things.

The grace of perseverance is that grace by which we obtain the eternal crown. St Bernard says that Paradise is promised to those who begin a good life, but is only given to those who persevere. "To beginners a reward is promised, but to him who persevere it is given.[3] But this gift of perseverance is, as the Fathers teach, given only to those who ask it. Hence St Thomas asserts that to enter heaven continual prayer is necessary.[4] And our Redeemer said: We ought always to pray, and not to faint.[5] It is because they do not pray for the gift of perseverance that so many miserable sinners, after having obtained pardon, lose again the grace of God. Their sins are forgiven; but because they afterward neglect to ask of God the grace of perseverance, particularly in the time of temptation, they relapse into sin. And although the grace of final perseverance is altogether gratuitous and cannot be merited by good works; still Suarez teaches that it can be infallibly obtained by prayer; and according to St Augustine, it may be merited by humble supplication.[6]

This necessity of prayer I have demonstrated at length in another little work, entitled The Great Means of Prayer. This book, though, small, has cost me a great deal of labour. I consider it to be of extreme utility to all sorts of persons; and I unhesitatingly assert that, among all spiritual treatises, there is none, and there can be none, more necessary than that which treats on prayer as a means of obtaining eternal salvation.

To render these considerations useful to preachers who have but few books or little time for reading, I have furnished these considerations with texts of Scripture and passages from the Fathers, which are short, but strong and animated, as they ought to be in sermons. The three points of each consideration will supply matter for one sermon. I have endeavoured to collect from many authors the sentiments which appeared to me best suited to move the will, and have inserted several of them expressed briefly, that the reader may select and extend at pleasure those that please him most. May all tend to the glory of God!

I pray my reader to recommend me to Jesus Christ, whether I am living or dead; and I promise to do the same for all those who perform this act of charity toward me. Live Jesus, our love, and Mary, our hope!

PORTRAIT OF A MAN WHO HAS RECENTLY GONE INTO THE OTHER WORLD

"Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."—Gen.iii.19.

FIRST POINT

THE BODY ON THE DEATH-BED

CONSIDER that you are dust, and that you shall return to dust. A day will come when you shall die, and rot in a grave, where worms shall be your covering.[7] The same lot awaits all, the nobleman and the peasant, the prince and the vassal. The moment the soul leaves the body, it shall go to eternity, and the body shall return to dust. Thou shalt send forth their breadth, and they shall fail and shall return to their dust.[8]

Imagine that you behold a person who has just expired. Look at that body still laid on the bed, the head fallen on the chest, the hair in disorder, and still bathed in the sweat of death, the eyes sunk, and cheeks hollow, the face the colour of ashes, the lips and tongue like iron, the body cold and heavy. The beholders grow pale and tremble. How many, at the sight of a deceased relative or friend, have changed their life and retired from the world!

Still greater horror will be excited when the body begins to putrefy. Twenty-four hours have not elapsed since the death of that young man, and his body has already begun to exhale an offensive smell. The windows must be opened; a great quantity of incense must be used; and, to prevent the communication of disease to the entire family, he must soon be transferred to the church, and buried in the earth. "If he ahs been one of the rich or nobles of the earth, his body shall send forth a more intolerable stench,"[9] says St Ambrose.

Behold the end of that proud, of that lewd and voluptuous man! Before death desired and sought after in conversations, now become an object of horror and disgust to all who behold him. His relatives are in haste to remove him from the house; they hire men to shut him up in a coffin, to carry him to the church-yard and throw him into a grace. During life, the fame of his wit, of his politeness, of the elegance of his manners, and of his facetiousness, was spread abroad; but after death he is soon forgotten. Their memory hath perished with a noise.[10]

On hearing the news of his death, some say, He was an honour to his family;' others say, He has provided well for his children. Some regret his death because he had done them some service during life; others rejoice as it because it is an advantage tot hem. But in a little time no one speaks of him. In the beginning, his nearest relatives feel unwilling to hear his name, through fear of renewing their grief. In the visits of condolence, all are careful to make no mention of the deceased; and should any happen to speak of him, the relatives exclaim, For God's sake, do not mention his name!

Consider that as you have acted on the occasion of the death of friends and relatives, so others will act on occasion of your death. The living takes part in the scene. They occupy the possession and offices of the deceased; but the dead are no longer remembered—their name is scarcely ever mentioned. In the beginning, their relatives are afflicted for a short time; but they will soon be consoled by the share of the property of the deceased which falls to them.

Thus in a short time your death will be rather a source of joy; and in the very room in which you have breathed forth your soul, and in which you have been judged by Jesus Christ, others will dance, and eat and play and laugh as before. And where will your soul then be?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O Jesus, my Redeemer! I thank Thee for not having taken me out of life when I was Thy enemy. For how many years have I deserved to be in hell! Had I died on such a day or such a night, what should be my lot for all eternity? Lord, I thank Thee; I accept my death in satisfaction for my sins, and I accept it in the manner in which Thou shalt be pleased to send it. But since Thou hast borne with me until now, wait for me a little longer. Suffer me, therefore, that I may lament my sorrow a little![11] Give me time to bewail, before Thou judgest me, the offences I have offered to Thee. I will no longer resist Thy calls. Who knows but the words which I have just read may be the last call for me? I acknowledge that I am unworthy of mercy. Thou hast so often pardoned me, and I have ungratefuly offended Thee again. A contrite and humble heart, O God! Thou will not despise.[12] Since, O Lord, Thou knowest not how to despise a contrite and humble heart, behold the penitent traitor who has recourse to Thee. For Thy mercy's sake, cast me not away from Thy face. Thou hast said: Him that cometh to me I will not cast out.[13] It is true that I have outraged Thee more than others, because I have been favoured more than others with Thy lights and graces. But the blood Thou hast shed for me encourages me, and offers me pardon if I repent. My sovereign Good! I am sorry with my whole soul for having insulted Thee. Pardon me, and give me grace to love Thee for the future. I have offended Thee sufficiently. The remainder of my life I wish to spend, not in offending Thee, but only in weeping unceasingly over the insults I have offered to Thee, and in loving with my whole heart a God worthy of infinite love. O Mary, my hope! Pray to Jesus for me.

SECOND POINT

THE BODY IN THE GRAVE

But, Christian soul, that you may see more clearly what you are, follow the advice of St Chrysostom: "Go to the grave; contemplate dust, ashes, worms; and sigh."[14] Behold how that corpse first turned yellow, and then black. Afterwards, the entire body is covered with a white, disgusting mould; then comes forth a clammy, fetid slime, which flows to the earth. In that putrid mass is generated a great multitude of worms, which feed on the flesh. Rats come to feast on the body; some attack it on the outside; others enter into the mouth and bowels. The cheeks, the lips, and the hair fall off. The ribs are first laid bare, and then the arms and legs. The worms, after having consumed all the flesh, devour one another; and, in the end, nothing remains but a fetid skeleton, which in the course of time falls to pieces; the bones separate from one another and the head separates from the body. They became like the chaff of a summer's threshing floor, and they were carried away by the wi nd.[15] Behold what man is; he is a little dust on the threshing-floor, which is blown away by the wind.

Behold a young nobleman, who was called the life and soul of conversation: where is he now? Enter into his apartment: he is no longer there. If you look for his bed, his robes, or his armour, you will find that they have passed into the hands of others. If you wish to see him, turn to the grave, where he is changed into corruption and withered bones. O God! That body, pampered with so many delicacies, clothed with so much pomp, and attended by so many servants, to what is it now reduced? O ye saints! Who knew how to mortify your bodies for the love of that God whom alone you loved on this earth, you well understood the end of all human greatness, of all earthly delights; now your bones are honoured as sacred relics, and preserved in shrines of gold, and your souls are happy in the enjoyment of God, expecting the last day, on which your bodies shall be made partners of your glory, as they have been partakers of your cross in this life. The true love for the body consists in treating it here with rigour and contempt, that it may be happy for eternity; and in refusing it all pleasures, which might make it miserable forever.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold, then, O my God! To what my body, by which I have so much offended Thee, must be reduced! to worms and rottenness. This does not afflict me; on the contrary, I rejoice that this flesh of mine, which has made me lose Thee, my Sovereign Good, will one day rot and be consumed. What grieves me is, that, to indulge in these wretch pleasures, I have given so much displeasure to Thee. But I will not despair of Thy mercy. Thou hast waited for me in order to pardon me. The Lord waiteth, that He may have mercy on you.[16] Thou will forgive me if I repent. O Infinite Goodness, I repent with my whole heart of having despised Thee. I will say with St Catherine of Genoa, "My Jesus, no more sins! No more sins!" I will no longer abuse Thy patience. O my crucified Love, I will not wait till the confessor places the crucifix in my hands at the hour of death. From this moment I embrace Thee; from this moment I recommend my soul to Thee. Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit.[17] My soul has been so many years in the world and has not loved Thee. Give me light and strength to love Thee at the hour of death. From this moment I love Thee; I embrace Thee, and unite myself to Thee; and I promise never more to depart from Thee. O most holy Virgin! Bind me to Jesus Christ, and obtain for me the grace never to lose him more.

THIRD POINT

LET US LABOUR TO SAVE OUR SOULS

My brother, in this picture of death behold yourself and what you must one day become. "Remember that dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Consider that in a few years, and perhaps in a few months or days, you will become rottenness and worms. By this thought Job became a saint. I have said to rottenness: Thou art my father: to worms, my mother, and my sister.[18]

All must end; and if, after death, you lose your soul all will be lost for you. Consider yourself already dead, says St Laurence Justinian, since you know that you must necessarily die.[19] If you were already dead, what would you not desire to have done? Now that you have life, reflect that you will one day be among the dead. St Bonaventure says, that, to guide the vessel safely, the pilot must remain at the helm; and in like manner, to lead a good life, a man should always imagine himself at the hour of death. Says St Bernard, "Look to the sins of your youth, and be covered with shame."[20] "Remember the sins of manhood and weep."[21] Look to the present disorders of your life; tremble,[22] and hasten to apply a remedy.

When St Camillus de Lellis saw the graves of the dead, he said within himself: If these return to life, what would they not do for eternal glory? And what do I do for my soul, who have time? This the saint said through humility. But my brother, you, perhaps, have reason to fear that you are the fruitless fig-tree of which the Lord said: Behold, for these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree and I find none.[23] You have been in this world for more three years; what fruit have you produced? Remember, says St Bernard, that the Lord seeks not only flowers, but fruits; that is, not only good desires and resolutions, but also holy works. Learn then to profit of the time which God in his mercy gives you: do not wait until you desire time to do good, when time shall be no more. Do not wait till you are told, Time shall be no longer; depart;[24] the time for leaving this world has arrived; what is done, is done.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold me, O my God! I am that tree which deserved for so many years to hear from Thee, Cut it down—why cumbereth it the ground?[25] Yes; for so many years during which I have been in the world, I have brought forth no other fruit than the briers and thorns of sins. But O Lord! Thou dost not wish that I despair. Thou hast said to all, that he who seeks Thee shall find Thee. Seek and you shall find.[26] I seek Thee, O my God! And wish for Thy grace. For all the offences I have offered to Thee I am sorry with my whole heart; I would wish to die of sorrow for them. Hitherto I have fled from Thee; but now I prefer Thy friendship to the possession of all the kingdoms of the earth. I will no longer resist Thy invitations. Dost Thou wish me to be all Thine? I give Thee my whole being without reserve. Thou gavest Thyself entirely to me on the Cross. I give myself entirely to Thee.

Thou hast said: If you shall ask me anything in my name, that I will do.[27] My Jesus, trusting in this great promise, I ask, in They name and through Thy merits Thy grace and Thy love. Grant that Thy grace and Thy holy love may abound in my soul, in which sin has abounded. I thank Thee for having given me grace to make this petition by inspiring the prayer, Thou showest that Thou dost intend to hear t. hear me, O my Jesus; give me a great love for Thee; give me a great desire to please Thee, and give me strength to do Thy will. O Mary, my great advocate! Do thou also listen to my cry and pray to Jesus for me.

WITH DEATH ALL ENDS

"An end is come, the end is come."—Ezek.vii.6.

FIRST POINT

DEATH DEPRIVES US OF EVERYTHING

By worldlings they only are esteemed happy who enjoy the pleasures, the riches, and the pomps of this world; but death puts an end to all these earthly goods. For what is your life? It is a vapour which appeareth for a little while.[28] The vapours exhaled from the earth, when raised in the air and clothed with light by the sun, make a splendid appearance; but how long does their splendour last? It vanishes before the first blast of the wind. Behold that nobleman: to-day he is dead, despised, reviled, and trampled upon. At death we must leave all things. The brother of that great servant of God, Thomas à Kempis, took delight in speaking of a beautiful house which he had built for himself: a friend told him that it had one great defect. "What is it?" said he. "It is," answered the other, "that you have made a door in it." "What," rejoined the brother of à Kempis, "is a door a defect?" "Yes," answered the friend, "for through this door you must be one day carried dead, and must leave the house and all things."

Death, in fine, strips man of all the goods of this world. Oh, what a spectacle to behold a prince banished from his palace, never more to return to it, and to see others take possession of his furniture, of his money, and of all his other goods! The servants leave him in the grave, with a garment scarcely sufficient to cover his body. There is no longer any one to esteem or flatter him, no longer any one to attend to his commands. Saladin, who had acquired many kingdoms in Asia, gave directions at death, that when his body should be carried to the place of burial a person should go before, holding his winding sheet suspended from a pole, and crying aloud: "This is all that Saladin brings with him to the grave."

When the body of the prince is laid in the grace, his flesh drop off; and behold, his skeleton can no longer be distinguished from others. "Contemplate," St Basil says, "the sepulchres of the dead, and see if you can distinguish who has been a servant, and who has been a master."[29] Diogenes was one day seen by Alexander the Great seeking with great anxiety for something among the bones of the dead. Alexander asked him what he was in search of. "I am looking," replied Diogeners, "for the head of Philip your father. I am not able to distinguish it: if you can find it, show it to me." "Men," says Seneca, "are born unequal; but after death all are equal."[30] And Horace says that death brings down the sceptre to the level of the spade.[31] In a word, when death comes, the end comes; all ends, we leave all things; and of all that we possess in this world, we bring nothing to the grave.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My Lord! Since Thou givest me light to know that whatever the world esteems is smoke and folly, grant me strength to detach my heart from earthly goods, before death separates me from them. Miserable that I have been! How often, for the miserable pleasures and goods of this earth, have I offended and lost Thee, who art an infinite good! O my Jesus! My heavenly physician, cast Thine eyes on my poor soul, look at the many wounds which I have inflicted on it by my sins, and have pity on me. If Thou wishest Thou canst make me clean.[32] I know that Thou art able and willing to heal me; but in order to heal me, Thou wishest me to repent of the injuries which I have committed against Thee. I am sorry for them from the bottom of my heart. Heal me, then, now that it is in Thy power to heal me. Heal my soul, for I have sinned against Thee.[33] I have forgotten Thee; but Thou hast not forgotten me; and now Thou makest me feel that Thou wilt even forget the injuries I have done Thee, if I detest them. "But if the wicked do penance. . . . .I will not remember all his iniquities."—*Ezek.*xviii.21. Behold, I detest my sins, I hate them above all things. Forget, then, O my Redeemer, all the displeasures I have given Thee. For the future I will lose all things, even life, rather than forfeit Thy grace. And what can all the goods of this earth profit me without Thy grace?

Ah, assist me! Thou knowest my weakness. Hell will not cease to tempt me: it already prepares a thousand attacks to make me again its slave. No, my Jesus, do not abandon me, I wish to be henceforth the slave of Thy love. Thou art my only Lord; Thou hast created and redeemed me; Thou hast loved me more than all others; Thou alone hast merited my love: Thou alone do I wish to love.

SECOND POINT

GLORY AND POWER ON THE DEATH-BED

At the hour of death, Philip II, King of Spain, called his son, and throwing off his royal robe, uncovered his breast, which had been eaten away by worms, and said to him: "Prince, behold now how we die! See how all the grandeur of this world ends!" Theodoret has truly said that death fears not riches, nor satellites, nor sovereign and that from princes as well as vassals rottenness and corruption flow.[34]

Thus the dead, though they be princes, bring nothing with them to the grave; all their glory remains on the bed on which they expire. When he shall die, he shall take nothing away, nor shall his glory descent with him.[35]

St Antonine relates, that after the death of Alexander the Great a certain philosopher exclaimed: "Behold! The man who yesterday trampled on the earth is now buried in the earth. Yesterday the whole earth was not sufficient for him, and now he is content with seven palms. Yesterday he led his armies through the earth, and now he is carried by a few porters to the grave." But it is better to listen to the words of God. Why, says the Holy Ghosts, is earth and ashes proud?[36]—O man! Do you not see that you are dust and ashes? Why are you proud? Why do you spend so many thoughts and so many years of life in seeking worldly greatness? Death will come; and then all your greatness and all your projects will be at an end. In that day, says David, all their thoughts shall perish.[37]

Oh! How much more happy was the death of St Paul, the Hermit, who lived sixty years shut up in a cave, than the death of Nero the Emperor of Rome! How much more happy was the death of St Felix, a Capuchin, lay-brother, than that of Henry the Eighth, who lived in the midst of royal magnificence, but at the same time at enmity with God! But we must remember that, to secure a happy death, the saints have abandoned all things; they have left their country; they have renounced the delights and the hopes which the world held out to them, and have embraced a life of poverty and contempt. But how can worldlings, living in the midst of sins, in the midst of earthly pleasures and dangerous occasions, expect a happy death? God warns sinners that at death they shall seek and shall not find Him.[38] He tells us that the hour of death shall be the time, not of mercy but of vengeance.[39] I will repay them in due time. Reason tells us the same; for, at death, men of the world shall find their understanding weak and darkened, and their heart hardened by the bad habits which they have contracted. Their temptations will then be more violent; how can they resist at death who were almost always accustomed to yield to temptations during life, and to be conquered by them? To change, their hearts a most powerful grace would be then necessary. But is god obliged to give them such a grace? Have they merited such a grace by the scandalous and disorderly life which they have led? And on that last hour depends their happiness or misery for eternity. How is it possible that he who reflects on this, and believes the truths of faith, does not leave all to give himself to God, who will judge us all according to our works?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah Lord! How many nights have I slept in enmity with Thee? O God! in what a miserable state was my soul during that time. It was hated by Thee, and wished to be hated by Thee. I was condemned to hell; there was nothing wanting but the execution of the sentence. But Thou, my God hast never ceased to seek after me, and to invite me to pardon. But, who can assure me that Thou hast pardoned me? Must I, O my Jesus! Live in this uncertainty till Thou judgest me? But the sorrow which I feel for having offended Thee, my desire to love Thee, and still more Thy Passion, O my beloved Redeemer, make me hope that Thy grace dwells in my soul. I am sorry for having offended Thee, O Sovereign Good, and I love Thee above all things. I resolve to forfeit everything rather than lose Thy grace and Thy love. Thou wishest that the heart which seeks Thee should be full of joy. Let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord.[40] Lord, I detest all the injuries I have offered to Thee. Give me courage and confidence; do not upbraid me with my ingratitude; for I myself know and detest it. Thou hast said that Thou wilt not the death of a sinner, but that he be converted and live.[41] Yes, my God, I leave all things and turn to Thee. I seek Thee. I desire Thee, I love Thee above all things. Give me Thy love; I ask nothing else. O Mary, thou, after Jesus, art my hope; obtain for me holy perseverance.

THIRD POINT

LET US HASTEN TO GIVE OURSELVES TO GOD

David calls the happiness of this life a dream of one who awakes from sleep.[42] In explaining these words, a certain author says: The goods of this world appear great, but they are nothing: like a dream, which lasts but a little, and afterwards vanishes, they are enjoyed but a short time.[43] The thought, that with death all ends, made St Francis Borgia resolve to give himself entirely to God. The saint was obliged to accompany the dead body of the Empress Isabella to Grenada. When the coffin was opened, her appearance was so horrible and the smell so intolerable that all ran away. But St Francis remained to contemplate in the dead body of his sovereign the vanity of the world; and looking at it, he exclaimed: "Are you then my empress? Are you the queen before whom so many bent their knee in reverential awe? O Isabella, where is your majesty, your beauty gone? Thus then," he said within himself, "end the greatness and the crowns of this world. I will, therefore, henceforth serve a master who can never die." From that moment he consecrated himself to the love of Jesus crucified; and he made a vow to become a religious, should his wife die before him. This vow he afterwards fulfilled by entering into the Society of Jesus.

Justly then has a person who was undeceived written on a skull these words: "Cogitanti vilescunt omnia." To him who reflects on death, everything in this world appears contemptible; he cannot love the earth. And why are there so many unhappy lovers of this world? It is because they do not think of death. O ye sons of men, how long will you be dull of heart? Why do you love vanity, and seek after lying?[44] Miserable children of Adam, says the Holy Ghost, why do you not chase away from your heart so many earthly affections, which make you love vanity and lies? What has happened to your forefathers must befall you. They have dwelt in the same palace which you inhabit, and have slept in your very bed; but now they are no more. Such, too, will be your lot.

My brother, give yourself to God before death comes you. Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it earnestly.[45] What you can do to-day, defer not till tomorrow; for a day once passed never returns, and tomorrow death may come, and prevent you from ever more being able to do good. Detach yourself instantly from everything which removes, or can remove, you from God. Let us instantly renounce in affection the goods of this earth, before death strips us of them by force. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.[46] Happy they who at death are already dead to all attachment to this world. They fear not, but desire death, and embrace it with joy; for, instead of separating them from the good which they love, it unites them to the Supreme Good, who is the sole object of their affections, and who will render them happy for eternity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My dear Redeemer, I thank Thee for having waited for me. What should have become of me had I died when I was at a distance from Thee? May Thy mercy and patience which I have experienced for so many years, be forever blessed! I thank Thee for the light and grace with which Thou dost now assist me. I did not then love Thee, and I cared but little to be loved by Thee. I now love Thee with my whole heart, and nothing grieves me so much at the thought of having displeased so good a God. This sorrow tortures my soul; but it is a sweet torment, because it gives me confidence that Thou hast already pardoned me. O my sweet Saviour, would that I had died a thousand times before I sinned against Thee! I tremble lest I should hereafter offend Thee again. Ah! Make me die the most painful of all deaths, rather than permit me evermore to lose Thy grace/ I have been once the slave of hell; but now I am Thy servant, O God of my soul. Thou hast said that Thou lovest those who love Thee.[47] I love Thee: then I am Thine, and Thou art mine. I may lose Thee at some future time; but the grace which I ask of Thee is, to take me out of life rather than suffer me ever to lose Thee again. Unasked, Thou hast bestowed upon me so many graces; I cannot now fear that Thou wilt not hear my prayer for the grace which I now implore. Do not permit me ever to lose Thee. Give me Thy love and I desire nothing more. Mary, my hope! Intercede for me.

Consideration III

SHORTNESS OF LIFE

"What is your life? It is a vapour, which appeareth for a little while."—James, iv.15.

FIRST POINT

DEATH COMES QUICKLY

WHAT is your life? It is like a vapour, which is dissipated by a blast of wind, and is seen no more. All know that they must die; but the delusion of many is, that they imagine death as far off as if it were never to arrive. But Job tells us that the life of man is short. Man born of a woman, living for a short time. . . . who cometh forth like a flower, and is destroyed.[48] This truth the Lord commanded Isaias to preach to the people. Cry . . . All flesh is grass. . . . Indeed, the people is grass. The grass is withered, and the flower is fallen.[49] The life of man is like the life of a blade of grass; death comes, the grass is dried up: behold, life ends, and the flower of all greatness and of all worldly goods falls off.

My days, says Job, have been swifter than a post.[50] Death runs to meet us more swiftly than a post and we at every moment run towards death. Every step, every breath brings us nearer to our end. "What I write," says St Jerome, "is so much taken away from life."[51] "During the time I write, I draw near to death." We all die, and like the waters that return no more, we fall into the earth. Behold how the stream flows to the sea, and the passing waters never return! Thus, my brother, your days pass by, and you approach death. Pleasures, amusements, pomps, praises, and acclamations pass away; and what remains? And only the grave remaineth for me.[52] We shall be thrown into a grave, and there we shall remain to rot, stripped of all things. At the hour of death the remembrance of the delights enjoyed, and of all the honours acquired in this life, will serve only to increase our pain and our diffidence of obtaining eternal salvation. Then the miserable worldling will say: "My house, my gardens, my fashionable furniture, my pictures, my garments, will in a little time be no longer mine, 'and only the grave remaineth for me.'"

Ah! At that hour all earthly goods are viewed only with pain by those who have had an attachment for them. And this pain will serve only to increase the danger of their eternal salvation; for we see by experience, that persons attached to the world wish at death to speak only of their sickness, of the physicians to be called to attend then, and of the remedies which may restore their health. When any one speaks of the state of the soul, they soon grow weary, and beg to be allowed repose. They complain of headache, and say that it pains them to hear any one speak. And if they sometimes answer, they are confused, and know not what to say. It often happens that the confessor gives them absolution, not because he knows that they are disposed for the sacrament, but because it is dangerous to defer it. Such is the death of those who think but little of death.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God, and Lord of infinite majesty! I am ashamed to appear before Thee. How often have I dishonoured Thee by preferring to Thy grace a sordid pleasure, a little dust, the indulgence of anger, caprice, or vanity! I adore and kiss, O my Redeemer, Thy holy wounds, which I have inflicted by my sins; but through these wounds I hope for pardon and salvation. Make me, O my Jesus! Understand the great injury I have done Thee in leaving Thee, the fountain of every good, to drink putrid and poisoned waters. Of all the offences I have given Thee nothing now remains but pain, remorse of conscience and fruits for hell. Father, I am not worthy to be called Thy child.[53] My Father! do not cast me off. It is true that I no longer merit the grace which would make me Thy child; but Thou hast died to pardon me. Thou hast said: Turn ye to me,. . . . and I will turn to you.[54] I give up all that gratifies me, I renounce all the pleasures that the world can give me, and I turn to Thee. Pardon me for the sake of the blood which has been shed for me; I repent with my whole heart of all the insults I have offered to Thee. I repent, and I love Thee above all things. I am not worthy to love Thee; but Thou dost not refuse the love of a heart that has once despised Thee. Thou didst purposely abstain from taking me out of life when I was in sin, that I might love Thee. I wish to love Thee during the remainder of my life, and I wish to love nothing but Thee. Assist me; give me holy perseverance, and Thy holy love. Mary, my refuge! Recommend me to Jesus Christ.

SECOND POINT

THE LIGHTED CANDLE AT DEATH

King Ezechias said with tears: My life is cut off as by a weaver; while I was yet beginning, he cut me off.[55] Oh, how many have been overtaken and cut off by death, while they were executing and arranging worldly projects devised with so much labour! By the light of the last candle, all things in this world, applause, diversions, pomps, and greatness vanish. Great secret of death! It makes us see what the lovers of this world do not see. The most princely fortunes, the most exalted dignities, and the most superb triumphs lose all their splendour when viewed from the bed of death. The ideas that we have formed of certain false happiness are then changed into indignation against our own folly. The black and gloomy shade of death then covers and obscures every dignity, even that of kings and princes.

At present, our passions make the goods of this earth appear different from what they are in reality. Death takes off the veil, and makes them appear what they really are—smoke, dirt, vanity and wretchedness. O God! Of what use are riches, possessions, or kingdoms at death, when nothing remains but a wooden coffin, and a simple garment barely sufficient to cover the body? Of what use are the honours, when they all end in a funeral possession and pompous obsequies, which will be unprofitable to the soul if it be in hell? Of what use is beauty, when after death nothing remains but worms, stench, and horror, and in the end a little fetid dust?

He hath made me, says Job, as it were a byword of the people, and an example before them.[56] The rich man, the captain, the minister of state dies: his death is the general topic of conversation; but if he has led a bad life he will become, "a byword of the people, and an example before them."[57] As an instance of the vanity of the world, and even of the divine justice, he will serve for the admonition of others. After burial his body will be mingled with the bodies of the poor. The small and great are there.[58] What profit has he derived from the beautiful structure of his body, which is now but a heap of worms? Of what use are the power and authority which he wielded, when his body is now left to rot in a grave, and his soul has, perhaps, been sent to burn in hell? Oh, what misery! To be the occasion of such reflections to others, and not to have made them for his own profit! Let us then persuade ourselves that the proper time for repairing the disorders of the soul is not the hour of death, but the time of health. Let us hasten to do now what we shall not be able to do at that hour. The time is short.[59] Everything soon passes away and comes to an end: let us therefore labour to employ all things for the attainment of eternal life.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O God of my soul! O infinite goodness! Have mercy on me who have so grievously offended Thee. I knew that in yielding to sin I should lose Thy grace, and I have voluntarily lost it. Tell me what I must do in order to recover it. If Thou wishest me to repent of my sins, behold I repent of them with my whole heart: I wish to die of sorrow for them. If Thou wishest me to hope for Thy pardon, I hope for it through the merits of Thy blood. If Thou wishest me to love Thee above all things, I give up all, I renounce all the pleasures and goods which the world can give me: I love Thee above every good. O my most amiable Saviour! If Thou wishest me to ask Thy graces, I beg two graces from Thee—do not permit me ever more to offend Thee, and make me love Thee: treat me then as Thou pleasest. Mary, my hope, obtain for me these two graces; through thy intercession I hope to obtain them.

IMPORTANCE OF THE LAST MOMENT

How great, then, the folly of those who, for the miserable and transitory delights of this short life, expose themselves to the danger of an unhappy death, and afterward of an unhappy eternity. Oh! How important is that last moment; that last gasp, the last closing of the scene! On it depends an eternity either of all delights or of all torments—a life of eternal happiness or of everlasting woe. Let us consider that Jesus Christ submitted to a cruel and ignominious death in order to obtain for us the grace of a good death. That we may at that last moment die in the grace of God, is the reason why he gives us so many alls, so many lights, and admonishes us by so many threats.

Antisthenes, though a pagan, being asked what was the greatest blessing which man could receive in this world, answered, A good death. And what will a Christian say, who knows by faith, that at the moment of death eternity begins, and that at that moment he lays hold of one of two wheels, which draws with it either eternal joy or everlasting torments? If there were two tickets in a lottery, on one of which might be written Hell and on the other Heaven, what care would you not take to draw that which would give you a right to Paradise, and to avoid the other, by which you would win a place in Hell! O God! How the hands of those unhappy men tremble who are condemned to throw the die on which their life or death depends! How great will be your terror at the approach of that last hour, when you will say: On this moment depends my life or death for eternity; on this depends whether I shall be forever happy or forever in despair! St Bernardine of Sienna relates, that at death a certain prince exclaimed, with trembling and dismay: Behold, I have so many kingdoms and palaces in this world; but if I die this night I know not what apartment shall be assigned to me.

Brother, if you believe that you must die, that there is an eternity, that you can die only once, and that if you then err your error will be forever irreparable, why do you not resolve to begin at this moment to do all in your power to secure a good death? St Andrew Avellino said with trembling: "Who knows what will be my lot in the next life? Shall I be saved or damned?" The thought of the uncertainty of being damned or saved filled St Louis Bertrand with so much terror, that he could not sleep during the night, because of this thought which would suggest itself to him: "Who knows whether thou wilt be lost?" And will not you, who have committed so many sins, tremble? Oh! Hasten to apply a remedy in time; resolve to give yourself sincerely to God, and begin from this moment a life which, at the hour of death, will be to you a source, not of affliction, but of consolation. Give yourself up to prayer, frequent the sacraments, avoid all dangerous occasions, and, if necessary, leave the world, secure to yourself eternal salvation, and be persuaded that to secure eternal life no precaution can be too great

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my dear Saviour! How great are my obligations to Thee! How hast Thou been able to bestow so many graces on so ungrateful a traitor as I have been? Thou hast created me; and in creating me Thou didst see the injuries which I would commit against Thee. Thou didst redeem me by dying for me; and then, too Thou didst see the ingratitude which I would be guilty of toward Thee. Being placed in the world I turned my back upon thee by my sins. My soul was dead and rotten, and Thou didst restore me to life. I was blind, and Thou hast enlightened me. I had lost Thee and Thou didst enable me to find Thee. I was Thy enemy and Thou hast made me Thy friend. O God of mercy, make me feel the obligations which I owe Thee and make me weep over the offences which I have committed against Thee. Ah! Take vengeance on me by giving me a great sorrow for my sins. Do not chastise me by the privation of Thy grace and love. O eternal Father, I abhor and detest, above all evils, the injuries I have done Thee. Have mercy on me for the sake of Jesus Christ. Look at Thy Son dead on the cross. "Sanguis ejus super me." May his blood flow upon me, and wash my soul! O King of my heart! Thy kingdom come. I am resolved to banish every affection which is not for Thee. I love Thee above all things; come and reign in my soul with undivided sway. Grant that I may love Thee, and love nothing but Thee. I desire to please Thee to the utmost of my ability, and to do Thy will in all things, during the remainder of my life. Bless, O my Father, this my desire, and grant me the grace to keep myself always united to Thee. All my affections I consecrate to Thee, and from this day forward I wish to belong to Thee alone, my treasure, my peace, my hope, my love, my all. I hope for all graces through the merits of Thy Son. Mary, my queen and mother, assist me by thy intercession. Mother of God! Pray for me.

THE CERTAINTY OF DEATH

"It is appointed unto men once to die."—Hebrew ix.27.

FIRST POINT

ALL MUST DIE

THE sentence of death has been written against all men: you are a man; you must die. "Our other goods and evils," says St Augustine, "are uncertain; death alone is certain."[60] It is uncertain whether the infant that is just born will be poor or rich, whether he will have good or bad health, whether he will die in youth or in old age. But it is certain that he will die. The stroke of death will fall on all the nobles and monarchs of the earth. When death comes there is no earthly power able to resist it. St Augustine says, "Fire, water, the sword, and the power of princes may be resisted; but death cannot be resisted."[61] Belluacensis relates that at the end of his life a certain king of France said: "Behold, with all my power, I cannot induce death to wait one more hour for me." When the term of life arrives, it is not deferred a single moment. Thou hast appointed his bounds, which cannot be passed.[62]

Dearly beloved reader, though you should live as many years as you expect, a day will come and on that day an hour, which will be the last for you. For me, who am now writing, and for you, who read this little book, has been decreed the day and the moment when I will no longer write, and you will no longer read. Who is the man that shall live and not see death?[63] There never has been a man so foolish as to flatter himself that he will not have to die. What has happened to your forefathers; will also happen to you. Of the immense numbers that lived in this country in the beginning of the last century there is not one now living. Even the princes and monarchs of the earth have changed their country: of them nothing now remains but a marble mausoleum with a grand inscription, which only serves to teach us, that of the great ones of this world nothing is left but a little dust enclosed in the tomb. "Tell me," says St Bernard, "where are the lovers of the world? Of them nothing remains saves ashes and worms."[64]

Since our souls will be eternal, we ought to procure not a fortune which soon ends, but one that will be everlasting. What would it profit you to be happy here (if it were possible for a soul to be happy without God), if hereafter you must be miserable for all eternity? You have built that house to your entire satisfaction; but remember that you must soon leave it to rot in a grave. You have obtained that dignity which raises you above others; but death will come and reduce you to the level of the poorest peasant.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah! unhappy me, who have spent so many years only in offending Thee, O God of my soul. Behold these years are already past: death is perhaps at hand; and what do I find but pains and remorse of conscience? Oh, that I had always served Thee, O my Lord! Fool that I have been! I have lived so many years on this earth and instead of acquiring merits for heaven. I have laden my soul with debts to the divine justice. Ah, my dear Redeemer, give me light and strength now to prepare for that great moment, which will decide my eternal happiness or misery. I thank Thee for having waited for me till now; and since Thou hast given me time to repair the past, behold me, O my God! Tell me what I am to do for Thee. Dost Thou wish me to weep over the offences I have offered to Thee? I am sorry for them, and detest them with my whole soul. Dost Thou wish me to spend the remaining years and days of my life in loving Thee? I desire to do so, O God; I have even hitherto frequently resolved to do so; but I have violated my promise. O my Jesus, I will be no longer ungrateful for the great graces Thou hast bestowed upon me. If I do not now change my life, how shall I be able at death to hope for pardon and for Paradise? Behold, I now firmly resolve to begin to serve Thee in earnest. But give me strength; do not abandon me. Thou didst not abandon me when I offended Thee; I therefore hope more confidently for Thy aid, now that I purpose to renounce all things to please Thee. Accept me, then, as one of Thy lovers, O God worthy of infinite love! Receive the traitor that now casts himself with sorrow at Thy feet—that loves Thee, and asks Thy mercy. I love Thee, o my Jesus; I love Thee with my whole heart; I love Thee more than myself. Behold, I am Thine; dispose of me, and of all that I possess, as Thou pleasest. Give me perseverance in obeying Thy commands; give me Thy love; and then do with me whatsoever Thou wishest. Mary, my mother, my hope, my refuge, to thee I recommend myself to thee I consign my soul: pray to Jesus for me.

SECOND POINT

EVERY MOMENT WE APPROACH DEATH

IT is appointed. It is certain, then, that we are all condemned to death. We are born, says St Cyprian, with the halter round our neck; every step we take brings us nearer to death. My brother, as your name has been one day entered in the register of baptisms, so it will be one day entered in the register of deaths. As in speaking of your ancestors you say: God be merciful to my father, to my uncle, to my brother, so others shall say the same to you. As you have heard the death-bell toll for many, so others shall hear it toll for you.

But what would you say if you saw a man on his way to the place of execution jesting, laughing, looking about in every direction and thinking only of comedies, festivities, and amusements? And are not you now on your way to death? What is the object of your thoughts? Behold in that grave your friends and relatives, on whom justice has already been executed. How great is the terror and dismay of a man condemned to die, when he beholds his companions suspended on the gallows! Look then at these dead bodies. Each of them says to you: Yesterday for me; to-day for thee. [65] The same is said to you by the portraits of your deceased relatives, by the memoranda-books, the houses, the beds, the garments, which they have left.

To know that you must die, that after death you will enjoy eternal glory or suffer eternal torments, that on death depends your eternal happiness or eternal misery, and, with all this before your eyes, not to think of settling your accounts, and of adopting every means of securing a happy death, is surely the extreme of folly. We pity those who meet with a sudden and unprovided death; why then do we not endeavour to be always prepared? We too may die suddenly and without preparation. But, sooner or later, with or without warning, whether we think or do not think of it, we shall die; and every hour, every moment, brings us nearer to our end, which shall be the last illness that will send us out of the world.

At every age, the house, the streets, and the cities are filled with new people; the former inhabitants are borne to the grave, their last resting-place. As the days of life have ended for them, so a time will come when neither I nor you, nor any one alive, will live any longer on this earth. Days shall be formed and no one in them.[66] We shall all then be in eternity, which shall be for us either an eternal day of delights, or an eternal night of torments. There is no middle way; it is certain and an article of faith, that either one lot or the other will be ours.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My beloved Redeemer! I would not dare to appear before Thee, did I not see Thee hanging on the cross, lacerated, despised, and lifeless, for the love of me. My ingratitude has been great; but Thy mercy is still greater. My sins have been very grievous; but Thy merits exceed their enormity. Thy wounds, Thy blood, and Thy death are my hope. I deserved hell by my first sin: to that sin I have added so many other offences. And Thou hast not only preserved my life, but Thou hast also invited me to pardon, and hast offered me peace with so much mercy and so much love. How can I fear that Thou wilt drive me away, now that I love Thee and desire nothing but Thy grace? Yes, my dear Lord, I love Thee with my whole heart, and I desire only to love Thee. I love Thee and I am sorry for having despised Thee, not so much because I have deserved hell, as because I have offended Thee, my God, who hast loved me so tenderly. O my Jesus, open to me the bosom of Thy goodness; add mercies to mercies. Grant that I may be no longer ungrateful to Thee; change my whole heart. Grant that my heart, which has once despised Thy love, and has exchanged it for the miserable delights of this earth, may now be entirely Thine, and may burn with continual flames for Thee. I hope to gain Paradise, that I may always love Thee. I cannot enjoy in that kingdom a place among the innocent—I must remain among the penitents; but though among these, I wish to love Thee more than the innocent. For the glory of Thy mercy, make all heaven behold so great a sinner inflamed with an ardent love. I resolve henceforth to be all Thine, and to think only of loving Thee. Assist me with Thy light and with Thy grace to execute this desire, which Thou in Thy goodness hast inspired. O Mary! Thou who art the mother of perseverance, obtain for me the grace to be faithful to this my promise.

THIRD POINT

WE SHOULD THINK CONTINUALLY OF DEATH

Death is certain. But, O God! This truth Christian know, this they believe and see; and how can they still live so forgetful of death as if they would never have to die? If after this life there were neither hell nor heaven, could they think less of it than they do at present? It is this forgetfulness that makes them lead so wicked a life. My brother, if you wish to live well, spend the remaining days of life with death before your eyes. O death, thy sentence is welcome.[67] Oh! How correct the judgements, how well directed the actions, of the man is regulated in view of death! "Consider the end of life," says St Laurence Justinian, "and you will love nothing in this world."[68] All that is in the world is the concupiscence of the flesh, of the eyes and the pride of life.[69] All the goods of this earth are reduced to the pleasures of sense, to riches and to honours. But all these are easily despised by the man who considers that he will be soon reduced to ashes, and that he will be soon buried in the earth to be the food of worms.

And in reality it was at the sight of death that that saints despised all the goods of this earth. St Charles Borromeo kept on his table a skull, in order that he might continually contemplate it. Cardinal Baronius had inscribed on his ring the words, Memento mori, (Remember death.) The Venerable P. Juvenal Ancina, Bishop of Saluzzo, had this motto written on a skull, "What you are, I was; and what I am, you shall be." A holy hermit being asked when dying how he could be so cheerful, said: "I have always kept death before my eyes; and therefore, now that it has arrived, I see nothing new in it."

What folly would it not be for a traveller, who would think only of acquiring dignities and possessions in the countries through which he had to pass, and should reduce himself to the necessity of living miserably in his native land, where he must remain during his whole life! And is not he a fool who seeks after happiness in this world, where he will remain only a few days, and exposes himself to the risk of being unhappy in the next, where he must live for eternity? We do not fix our affections on borrowed goods, because we know that they must soon be returned to the owner. All the goods of this earth are lent to us: it is folly to set our heart on what we must soon quit. Death shall strip us of them all. The acquisitions and fortunes of this world all terminate in a dying gasp, in a funeral, in a descent into the grave. The house which you have built for yourself you must soon give up to others. The grave will be the dwelling of your body till the day of judgement; thence it will go to heaven or to hell, whither the soul will have gone before.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Then, at death, all shall be at an end for me. I shall then find only the little I have done for Thee, O my God! And what do I wait for! Do I wait till death come and find me as miserable and defiled with sin as I am at present? Were I now called to eternity I should die with great disquietude on account of my past sins? No, my Jesus; I will not die so discontented. I thank Thee for having given me time to weep over my iniquities and to love Thee. I wish to begin from this moment. I am sorry from the bottom of my heart for having offended Thee, O Sovereign Good! And I love Thee above all things—I love Thee more than my life. My Jesus! I give myself entirely to Thee. From this moment I embrace and unite Thee to my heart. I now consign my soul to Thee. Into Thy hands I commend my spirit. I will not wait to give it to Thee when that proficiscere, "Depart, O soul," will announce my departure from this world. I will not wait till then to seek Thee to save me. "Jesu sis mihi Jesus." My Saviour, save me now by granting me pardon and the grace of Thy holy love. Who knows but this consideration which I have read may be the last call which Thou wilt give me, and the last mercy which Thou wilt show me? Extend Thy hand, O my love, and deliver me from the mire of my tepidity. Give me fervour and make me do with great love all that Thou dost demand of me. Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, gives me holy perseverance, and the grace to love Thee, and to love Thee ardently, during the remainder of my life. O Mary! Through the love which thou bearest to thy Jesus, obtain for me these two graces—perseverance and love.

Consideration V

UNCERTAINTY OF THE HOUR OF DEATH

"Be you then also ready; for at what hour you think not, the Son of man will come."—Luke xii.40.

FIRST POINT

THE MOMENT IS FIXED, BUT IT IS UNKNOWN

IT is certain that we shall die; but the time of death is uncertain. "Nothing," says the author who styles himself Idiota, "is more certain than death; but nothing is more uncertain than the hour of death."[70] My brother, God has already fixed the year, the month, the day, the hour, and the moment when I and you are to leave this earth and go into eternity; but the time is unknown to us. To exhort us to be always prepared, Jesus Christ tells us that death will come unawares, and like a thief in the night. The day of the Lord shall so come as a thief in the night.[71] He now tells us to be always vigilant; because, when we least expect him, he will come to judge us. At what hour you think not, the Son of man will come.[72] St Gregory says that, for our good, God conceals from us the hour of death that we may always be prepared to die.[73] "Since then," says St Bernard, "death may take away life at all times and in all places, we ought, if we wish to die well and save our souls, to live always in expectation of death."[74]

All know that they must die; but the misfortune is, that many view death at such a distance, that they lose sight of it. Even the old, the most decrepit, and the mist sickly, flatter themselves that they will live three or four years longer. But how many, I ask, have we known, even in our own times, to die suddenly—some sitting, some walking, some sleeping? It is certain that not one of these imagines that he should die so suddenly, and on that day on which he died. I say, moreover, that of all who have gone to the other world during the present year, no one imagined that he should die and end his days this year. Few are the deaths which do not happen unexpectedly.

When, therefore, Christian soul, the devil tempts you to sin by saying, To-morrow you will go to confession, let your answer be, How do I know that this will be the last day of my life? If this hour, this moment, in which I would turn by back on God, were the last of my life, so that I would have no time for repentance, what would become of me for all eternity? To how many poor sinners has it happened, that in the act of feasting on the poison of sin they were struck dead and sent to hell? As fishes are taken with the hook, says Ecclesiastes, so men are taken in the evil time."[75] The evil time is that in which the sinner actually offends God. The devil tells you that this misfortune will not happen to you; but you should say to him, in answer: If it should happen to me, what will become of me for all eternity?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Lord! The place in which I ought to be at this moment is not that in which I find myself, but in hell, which I have so often merited by my sins "Infernus domus mea est." (Hell is my house). St Peter says: The Lord waiteth patiently for your sake, not willing that any one should perish, but that all should return to penance.[76] Then Thou hast had so much patience with me, and hast waited for me, because Thou wishest me not to be lost, but return to Thee by repentance. My God, I return to Thee; I cast myself at Thy feet, and supplicate mercy. Have mercy on me, O God, according to Thy great mercy.[77] Lord, to pardon me requires a great and extraordinary act of mercy, because I offended Thee after I had been favoured with a special light. Other sinners also have offended Thee, but they have not received the light which Thou gavest to me. But, in spite of all my sinfulness and ingratitude, Thou commandest me to repent of my sins, and to hope for pardon. Yes, my Redeemer, I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended Thee, and I hope for pardon through the merits of Thy Passion. Thou, my Jesus, though innocent, wished to die like a criminal on the cross, and to shed all Thy blood in order to wash away my sins. "O sanguis innocentis lava, culpas pœnitentis." O blood of the innocent, wash away the sins of the penitent. O eternal Father! Pardon me for the sake of Jesus Christ. Hear his prayers, now that He intercedes for me and makes Himself my advocate. But it is not enough to receive pardon: I desire also, O God! Worthy of infinite love, the grace to love Thee: I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! And I offer Thee hencefo rth my body, my soul, my liberty, and my will. I wish henceforth to avoid not only grievous, but also venial offences. I will fly from all evil occasions. Lead us not into temptation.[78] For the love of Jesus Christ, preserve me from the occasions in which I would offend Thee. But deliver us from evil: Deliver me from sin, and then chastise me as Thou pleasest. I accept all infirmities, pains, and losses which Thou mayest be pleased to send me: it is enough for me not to lose Thy grace and Thy love. Ask and you shall receive.[79] Thou promisest to grant whatsoever we ask; I ask these two graces—holy perseverance and the gift of Thy love. O Mary, Mother of mercy! Thou dost pray for me: in thee do I put my trust.

SECOND POINT

WE SHOULD MAKE UP OUR ACCOUNTS

The Lord does not wish us to be lost; and therefore, by the threat of chastisement, he unceasingly exhorts us to a change of life. Except you will be converted, He will brandish His sword.[80] Behold, he says in another place, how many, because they would not cease to offend me, have me with a sudden death, when they were least expecting it and were living in peace, secure of a life of many year. For when they shall say: Peace and security: then shall sudden destruction come upon them.[81] Again he says: Unless you shall do penance, you shall all likewise perish.[82] Why so many threats of chastisement before the execution of vengeance? It is because he wishes that we amend our lives, and thus avoid an unhappy death. "He," says St Augustine, "who tells you to beware, does not wish to take away your life."[83] It is necessary, then, to prepare our accounts before the day of account arrives. Dearly beloved Christians, were you to die, and were your lot for eternity to be decided before night would your accounts be ready? Oh! How much would you give to obtain from God another year or month, or even another day, to prepare for judgement? Why then do you not now, that God gives you this time, settle the accounts of your conscience? Perhaps it cannot happen that this shall be the last day for you? Delay not to be converted to the Lord, and defer it not from day to day; for His wrath shall come on a sudden, and in the time of vengeance He will destroy thee. [84] My brother, to save your soul you must give up sin. "If then you must renounce it at some time, why do you not abandon it at this moment?" says St Augustine. Perhaps you are waiting till death arrives? But, for obstinate sinners, the hour of death is the time, not of pardon, but of vengeance. In the time of vengeance He will destroy thee.

When any one borrows from you a large sum of money you take care to get a written security for it. Who knows, you say, what may happen? Why are you not equally careful about the salvation of your soul, which is of far greater importance to you than all the riches of the earth? When eternity is at stake, why do you not say: Who knows what may happen? If you were to lose a sum of money, all would not be lost; you would have the hope of recovering it. But if at death you lose your soul, then you will truly have lost all, and can never hope to regain it. You are careful to keep an exact account of all the goods you possess, lest, by dying suddenly, any of them might be lost; and if you meet with a sudden death, and find yourself at enmity with God, what will become of your soul for all eternity?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah! My Redeemer! Thou hast spent all Thy blood and hast given Thy life in order to save my soul: and I have often lost it by confidence in Thy mercy. I have, then, so often abused Thy goodness to offend Thee. By doing so, I have deserved to be suddenly struck dead, and to be cast into hell. In a word, I have been engaged in a contest with Thee. Thou didst treat me with mercy, and I offended Thee; Thou didst seek after me and I fled away from Thee; Thou gavest me time to repair the evil I had done, and I employed that time in adding insults to insults. Lord, make me understand the injustice I have done Thee, and the obligation by which I am bound to love Thee. Ah! My Jesus! How could I be so dear to Thee, who sought after me so often when I chased Thee away? How hast Thou been able to bestow so many graces on one who has given Thee so much displeasure? From this I see the ardour of Thy desire to save me from perdition. I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended Thee. O infinite goodness! Ah, receive this ungrateful sheep, that casts itself sorrowful at Thy feet; receive it and bind it on Thy shoulders, that I may never more fly away from Thee. I will never again abandon Thee. I wish to love Thee; I wish to be Thine; and provided I belong to Thee. I am content to suffer every pain. And what greater punishment can fall upon me than to live without Thy grace, to be separated from Thee, who art my God, who hast created me and died for me? O accursed sins! What have you done? You have made me displease my Saviour, who has loved me so tenderly. Ah! My Jesus, as Thou hast died for me, so I ought to die for Thee. Thou hast died through love for me—I should die through sorrow for having despised Thee. I accept death in whatever manner and at whatever time Thou pleasest to send it. Hitherto I have not loved Thee, or I have loved Thee too little. I do not wish to die in this state. Ah, grant me a little more time, that I may love Thee before I die. Change my heart: wound it: inflame it with Thy holy love. Through that affection of charity which made Thee die for me, grant me this favour. I love Thee with my whole heart. My soul is enamoured of Thee. Do not permit me to lose Thee. Give me holy perseverance; give me Thy holy love. Most holy Mary, my refuge, and my Mother, perform the office of advocate in my behalf.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST ALWAYS BE READY

Be ye ready. The Lord does not tell us to prepare ourselves, but to be prepared, when death arrives. When death comes, it will be almost impossible, in that tempest and confusion, to give ease to a troubled conscience. This, reason tells us: this, God threatens, saying that then he will come, not to pardon, but to avenge, the contempt of his graces. Revenge is mine, I will repay.[85] It is, says St Augustine, a just punishment, that he who was unwilling, when he was able to save his soul, will not be able when he is willing.[86] But you will say: Perhaps I may still be converted and saved. Would you throw yourself into a deep well, saying, Perhaps I may not be drowned? O God! How sin blinds the understanding, and deprives the soul of reason. When there is question of the body, men speak rationally; but when the soul is concerned, they speak like fools.

My brother, who knows but this point which you read is the last warning that God may send you? Let us immediately prepare for death, that it may not come upon us without giving us time to prepare for judgement. St Augustine says that God conceals from us the last day of life, that we may be always prepared to die.[87] St Paul tells us that we must work out our salvation, not only with fear, but also with trembling.[88] St Antonine relates that a certain king of Sicily, to make one of his subjects understand the fear with which he sat on the throne, commanded him to sit at table with a sword suspended over him by a slender thread. The apprehension that the thread might give way filled him with so much terror that he could scarcely taste food. We are all in like danger: for the sword of death, on which our eternal salvation depends, may at each moment fall upon us.

It is indeed a question of eternity. If the tree fall to the south or the north, in which soever it shall fall, there shall it lie.[89] If, when death comes, we are found in the grace of God, oh! with what joy shall we say: I have secured all; I can never again lose God; I shall be happy forever. But, if death finds the soul in sin, with what despair will it exclaim, "Ergo erravimus!"—therefore have I erred; and for my error there will be no remedy for all eternity. The fear of an unhappy eternity made the venerable Fr Avila, apostle of Spain, say, when the news of death was brought to him: Oh! That I had a little more time to prepare for death! This fear made the Abbot Agatho, who spent so many years in penance, say at death: What will become of me? Who can know the judgements of God? St Arsenius, too, trembled at the hour of death; and being asked by his disciples, why he was so much alarmed, he said: "My children this fear is not new to me; I have had it always during my whole life." Above all, holy Job trembled when he said: What shall I do when the Lord shall rise to judge? And when he shall examine, what shall I answer Him?[90]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah my God! Who has ever loved me more than Thou hast and whom have I despised and insulted more than I have insulted Thee? O blood! O wounds of Jesus, you are my hope. Eternal Father, look not upon my sins, but look at the wounds of Jesus; behold Thy Son dying through pain for my sake, and asking Thee to pardon me. I repent, O my Creator! Of having offended Thee. I am sorry for it above all things. Thou didst create me that I might love Thee; and I have lived as if Thou didst create me to offend Thee. For the love of Jesus Christ, pardon me and give me grace to love Thee. I have hitherto resisted Thy will, but I will resist no longer, and will do whatsoever Thou commandest. Thou commandest me to detest the outrages I have offered Thee; behold I detest them, with my whole heart. Thou commandest me to resolve to offend Thee no more; behold, I resolve to lose my life a thousand times, rather than forfeit Thy grace. Thou commandest me to love Thee with my whole heart; yes, with my whole heart I love Thee, and I wish to love nothing else but Thee. Thou wilt henceforth be my only beloved, my only love. From Thee I ask, and from Thee I hope for holy perseverance. For the love of Jesus Christ, grant that I may be always faithful to Thee, and that I may always say to Thee, with St Bonaventure: "Unus est dilectus meus, unus est amor meus." My beloved is one, my love is one. I do not wish that my life be employed any longer in giving Thee displeasure; I wish to spend it only in weeping over the offences I have committed against Thee, and in loving Thee. Mary, my Mother! Pray for all who recommend themselves to thee—pray to Jesus also for me.

THE DEATH OF THE SINNER

"When distress cometh upon them, they will seek for peace, and there shall be none. Trouble shall come upon trouble."—Ezek. vii.25.

FIRST POINT

THE SINNER WILL SEEK GOD AT DEATH, BUT HE WILL NOT FIND HIM

AT present sinners banish the remembrance and thought of death; and thus they seek after peace, though they never find it, in the sinful life which they lead. But when they are found in the straits of death, on the point of entering into eternity, they shall seek peace, and there shall be none.[91] Then they will not be able to fly from the torture of their sinful conscience. They will seek peace; but what peace can be found by a soul loaded with sins that sting it like so many vipers? What peace can the sinner enjoy when he sees that he must in a few moments appear before the judgement seat of Jesus Christ, whose law and friendship he ahs till then despised? Trouble shall come upon trouble.[92] The news of death, which has been already announced, the thought of being obliged to take leave of everything in this world, the remorse of conscience, the time lost, the want of time at present, the rigour of the divine judgement, the unhappy eternity which awaits sinners—all these things will form a horrible tempest, which will confuse the mind, will increase his apprehensions; and thus, full of confusion and distrust, the dying sinner will pass to the other world.

Trusting in the divine promise, Abraham, with great merit, hoped in God, against human hope.[93] But sinners, with great demerit, hope falsely and to their own perdition, not only against hope but also against faith; because they despise the menaces of God against all who are obstinate in sin. They are afraid of a bad death, but they fear not to lead a wicked life. But who has assured them that they will not suddenly be deprived of life by a thunderbolt, by apoplexy, or by the bursting of a blood-vessel? And were they at death even allowed time for repentance, who assures them that they will sincerely return to God? To conquer bad habits, St Augustine had to fight against them for twelve years. How will the dying man, who has always lived in sin, be able, in the midst of the pains, the stupefaction and the confusion of death, to repent sincerely of all his past iniquities? I say sincerely, because it is not enough to say and to promise with the tongue: it is necessary to promise with the heart? O God! What terror and confusion will seize the unhappy Christian who has led a careless life, when he finds himself overwhelmed with sins, with the fears of judgement, of hell, and of eternity! Oh! What confusion will these thoughts produce when the dying sinner will find his reason gone, his mind darkened, and his whole frame assailed by the pains of approaching death? He will make his confession; he will promise, weep, and seek mercy from God, but without understanding what he does; and in this tempest of agitation, of remorse, of pains and terrors, he will pass to the other life. The people shall be troubled, and they shall pass.[94] A certain author says that the prayers, the wailings, and promises of dying sinners are like the tears and promises of a man assailed by an enemy who points a dagger to his throat to take away his life. Miserable the man who takes to his bed at enmity with God, and passes from the bed of sickness to eternity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O wounds of Jesus! You are my hope. I should despair of the pardon of my sins, and of my eternal salvation, did I not behold Thee, the fountain of mercy and grace, through which a God has shed all his blood, to wash my soul from the sins which I have committed. I adore Thee, then, O holy wounds! And trust in Thee. I detest a thousand times, and curse those vile pleasures by which I have displeased my Redeemer, and have miserably lost his friendship. Looking then at Thee, I raise up my hopes and turn my affections to Thee. My dear Jesus, Thou deservest to be loved by all men, and to be loved with their whole heart. I have so grievously offended Thee. I have despised Thy love; but, notwithstanding my sinfulness, Thou hast borne with me so long, and invited me to pardon with so much mercy. Ah, my Saviour, do not permit me evermore to offend Thee, and to merit my own damnation. O God! What torture should I feel in hell at the sight of Thy blood and of the great mercies Thou hast shown me. I love Thee and will always love Thee. Give me holy perseverance. Detach my heart from all love which is not for Thee, and confirm in me a true desire, a true resolution henceforth, to love only Thee, my Sovereign Good. O Mary, my Mother! Dram me to God, and obtain for me the grace to belong entirely to Him before I die.

SECOND POINT

ANGUISH OF THE DYING SINNER

The poor dying sinner will be assailed, not by one, but by many causes of distress and anguish. On the one hand, the devils will torment him. At death there horrid enemies exert all their strength to secure the perdition of the soul that is about to leave this world. They know that they have but little time to gain it, and that if they lose it at death, they shall lose it forever. The Devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time.[95] The dying man will be tempted, not by one, but by innumerable devils, who will labour for his damnation. Their houses shall be filled with serpents.[96] One will say: Fear not; you will recover. Another: You have been deaf to the inspiration of God for so many years, and do you now expect that he will have mercy on you? Another will ask: How can you make satisfaction for all the injuries you have done to the property and character of your neighbours? Another: Do you not see that your confessions have been null, that they have been made without sorrow or a purpose of amendment? How will you now be able to repair them?

On the other hand, the dying man will see himself surrounded by his sins. Evils, says David, shall catch the unjust man unto destruction.[97] These sins, says St Bernard, like so many satellites, shall keep him in chains, and shall say unto him: "We are your works; we shall not desert you."[98] "We are your offspring; we will not leave you; we will accompany you to the other world, and will present ourselves with you to the Eternal Judge. The dying man will then wish to shake off such enemies; but, to get rid of them, he must detest them, he must return sincerely to God. His mind is darkened, and his heart hardened. A hard heart shall fare evil at the last; and he that loveth danger shall perish in it.[99] St Bernard says that the man who has been obstinate in sin during life, will make efforts, but without success, to get out of the state of damnation; and that, overwhelmed by his own malice, he will end his life in the same unhappy state. Having loved sin till death, he has also loved the danger of damnation. Hence the Lord will justly permit him to perish in that danger in which he has voluntary lived till the end of his life. St Augustine says that he who is abandoned by sin before he abandons it, will scarcely detest it as he ought; because what he will then do will be done through necessity.[100]

Miserable the sinner that hardens his heart and resists the divine calls: His heart shall be as hard as a stone and as firm as a smith's anvil. [101] Instead of yielding to the graces and inspirations of God, and being softened by them, the unhappy man becomes more obdurate, as the anvil is hardened by repeated strokes of the hammer. In punishment of his resistance to the divine calls, he will find his heart in the same miserable state at the very hour of death, at the moment of passing into eternity. A hard heart shall fare evil at the last.[102] Sinners, says the Lord, you have, for the love of creatures, turned your back upon me. They have turned their back upon me, and not their face; and in the time of their affliction they will say: Arise, and deliver us. Where are the gods thou hast made thee? Let them arise and deliver thee.[103] They will have recourse to God at death; but He will say to them: Why do you invoke me now? Call on creatures to assist you; for they have been your gods. The Lord will address them in this manner, because, in seeking Him, they do not sincerely wish to be converted. St Jerome says that he holds, and that he has learned from experience, that they who have to the end led a bad life, will never die a good death.[104]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My dear Saviour! Assist me; do not abandon me. I see my whole soul covered with the wounds of sin, my passion attack me violently, my bad habits weigh me down. I cast myself at They feet; have pity on me and deliver me from so many evils. In Thee, O Lord! I have hoped: may I not be confounded forever.[105] Do not suffer a soul that trusts in Thee to be lost. Deliver not up to beasts the souls that confess to Thee.[106] I am sorry for having offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness. I have done evil, I confess my guilt. I wish to amend my life, whatsoever it may cost me. But if Thou dost not help my by Thy grace, I am lost. Receive O my Jesus! the rebel who has so grievously outraged Thy majesty. Remember that I have been purchased by Thy blood and Thy life. Through the merit then of Thy Passion and death, receive me into Thy arms, and give me holy perseverance. I was lost, Thou hast called me back: I will resist no longer: to Thee I consecrate myself; bind me to Thy love, and do not permit me evermore to lose Thee by losing Thy grace again. My Jesus! Do not permit it. Mary, my Queen! Do not permit it: obtain for me death and a thousand deaths, rather than that I should again forfeit the grace of Thy Son.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST SEEK GOD WHEN WE CAN FIND HIM

It is a marvellous thing that God unceasingly threatens sinners with an unhappy death. Then they shall call upon me, and I will not hear.[107] Will God hear his cry when distress shall come upon him?[108] I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock.[109] According to St Gregory, God laughs when he is unwilling to show mercy.[110] Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time.[111]

The Lord pronounces the same threats in so many other places: and sinners live in peace as securely as if God had certainly promised to give them, at death, pardon and paradise. It is true that at whatsoever hour the sinner is converted to God promises to pardon him. But He has not promised that sinners will be converted at death: on the contrary, he has often protested that they who live in sin shall die in sin. You shall die in your sins.[112] He has declared that they who seek him at death shall not find Him.[113] You shall seek me, and shall not find me.[114] We must, therefore, seek God while he may be found.[115] A time shall come when it will not be in our power to find Him. Poor blind sinners! They put off their conversion till death, when there will be no more time for repentance. "The wicked," says Oleaster, "have never learned to do good unless when the time for doing good is no more."[116] God wills the salvation of all: but He takes vengeance on obstinate sinners.

Should any man in a state of sin be seized with apoplexy and be deprived of his sense, what sentiments of compassion would be excited in all who should see him die without the sacraments and without signs of repentance! And how great should be their delight, if he made acts of sorrow for his sins! But is not he a fool who has time to repent and prefers to continue in sin? Or who returns to sin, and exposes himself to the danger of being cut off by death without the sacraments, and without repentance? A sudden death excites terror in all; and still how many expose themselves to the danger of dying suddenly, and of dying in sin?

Weight and balance are the judgements of the Lord. [117] We keep no account of the graces which God bestows upon us; but he keeps an account of them, he measures them; and when he sees them despised to a certain degree, he then abandons the sinner in his sin, and takes him out of life in that unhappy state. Miserable the man who defers his conversion till death. St Augustine says: "The repentance which is sought from a sick man is infirm."[118] St Jerome teaches, that of a hundred thousand sinners who continue in sin till death, scarcely one will be saved.[119] St Vincent Ferrer writes that it is a greater miracle to bring such sinners to salvation, than to raise the dead to life.[120]

What sorrow, what repentance, can be expected at death from the man who has loved sin till that moment? Bellarmine relates that when he exhorted to contrition a certain person whom he assisted at death, the dying man said that he did not know what was meant by contrition. The holy Bishop endeavoured to explain it to him; but he said: Father, I do not understand you; these things are too high for me. He died in that state, leaving as the venerable Cardinal has written, sufficiently evident signs of his damnation. St Augustine says that by a just chastisement the sinner who has forgotten God during life shall forget himself at death.[121]

Be not deceived, says the Apostle, God is not mocked. For what things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap. For he that soweth in his flesh, of the flesh also shall he reap corruption.[122] It would be a mockery of God to live in contempt of his laws, and afterwards to reap remuneration and eternal glory. But God is not mocked. What we sow in this life, we reap in the next. For him who sows the forbidden pleasures of the flesh, nothing remains but corruption, misery and eternal death.

Beloved Christian, what is said for others is also applicable to you. Tell me: if you were at the point of death, given over by the physicians, deprived of your senses, and in your last agony, with what fervour would you ask of God another month or week to settle the accounts of your conscience! God at present gives you this time: thank him for it, and apply an immediate remedy to the evil you have done; adopt all the means of finding yourself in the grace of God when death comes; for then there will be no more time to acquire his friendship.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! Who would have borne with me so patiently as Thou hast? If Thy goodness were not infinite, I would despair of pardon. But I have to deal with a God who has died for my salvation. Thou commandest me to hope, and I will hope. If my sins terrify and condemn me, Thy merits and Thy promise encourage me. Thou hast promised the life of Thy grace to all who return to Thee. Return ye and live.[123] Thou hast promised to embrace him who is converted to Thee. Turn ye to me, and I will turn to you.[124] Thou hast said that Thou knowest not how to despise a contrite and humble heart.[125]

Behold me, O Lord: I return to Thee; I acknowledge that I deserve a thousand hells: I am sorry for having offended Thee. I firmly promise never again to offend Thee voluntarily, and to love Thee forever. Ah! Do not suffer me any longer to be ungrateful to such unbounded goodness. O eternal Father, through the merits of the obedience of Jesus Christ, who died to obey Thee, grant that I may till death be obedient to all Thy wishes. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! And through the love which I bear Thee, I desire to obey Thee. Give me holy perseverance, give me Thy love; I ask nothing more. Mary, my Mother! Intercede for me.

SENTIMENTS OF DYING CHRISTIAN, WHO HAS BEEN CARELESS ABOUT THE DUTIES OF RELIGION AND HAS THOUGHT BUT LITTLE OF DEATH

"Take order with thy house; for thou shalt die, and shalt not live."—*Isa.*xxxviii.I.

FIRST POINT

SAD STATE OF THE WORLDLING AT DEATH

IMAGINE yourself at the bedside of a negligent Christian, who is overpowered by sickness, and has but a few hours to live. Behold him oppressed by pains, by swoons, by suffocation, by want of breadth, by cold perspirations, his reason so impaired, that he feels but little, understands little, and can speak but little. The greatest of all his miseries is, that though at the point of death, instead of thinking of his soul and of preparing accounts for eternity, be fixes all his thoughts on physicians, on the remedies by which he may be rescued from sickness, and from the pains which will soon put an end of life. "They are unable to have any other thought of themselves,"[126] says St Laurence Justinian, speaking of the condition of negligent Christians at the hour of death. They can think only of themselves. Surely his relatives and friends will admonish the dying Christian of his danger? No; there is not one among all his relatives and friends who has the courage to announce to him the news of death, and to advise him to receive the last sacraments. Through fear of offending him, thy all refuse to inform him of his danger—O my God! From this moment I thank Thee, that at death I shall, through Thy grace, be assisted by my beloved brothers of my Congregations, who will then have no other interest than that of my eternal salvation, and will all help me to die well.

But though he is not admonished of his approaching death, the poor sick man, seeing the family in disorder, the medical consultations repeated, the remedies multiplied, frequent and violent, is filled with confusion and terror. Assaulted by fears, remorse and distrust, he says within himself: Perhaps the end of my days has arrived. But what will be his feelings when he is told that death is at hand? "Take order with thy house' for thou shalt die, and shalt not live."[127] What pain will he feel in hearing these words: Your illness is mortal: it is necessary to receive the last sacraments, to unite yourself to God, and to prepare to bid farewell to the world. What! Exclaims the sick man; must I take leave of all—of my house, my villa, my relatives, friends, conversations, games and amusements? Yes, you must take leave of all. The lawyer is already come, and writes this last farewell: I bequeath such-a-thing and such-a-thing, etc. And what does he takes away with him? Nothing but a miserable rag, which will soon rot with him in the grave.

Oh! With what melancholy and agitation will the dying man be seized at the sight of the tears of the servants, at the silence of his friends, who have not courage to speak in his presence. But his greatest anguish will arise from the remorse of his conscience which in that tempest will be rendered more sensible by the remembrance of the disorderly life he has until then led, in spite of so many calls and lights from God, of so many admonitions from spiritual Fathers, and of so many resolutions made, but never executed, or afterward neglected. He will then say: O unhappy me! I have had so many lights from God, so much time to tranquilise my conscience and have not done so. Behold, I am now arrived at the gate of death. What would it have cost me to have avoided such an occasion of sin, to have broken off such a friendship, to have frequented the tribunal of penance? Ah, very little; but, though they had cost me much pain and labour, I ought to have submitted to every inconvenience in order to save my soul, which is of more importance to me than all the goods of this world. Oh! If I had put into execution the good resolutions which I made on such an occasion; if I had continued the good works which I began at such a time, how happy should I now feel! But these things I have not done, and now there is no more time to do them. The sentiments of dying sinners, who have neglected the care of their souls during life, are those of the damned who mourn in hell over their sins as the cause of their sufferings, but mourn without fruit and without remedy.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Lord! If it were at this moment announced to me that my death was at hand, such would be the painful sentiments that would torture my soul. I thank Thee for giving me this light, and of giving me time to enter into myself. O my God! I will no longer fly from Thee. Thou hast sought after me long enough. I have just reason to fear that Thou wile abandon me, if I now made so bad use of it. I have loved creatures and have not loved Thee, my Creator and Redeemer! who hast given Thy life for the love of me. Instead of loving Thee, how often have I offended, how often have I despised Thee, and turned my back upon Thee! I knew that by such a sin I insulted Thee and still I have committed it. My Jesus! I am sorry for all my sins; they displease me above all things. I wish to change my life. I renounce all the pleasures of the world in order to love and please Thee. O God of my soul! Thou hast given me strong proofs of Thy love. I too would wish before death to give Thee some proofs of my love. From this moment I accept all the infirmities, crosses, insults and offences that I receive from men; give me strength to submit to them with peace. I wish to bear them all for the love of Thee. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! I love Thee above every good. Increase my love, give me holy perseverance. Mary, my Mother! Pray to Jesus for me.

SECOND POINT

DESIRE OF THE WORLDLING AT DEATH

Oh, how clearly are the truths of faith seen at the hour of death! But then they only serve to increase the anguish of the dying Christian who has led a bad life, particularly if he has been consecrated to God, and has had greater facilities for serving him, more time for exercises of piety, more good examples and more inspirations. O God! what torture will he fell in thinking and saying: I have admonished others, and my life has been worse than theirs? I have left the world, and have cherished attachment to worldly pleasures and vanities. What remorse will he fell in thinking that with the lights which he had received from God a pagan would become a saint! With what pain will his soul be racked when he remembers that he ridiculed in others certain practices of piety, as if they were weakness of mind; and that he praised certain worldly maxims of self-esteem, or of self-love, such as: It is necessary to seek our own advancement; We ought to avoid suffering, and indulge in every amusement within our reach.

The desire of the wicked shall perish.[128] How ardently shall we desire at death the time which we now squander away? In his dialogues, St Gregory relates that a certain rich man, called Crisorius, who had led a wicked life, seeing at death the devils who came to carry him off, exclaimed: Give me time, give me time until tomorrow. They replied: O fool! Do you now seek for time? You have had so much time, but have wasted it and have spent it in committing sin; and now you seek for time. Time is now no more. The unhappy man continued to cry out and call for assistance. To his son Maximus, a monk, who was present, he said: O my son, assist me! O Maximus, come to my aid! With his face on fire, he flung himself furiously from one side of the bed to the other; and in that state of agitation, screaming aloud, like one in despaired, he breathed forth his unhappy soul.

Alas! During this life, these fools love their folly; but at death they open their eyes, and confess that they have been fools. But this only serves to increase their fear of repairing past evils; and dying in this state; they leave their salvation very uncertain. My brother, now that you are reading this point, I imagine that you too say: This is indeed true. But if this is true, your folly and misfortune will be still greater, if after knowing these truths during life, you neglect to apply a remedy in time. This very point which you have read will be a sword of sorrow for you at death.

Since, then, you now have time to avoid a death so full of terror, begin instantly to repair the past: do not wait for that time in which you can make but little preparation for judgement. Do not wait for another month, nor for another week. Perhaps this light which God in his mercy gives you now may be the last light and the last call for you. It is folly to be unwilling to think of death, which is certain, and on which eternity depends; but it would be still greater folly to reflect on it, and not prepare for judgement. Make now the reflections and resolutions which you would then make; they may be made now with profit—then without fruit; now, with confidence of saving your soul—then, with diffidence as to your salvation. A gentleman who was about to take leave of the court of Charles the Fifth, to live only to God, was asked by the Emperor why he thought of quitting the court. The gentleman answered: To secure salvation, it is necessary that some time spent in penitential works should intervene between a disorderly life and death.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my God! I will no longer abuse Thy mercy. I thank Thee for the light Thou now givest me and I promise to change my life. I see that Thou canst not bear with me any longer. I will not wait until Thou either dost send me to hell, or dost abandon me to a wicked life, which would be a greater punishment than death itself. Behold, I cast myself at Thy feet; receive me into favour. I do not deserve Thy grace; but Thou hast said: The wickedness of the wicked shall not hurt him in whatsoever day he shall turn from his wickedness.[129] If then, O my Jesus! I have hitherto offended Thy infinite goodness I now repent with my whole heart, and hope for pardon. I will say with St Anselm: "Ah! Since Thou hast redeemed me by Thy blood, do not permit me to be lost on account of my sins." Look not on my ingratitude; but have regard to the love which made Thee die for me. If I have lost Thy grace Thou hast not lost the power of restoring it to me. Have mercy on met then, O my dear Redeemer! Pardon me, and give me grace to love Thee; for I purpose henceforth to love nothing but Thee. Among so many possible creatures, Thou hast chosen me to love Thee. I make choice of Thee, O Sovereign Good! to love Thee above every good. Thou goest before me with Thy cross; I am willing to follow Thee with the cross which Thou wilt give me to carry. I embrace every mortification and every pain that comes from Thee. Do not deprive me of Thy grace, and I am content. Mary, my Mother! Obtain for me from God perseverance and the grace to love him; and I ask nothing more.

THIRD POINT

TARDY REGRETS OF A DYING PERSON

The dying man who has neglected the salvation of his soul, will find thorns in everything that is presented to him—thorns in the remembrance of past amusements, rivalries overcome and pomps displayed; thorns in the friends who will visit him, and in whatever their presence shall bring before his mind; thorns in the spiritual Fathers who assist him in turn; thorns in the Sacraments of Penance, Eucharist, and Extreme Unction, which he must receive; thorns even in the crucifix which is placed before him. In that sacred image he will read his want of correspondence to the love of a God who died for his salvation.

O fool that I have been! The poor sick man will say, with the lights and opportunities that God has given me; I could have become a saint. I could have led a life of happiness in the grace of God; and after so many years that he gave me, what do I find but torments, distrust, fears, remorse of conscience and accounts to render to God? I shall scarcely save my soul. And when will he say this? When the oil in the lamp is on the point of being consumed, and the scene of this world is about to close forever; when he finds himself in view of two eternities, one happy, the other miserable; when he is near that last gasp on which depends his everlasting bliss or eternal despair, as long as God shall be God. What would he then give for another year, month, or even another week, with the perfect use of his faculties? In the stupefaction, oppression of the chest, and difficulty of breathing, under which he then labours, he can do nothing; he is incapable of reflection, or of applying his mind to the performance of any good act: he is, as it were, shut up in a dark pit of confusion, where he can see nothing but the ruin which threatens him, and which he feels himself unable to avert. He would wish for time; but the assisting priest shall say to him, Proficiscere; adjust your accounts as well as you can in the few moments that remain, and depart. Do you not know that death waits for no one, respects no one?

Oh! With what dismay will he then think and say" This morning I am alive; this evening I shall probably be dead! To-day I am in this room; tomorrow I shall be in the grave! And where will my soul be found? With what terror will he be seized when he sees the death candle prepared? When he hears his relatives ordered to withdraw from his apartment, and to return to it no more? When his sight begins to grow dim? Finally, how great will be his alarm and confusion when he sees that, because death is at hand, the candle is lighted? O candle, O candle, how many truths will you then unfold! How different will you make things appear then from what they appear at present! O how clearly will you show the dying sinner that all the goods of this world are vanities, folly and lies? But of what use is it to understand these truths when the time is past of profiting by them?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! Thou wilt not my death, but that I be converted and live. I thank Thee for having waited for me till now, and I thank Thee for the light which Thou givest me at this moment. I know the error I have committed in preferring to Thy friendship the vile and miserable goods for which I have despised Thee. I repent and am sorry with my whole heart for having done Thee so great an injury. Ah! Do not cease, during the remainder of my life, to assist me by Thy light and grave to know and to do all that I ought to do in order to amend my life. What shall it profit me to know these truths when I shall be deprived of the time in which they may be reduced to practice? Deliver not up to beasts the souls that confess to Thee.[130] When the devil tempts me to offend Thee again, ah! I entreat Thee, my Jesus, through the merits of Thy Passion to stretch forth Thy hand and to preserve me from falling into sin, and from becoming again the slave of my enemies. Grant that in all temptations I may have recourse to Thee, and that I may not cease to recommend myself to Thee as long as the temptations continue. Thy blood is my hope and Thy goodness is my love. I love Thee, my God, worthy of infinite love; grant that I may always love Thee. Make known to me the things from which I ought to detach my heart from them: but give me strength to execute this desire. O Queen of heaven! O Mother of God! Pray for me, a sinner. Obtain for me the grace that in all temptations I may never omit to have recourse to Jesus and to thee, who, by thy intercession, preserves from falling into sin all who invoke thee.

THE DEATH OF THE JUST

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."—Ps.cxv.15.

FIRST POINT

THE DEATH OF THE JUST IS A REST

VIEWED according to the senses, death excites fear and terror; but viewed with the eyes of faith, it is consoling and desirable. To sinners it appears full of terror; but to the saints it is amiable and precious. "It is precious," says St Bernard, "as the end of labours, the consummation of victory, the gate of life."[131] It is the end of toils and labours. Man, says Job, born of a woman, living for a short time, is filled with many miseries.[132] Behold, a picture of our life; it is short and all full of miseries, of infirmities, of fears, and of passions. What, says Seneca, do worldlings, who desire a long life, seek, but a continuation of torments?[133] What, says St Augustine, is a prolongation of life but a prolongation of suffering?[134] Yes; for, as St Ambrose tells us, the present life is given us, not for repose, but that we may labour and by our toils, merit eternal glory.[135] Hence Tertullian has justly said, that when God abridges life he abridges pain.[136] Hence though man has been condemned to death in punishment of sin, still the miseries of this life are so great, that, according to St Ambrose, death appears to be a remedy and relief, rather than a chastisement.[137] God pronounces happy all who die in his grace, because they terminate their labours and go to repose. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours.[138]

The torments which afflict sinners at death do not disturb the peace of the saints. The souls of the just are in the hands of God, and the torment of death shall not touch them.[139] That proficiscere which is so full of terror to worldlings does not alarm the saints. The just man is not afflicted at the thought of being obliged to take leave of the goods of the earth, for he has always kept his heart detached from them. During life he has constantly said to the Lord: Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever.[140] Happy you, said the Apostle to his disciples, who have been robbed of your goods for the sake of Jesus Christ. You took with joy the being stripped of your goods, knowing that you had a better and a lasting substance.[141] The saint is not afflicted at bidding an eternal farewell to honours, for he always hated them, and considered them to be what they really are—smoke and vanity. He is not afflicted in leaving relatives, for he loved them only in God, and at death he recommends them to his heavenly Father, who loves them more than he does; and having a secure confidence of salvation, he expects to be better able to assist them from constantly than on this earth. In a word, he who has constantly said during life, My God and my all, continues to repeat it with greater consolation and greater tenderness at the hour of death.

He who dies loving God, is not disturbed by the pains of death; but, seeing that he is now at the end of life, and that he has no more time to suffer for God, of to offer him other proofs of his live, he accepts these pains with joy. With affection and peace he offers to God these last moments of life, and feels consoled in uniting the sacrifice of his death to the sacrifice which Jesus Christ offered for him on the Cross to his eternal Father. Thus he dies happily, saying: In peace in the self-same I will sleep and I will rest.[142] Oh! How great the peace of the Christian who dies abandoned and reposing in the arms of Jesus Christ, who has loved us to death, and has condescended to suffer so cruel a death in order to obtain for us a death full of sweetness and consolation.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my beloved Jesus! Who, to obtain for me a happy death, hast freely submitted to so painful a death on Calvary, when shall I see Thee? The first time I shall behold Thee, I shall see Thee as my judge in the very place in which I shall expire. What shall I then say? What wilt Thou say to me? I will not wait till that moment to think of what I shall say; I will meditate on it now. I will say to Thee: My Redeemer! Thou art the God who hast died for me. I have hitherto offended Thee; I have been ungrateful to Thee; I did not deserve pardon but afterward, assisted by Thy grace, I have entered into myself, and during the remainder of my life, I have bewailed my sins, and Thou hast pardoned me. Pardon me again, now that I am at Thy feet, and give me a general absolution of all my sins. I did not deserve ever again to love Thee, because I have despised Thy love; but Thou in Thy mercy hast drawn my heart to Thee, so that if I have not loved Thee as Thou deservest, I have at least loved Thee above all things, and have left all to please Thee. I see that Paradise and the possession of Thy divinity in Thy kingdom is too much for me; but I cannot live at a distance from Thee, now, especially after Thou hast shown me Thy amiable and beautiful countenance. I therefore ask for Paradise, not to enjoy greater delights, but to love Thee more perfectly. Send me to Purgatory as long as Thou pleasest. Defiled as I am at present, I do not wish to enter into the land of purity, and to see myself among those pure souls. Send me to be purified; but do not banish me forever from Thy presence. I shall be content to be one day, whenever Thou pleasest, called to Paradise to sing Thy mercies for all eternity. Ah, my beloved Judge! raise Thy hand and bless me; tell me that I am Thine, and that Thou art and shalt be forever mine. Behold, I go to a distance from Thee; I go into fire; but I go in peace, because I go to love Thee, my Redeemer, my God and my all! I am content to go; but during my absence from Thee, I go, O Lord! To count the moments that will elapse before Thou callest me. Have mercy on a soul that loves Thee with all its power, and that sighs to see Thee, that it may love Thee better.

This I hope, O my Jesus! to say to Thee at death. I entreat Thee to give me the grace to live in such a manner that I may then say to Thee what I have now thought. Give me holy perseverance, give me Thy love. Assist me, O Mary! Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me.

SECOND POINT

THE DEATH OF THE JUST IS A VICTORY

God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and death shall be no more.[143] Then, at death the Lord will wipe away from the eyes of his servants all the tears that they have shed in this world, where they live in the midst of pains, of fears, of dangers, and of combats with hell. The greatest consolation which a soul that has loved God will experience in hearing the news of death, will arise from the thought that it will soon be delivered from the many dangers of offending God, to which it is exposed in this life, from so many troubles of conscience, and from so many temptations of the devil. The present life is an unceasing warfare with hell, in which we are in continual danger of losing ours souls and God. St Ambrose says that in this life we walk among snares; we walk continually amid the snares of enemies, who lie in wait to deprive us of the life of grace. It was this danger that made St Peter of Alcantara say at death to a religious who, in attending the saint, accidentally touched him: "Brother, remove, remove from me; for I am still alive, and am still in danger of being lost." The thought of being freed by death from the danger of sin consoled St Teresa, and made her rejoice as often as she heard the clock strike, that another hour of the combat was passed. Hence she would say: "In each moment of life I may sin and lose God." Hence, the news of approaching death filled the saints with consolation; because they knew that their struggles and dangers were soon to have an end, and that they would soon be in secure possession of that happy lot in which they could never more lose God.

It is related in the lives of the Fathers, that one of them who was very old, when dying, smiled while the others wept. Being asked why he smiled, he said: 'Why do you weep at seeing me go to rest?"[144] Likewise St Catharine of Sienna in her last moments said: "Rejoice with me: for I quit this land of pains and go to a place of peace." If, says St Cyprian, you lived in a house whose walls, and roof and floors are tottering, and threatened destruction, how ardently would you desire to fly from it! In this life everything menace the ruin of the soul; the world, hell, the passions, the rebellious senses, all draw us to sin and eternal death. Who, exclaimed the Apostle, shall deliver me from the body of this death?[145] Oh! How great will be the joy of the soul in hearing these words: "Come, my spouse, depart from that land of tears, from the dens of lions who seek to devour you, and to rob you of the divine grace.[146] Hence St Paul, sighing for death said that Jesus Christ was his only life; and therefore he esteemed death his greatest gain, because by death he acquired that life which never ends. To me, to live in Christ, and to die is gain.[147]

In taking a soul while it is in the state of grace out of this world, where it may change its will and lose his friendship, God bestows on it a great favour. He was taken away lest wickedness should alter his understanding.[148] Happy in this life is the man that lives in union with God; but, as the sailor is not secure until he has arrived at the port and escaped the tempest, so the soul cannot enjoy complete happiness until it has left this world in the grace of God. "Praise," says St Maximus, "the felicity of the sailor; but not until he has reached the port."[149] Now, if at his approach to the port the sailor rejoices, how much greater ought to be the joy and gladness of a Christian who is at the point of securing eternal salvation.

Moreover, it is impossible in this life to avoid all venial sins. For, says the Holy Ghost, a just man shall fall seven times.[150] He who quits this life ceases to offend God. "For," says St Ambrose, "what is death but the burial of vices?"[151] This consideration makes the souls that love God long for death. The Venerable Vincent Caraffa consoled himself at death, saying: "By ceasing to live, I cease forever to offend God." And St Ambrose said: "Why do we desire this life, in which, the longer we live, the more we are loaded with sin?"[152] He who dies in the grace of God can never more offend him, says the same holy doctor.[153] Hence, the Lord praises the dead more than any man living, though he be a saint.[154] A certain spiritual man gave directions that the person who should bring him the news of death, should say: "Console yourself; for the time has arrived when you will no longer offend God."

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Into Thy hands, I commend my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of truth.[155] Ah, my sweet Redeemer! What should become of me if Thou hadst deprived me of life when I was far from Thee? I should now be in hell, where I could never love Thee. I thank Thee for not having abandoned me, and for having bestowed on me so many great graces in order to gain my heart. I am sorry for having offended Thee. I love Thee above all things. Ah! I entreat Thee to make me always sensible of the evil I have done in despising Thee, and of the love which Thy infinite goodness merits. I love Thee; and I desire to die soon, if such be Thy will, that I may be freed from the danger of ever again losing Thy grace, and that I may be secure of loving Thee forever. Ah, my beloved Jesus! During these remaining years of my life, give me strength to do something for Thee before I die. Give me strength against all temptations, and against my passions, but particularly against the passion which has hitherto most violently drawn me to sin. Give me patience in all infirmities, and under all the injuries which I may receive from men. Now, for the love of Thee, pardon all who have shown me any contempt, and I beg of Thee to bestow upon them the graces which they stand in need of. Give me strength to be more diligent in avoiding even venial faults, about which I have been hitherto negligent. My Saviour! Assist me. I hope for all graces through Thy merits. O Mary, my Mother, and my hope! I place unbounded confidence in thee.

THIRD POINT

THE DEATH OF THE JUST IS THE ENTRANCE TO LIFE

Death is not only the end of labours, but it is also the gate of life, says St Bernard.[156] He who wishes to see God must necessarily pass through this gate. This is the gate of the Lord; the just shall enter into it.[157] St Jerome entreated death to open its gates to him. "Death, my sister, if you do not open the door to me, I cannot enter to enjoy my Lord."[158] Seeing in his house a picture which represented a skeleton with a scythe in the hand, St Charles Borromeo sent for a painter, and ordered him to erase the scythe, and to paint a golden key, in order that he might be more and more inflamed with a desire of death, which opens Paradise, and admits us to the vision of God.

If, says St John Chrysostom, a king had prepared for one of his subjects apartments in his own palace, but for the present obliged him to live in a tent, how ardently would the vassal sigh for the day on which he should leave the tent to enter into the palace.[159] In this life the soul, being in the body, is as it were confined in a prison which it must leave in order to enter the celestial palace. Hence, David prayed to the Lord to bring his soul out of prison.[160] "As if detained by necessity, he," says St Ambrose, "begs to be dismissed." The Apostle desired the same grace when he said: I am straitened, having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ.[161]

How great was the joy of the cup-bearer of Pharaoh when he heard from Joseph that he should soon be rescued from the prison and restored to his situation! And will not a soul that loves God exult with gladness at hearing that it will soon be released from the prison of this earth, and go to enjoy God? "While we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord. "[162] While the soul is united to the body, it is at a distance from the vision of God, as if in a strange land, and excluded from its true country. Hence, according to St Bruno, the departure of the soul from the body should not be called death, but the beginning of life.[163]

Hence, the death of the saints is called their birthday; because at death they are born tot hat life of bliss which will never end. St Anthanasius says: "To the just, death is only a passage to eternal life."[164] "O amiable death," says St Augustine, "who will not desire thee, who art the end of evils, the close of toils, the beginning of everlasting repose?[165] Hence the holy Doctor frequently prayed for death, that he might see God.[166]

The sinner, as St Cyprian says, has just reason to fear death; because he will pass from temporal to eternal death.[167] But he who is in the state of grace, and hopes to pass from death to life, fears not death. In the life of St John the Almoner, we read that a certain rich man recommended to the prayers of the saint an only son, and gave the saint a large sum of money to be distributed in alms, for the purpose of obtaining from God a long life for his son. The son died soon after; but when the father complained of his death, God sent an angel to say to him: "You sought for your son a long life; he now enjoys eternal life in heaven." This is, as was promised by the Prophet Osee, the grace which Jesus Christ merited for us. O death, I shall be thy death.[168] By dying for us, Jesus has changed death into life. When Pionius, the Martyr was brought to the stake, he was asked by those who conducted him, how he could go to death with so much joy. "You err," replied the saint: "I go not to death, but to life." [169] Thus, also, the mother of the youthful St Symphorian exhorted him to martyrdom, "My son," said she, "life is not taken away from you; it is only exchanged for a better one."

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O God of my soul! I have hitherto dishonoured Thee by turning my back upon Thee; but Thy Son has honoured Thee by offering to Thee the sacrifice of his life on the cross. Through the honour which Thy beloved Son has given Thee, pardon the dishonour which I have done Thee. I am sorry, O Sovereign Good! For having offended Thee; and I promise henceforth to love nothing but Thee. From Thee I hope for salvation; whatever good is in me at present is the fruit of Thy grace; to Thee I ascribe it all. By the grace of God, I am what I am.[170] If I have hitherto dishonoured Thee, I hope to honour Thee for eternity by blessing and praising Thy mercy forever. I feel a great desire to love Thee. This Thou hast given me: I thank Thee for it, O, my love! Continue, continue the aid which Thou hast begun to give me. I hope to be henceforth Thine, and entirely Thine. And what greater pleasure can I enjoy than that of pleasing Thee, my Lord! Who art so amiable, and who hast loved me so tenderly! O my God! I ask only love, love, love: and hope always to ask of Thee, love love, until, dying in Thy love, I reach the kingdom of love, where, without evermore asking it, I shall be full of love, and never for a single moment cease to love Thee for all eternity, and with all my strength. Mary, my Mother! Who lovest thy God so intensely, and who desirest so vehemently to see him loved, obtain for me the grace to love him ardently in this life, that I may love him ardently forever in the next.

Consideration IX

PEACE OF THE JUST AT THE HOUR OF DEATH

"The souls of the just are in the hands of God, and the torment of death shall not touch them. In the sight of the unwise, they seemed to die; but they are in peace"—Wis. iii. I, etc.

FIRST POINT

THE JUST HAVE NOTHING TO FEAR AT THE HOUR OF DEATH

THE souls of the just are in the hands of God. If God holds fast in his hands the souls of the just, who can snatch them from him? It is true that hell does not cease to tempt and attack even the saints at the hour of death; but is also true that God does not cease to assist, and to multiply helps to his faithful servants, whenever their danger is increased. There, says St Ambrose, There is greater aid, where there is greater peril, because God is a helper in due time.[171] David also assures us in the Psalms: A helper in time of tribulation.[172] The servant of Eliseus was struck with terror when he saw the city encompassed with enemies; but the saint inspired him with courage, saying: Fear not: for there are more with us than with them.[173] He then showed him an army of angels sent by God to defend the city. The devil will come to tempt the dying Christian; but his angel-guardian will come to strengthen him: his holy advocates will come—St Michael, whom God has appointed to defend his faithful servants in their last combat with hell, will come; the divine Mother will come to chase away the devils, and to protect her servant; above all, Jesus Christ will come to guard against every temptation of hell, the innocent or penitent sheep for whose salvation he has given his life. He will give that confidence and strength of which the soul shall stand in need in that last struggle with its enemies. Hence, full of courage, it will say: The Lord became my helper.[174] The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?[175] God, says Origen, is more solicitous for our salvation than the devil is for our perdition; for the Lord loves our souls far more than the devil hates them.[176]

God is faithful, says the Apostle; he does not permit us to be tempted above our strength.[177] But you will say: Many saints have died with great fear of being lost. I answer: we have but few examples of persons who, after leading a holy life, died with fears for their eternal salvation. Belluacensis says that, to purify them at the hour of death from some defect, God sometimes permits holy souls to be disturbed by such fears.[178] But generally the servants of God have died with a joyful countenance. At death the judgement of God excites fear in all; but if sinners pass from terror to despair, the saints rise from fear to confidence. St Antonine relates that in a severe illness, St Bernard trembled through fear of judgement, and was tempted to despair. But thinking of the merits of Jesus Christ, he drove away all fear, saying to his Saviour: Thy wounds are my merits.[179] St Hilarion also was seized with fear; but he said: "Go forth, my soul; what do you fear? For near seventy years you have served Christ; and are you now afraid of death?"[180] As if he said: My soul, what do you fear? Have you not served a God who is faithful, and knows not how to abandon at death the Christian who has been faithful to him during life? Fr Joseph Scamacca, of the Society of Jesus, being asked if in dying he felt confidence in God, said: "Have I served Mahomet, that I should now doubt of the goodness of my God, or of his desire to save me?"

Should the though of having offended God at some time of our life molest us at death, let us remember that he has protested that he forgets the iniquities of all penitent sinners. If the wicked do penance—I will not remember all his iniquities.[181] But you may ask: How can I be secure of having received pardon from God? St Basil asks the same question: "How can any one be certain that God has forgiven his sins?"[182] "He can be certain of pardon," answered the saint, "if he say: I have hated and abhorred iniquity."[183] He who detests sin, can rest secure of having obtained pardon from God. The heart of man cannot exit without loving some object; it must love creatures or God. If it loves not creatures, it loves God. And who are they that love God? All who observe His commands. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me.[184] He then who dies in the observance of the commandments, dies in the love of God; and he that loves fears not, Charity casteth out fear.[185]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Jesus! When will the day arrive on which I can say: My God! I can never lose Thee? When shall I see Thee face to face, and be sure of loving Thee with all my strength for eternity? Ah, my Sovereign Good, my only love! As long as I have life, I shall be in danger of offending Thee and of losing Thy grace. There has been an unhappy time when I did not love Thee, but, on the contrary, despise Thy love. I am sorry for it with my whole soul, and hope that Thou hast already pardoned me. I now love Thee with my whole heart, and desire to do all in my power to love and please Thee. But I am still in danger or refusing Thee my love, and of again turning my back upon Thee. Ah, my Jesus, my life and my treasure! Do not permit it. Should this misfortune ever happen to me, take me this moment out of life by the most cruel of deaths; I am content to suffer such a death, and I entreat Thee to send me such a death, sooner than permit me ever to cease to love Thee. Eternal Father! Fort he love of Jesus Christ, do not abandon me to so great an evil. Chastise me as Thou wishest, I deserve and accept any chastisement Thou pleasest to inflict upon me: but preserve me from the punishment of seeing myself deprived of Thy grace and of Thy love. My Jesus! Recommend me to Thy Father. Mary, my Mother! Recommend me to Thy Son; obtain for me perseverance in his friendship and the grace to love Him; and then do with me what thou pleasest.

SECOND POINT

THE JUST DIE IN A SWEET PEACE

The souls of the just are in the hand of God, and the torment of death shall not touch them. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die; . . . but they are in peace.[186] In the eyes of the unwise the servants of God appear to die, as worldlings do, in sorrow and with reluctance. But God knows well how to console his children in their last moments; and even in the midst of the pains of death he infuses into their souls certain sweetnesses, as foretastes of Paradise, which he will soon bestow upon them. As they who die in sin begin to experience on the bed of death certain foretastes of hell, certain remorse, terrors, and fits of despair; so, on the other hand, the saints, by the frequent acts of divine love which they then make, by their ardent desire and firm hope of soon possessing God, begin to feel that peace which they will afterwards fully enjoy in heaven. To the saints death is not a punishment, but a reward. When He shall give sleep to His beloved, behold the inheritance of the Lord.[187] The death of the Christian that loves God is called, not death, but sleep, thus he shall be able to say less, In peace in the self-same I will sleep and I will rest.[188]

Fr Suarez died with so much peace, that in his last moments he exclaimed: "I could never imagine that death would be so sweet."[189] When Cardinal Baronius was advised by his physician not to fix his thoughts so much on death, he said: "Perhaps you think I am afraid of dead. I fear it not; but on the contrary, I love it." In going to death for the faith, the Cardinal of Rochester, as Saunders relates, put on his best clothes, saying that he was going to a nuptial feast. Hence at the sight of the scaffold he threw away his stuff, and said: "O my feet! Walk fast; we are not far from Paradise."[190] Before death he intoned the "Te Deum," to thank God for giving him the grace to die a martyr for the holy faith; and, full of joy, he laid his head on the block. St Francis of Assisi began to sing at the hour of death, and invited the brethren to join him. Br Elias said to him: "Father, at death we ought rather to weep than to sing." "But," replied the saint, "I cannot abstain from singing; for I see that I shall soon go to enjoy my God." A young nun of the order of St Teresa, in her last illness said to her sisters in religion who stood round her bed in tears. "O God! Why do you weep? I go to enjoy my Jesus. If you love me, rejoice with me."

Fr Granada relates that a certain sportsman found a solitary infected with leprosy, singing in his last agony. "How," said the sportsman, "can you sing in such a state?" "Brother," replied the hermit, "between me and God there is nothing but the wall of this body. I now see that my flesh is falling off—that the prison wilt soon be destroyed, and that I shall go to see my God. It is for this reason that I rejoice and sing." The desire of seeing God made St Ignatius the Martyr say that if the wild beasts should not take away his life he would provoke them to devour him.[191] St Catharine of Genoa could not bear to hear death called a misfortune. Hence she would say: "Oh! beloved death, in what a mistaken light are you viewed! Why do you not come to me? I call on you night and day." St Teresa desired death so vehemently that she regarded the continuation of life as death: hence she composed the celebrated hymn, I die because I do not die. Such is death to the saints.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my supreme good, my God! If for the past I have not loved Thee, I now turn to Thee with my whole soul. I take leave of all creatures, and chose Thee, my most amiable Lord for the sole object of my love. Tell me what Thou wishest from me: I will do all Thou desirest. I have offended Thee enough. I wish to spend all the remaining moments of life in pleasing Thee. Give me grace to compensate by my love my past ingratitude, which has continued to this moment. I deserve to burn in the fire of hell for so many years; Thou hast sought after me, and hast drawn me to Thyself. Make me now burn with the fire of Thy holy love. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! Thou justly claimest all the affections of my heart; for Thou hast loved me more than all others have loved me. Thou alone deservest my love; Thou only do I wish to love. I desire to do everything in my power to please Thee. Do with me whatsoever Thou wishest. For me it is enough to love Thee and to be loved by Thee. Mary, my Mother! Assist me; pray to Jesus for me.

THIRD POINT

THE JUST IN DYING HAVE A FORETASTE OF CELESTIAL JOY

And how can he fear death, says St Cyprian, who hopes to receive a kingly crown in Paradise! "Let us not be afraid to be put to death when we are certain that we shall be crowned after death."[192] How can he fear death when he knows that by dying in the state of grace his body will become immortal? This moral must put on immortality.[193] He that loves God and desires to see Him, regards life as a punishment and death as a source of joy, says St Augustine.[194] And St Thomas of Villanova says that death, if it fins a man sleeping, comes like a thief, robs him, kills him, and casts him into the pit of hell. But if it finds him watching, it comes as an ambassador from God, and salutes him, saying: "The Lord expects you to the nuptial feast: come; I will conduct you to the happy kingdom for which you sigh."[195]

Oh! With joy does he expect death who finds himself in the grace of God, and hopes soon to see Jesus Christ, and to hear from him these consoling words: Well done, good and faithful servant; because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many.[196] Oh, what consolation will he then receive from his works of penance, his prayers, his detachment from earthly goods and from all he has done for God! Say to the just man, that it is well; for he shall eat the fruit of his doing.[197] Then he who has loved God will taste the fruit of all his holy works. Hence, in hearing that a religious, his friend, died in sentiments of fervent piety, Fr Hyppolitus Durazzo, of the Society of Jesus, wept not, but exulted with joy and gladness. But, says, St John Chrysostom, would it not be most unreasonable to believe that heaven is eternal, and to pity those who go to that kingdom of delights?[198] What special consolation will the just man receive at the hour of death from the devotions performed in honour of the Mother of God, from the Rosaries he has recited, from his visits to her image, from his fasts on Saturdays, from his frequent attendance at her Confraternities! Mary is called the faithful Virgin. Oh, how great is her fidelity in consoling her faithful servants at the hour of death! A certain person devoted to the Most Holy Virgin said in h is last moments to Fr Binetti: "Father, you cannot conceive the consolation which the thought of having served Mary infuses at the hour of death. O my Father! If you knew the happiness I feel on account of having served this Mother. I am not able to express it." How great will be the joy of him who has loved Jesus Christ—who has often received him in the Holy Communion, when he see his Lord entering his room in the Most Holy Viaticum, and coming to accompany him in his passage to eternity! Happy he who then be able, with St Philip Neri, to say to his Saviour: "Behold my love! Behold my love! Give me my love."

But you will, perhaps, say: Who knows what shall be my lot? Who knows but I shall die an unhappy death? Of you who speak in this manner, I ask what is it that causes a bad death? Nothing but sin. We should then fear sin only, and not death, but of life.[199] With him that feareth the Lord, it shall go well in the latter end.[200]

Fr Colombière held it to be morally impossible that the man who has been faithful to God during life should die a bad death. And before him, St Augustine said: "He who has die fears no death, however sudden."[201] The just men, if he be prevented with death, shall be in rest.[202] Since we cannot go to enjoy God without passing through death, St John Chrysostom exhorts us to offer to God what we are obliged to give him.[203] And let us be persuaded that they who offer their death to God, make the most perfect act of divine love which it is in their power to perform; because, by cheerfully embracing that kind of death which God is pleased to send, and at the time and in the manner in which God sends it, they render themselves like the holy martyrs. He who loves God should desire and sigh after death; because it unites him forever to God, and delivers him from the danger of losing God. He who does not desire to see God speedily, and to be secure against the possibility of ever losing God, shows that he has but little love for God. Let us, during life, love him to the utmost of our power. We should make use of life only to advance in divine love: the measure o f our love of God at death will be the measure of our love for him in a happy eternity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My Jesus! Bind me to Thyself so that I may never more be separated from Thee. Make me entirely Thine before I die, that I may see Thee appeased, O my Redeemer! The first time I behold Thee. Thou didst seek after me when I fled away from Thee: ah! Do not cast me off, now that I seek after Thee. Pardon me all the offences I have given Thee. From this day I will think only of serving and loving Thee. Thou hast laid me under too many obligations; Thou hast not refused to give Thy blood and Thy life for the love of me. I would wish to be entirely consumed for the love of Thee. O God of my soul! I wish to love Thee ardently in this live, that I may love Thee ardently in the next. Eternal Father! Draw my whole heart to Thee: detach it from earthly affections: would and inflame my whole soul with Thy holy love. Through the merits of Jesus Christ, hear my prayers. Give me holy perseverance, and grant me the grace always to ask it of Thee. Mary, my Mother! Assist me and obtain for me the grace to ask unceasingly of thy Son the gift of holy perseverance.

Consideration X

MEANS OF PREPARING FOR DEATH

"Remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin."—Eccl. vii.40.

FIRST POINT

NOT TO WAIT TILL THE LAST MOMENT

ALL confess that they must die, and die only once, and that nothing is of greater importance than to die well; because on death depends whether we shall be forever in bliss or forever in despair. All know that our eternal happiness or our eternal unhappiness depends on leading a good or a bad life. How then does it happen that the greater part of Christians live as if they were never to die, or as if to die well or ill were of little moment! They live in sin because they do not think of death. Remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin.[204] We must be persuaded that the hour of death is not fit for settling the accounts of the soul, and securing the great affair of eternal salvation. In worldly matters prudent men take measures in due time to secure temporal gain—to obtain a situation of emolument. To preserve or restore bodily health the necessary remedies are not deferred a single moment. What would you say of the man who should put off his preparation for a trial on which his life depended till the day of trial arrived? Would you not stigmatise as a fool the general who should not begin to lay in a supply of provisions and arms till the city is besieged? Would it not be folly in a pilot to neglect till the time of the tempest, to provide the vessel with an anchor and a helm? Such precisely is the folly of the Christian who neglects to tranquilise his conscience till death arrives.

When sudden calamity shall fall on you, and destruction, as a tempest, then shall they call upon me, and I will not hear, ... Therefore they shall eat the fruit of their own way."[205] The time of death is a time of storm and confusion. At that awful hour sinners call on God for assistance; but they invoke his aid through the fear of hell, which they see at hand, and not with true contrition of heart. It is for this reason that God is deaf to their cry; it is for their reason also that they will then taste the fruit of their wicked life. What they have sown they shall reap.[206] Ah! It will not then be enough to receive the sacraments; it is necessary at death to hate sin, and to love God above all things. But how can he, then, hate forbidden pleasures, who has loved them till that moment? How can he love God above all things, who has till then loved creatures more than he has loved God?

The Lord called the virgins foolish who wished to prepare their lamps when the bridegroom was nigh. All have a horror of a sudden death, because there is no time to settle the accounts of conscience. All confess that the saints have been truly wise, because they prepared for death during life. And what are we doing? Shall we expose ourselves to the danger of preparing for death when it arrives? We ought to do so at present what we shall then wish to have done. Oh! What pain will then arise from the remembrance of time lost, and still more from the remembrance of time spent in sin: time given by God to merit eternal life; but now past, and never to return! What anguish will the sinner feel when he shall be told: You can be steward no longer![207] There is no more time for doing penance, for frequenting the sacraments, for hearing sermons, for visiting Jesus Christ in the Holy Sacrament or for prayer. What is done is done. To make a good confession, to remove several grievous scruples and thus tranquillise the conscience, would require a better state of mind and time more free from confusion and agitation. But time will be no more.[208]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! Had I died on one of the nights known to Thee, where should I be at present? I thank Thee for having waited for me; I thank Thee foal 1those moments which I should have spend in hell from the first moment that I offended Thee. Ah! Give me light, and make me sensible of the great evil I have done Thee in voluntarily losing Thy grace, which Thou didst merit for me by the sacrifice of Thy life on the cross. Ah! My Jesus, pardon me: I am sorry from the bottom of my heart, and above all things, for having despised Thee, who are infinite goodness. Ah! Assist me, O my Saviour! that I may never lose Thee again. Alas, my Lord! If I return again to sin, after so many lights and graces which Thou hast bestowed upon me, I should deserve a hell to be made on purpose for myself. Through the merits of that blood which Thou hast shed for my sake, do not permit me ever more to offend Thee. Give me holy perseverance, give me Thy love. I love Thee and I will never cease to love Thee till death. My God, have mercy on me for the love of Jesus Christ. O Mary, my hope! Do thou too have pity on me; recommend me to God: thy recommendations are never rejected by that God who loves thee so tenderly.

SECOND POINT

PUT OUR CONSCIENCE IN A GOOD STATE, AND REGULATE OUR LIVES

Brother, since it is certain that you will die, go as soon as possible to the foot of the crucifix; thank you crucified Redeemer for the time which in his mercy he gives you to settle the affairs of your conscience; and then review all the irregularities of your past life, particularly of your youth. Cast a glance at the commandments of God: examine yourself on the duties of the state of life in which you have lived, and on the society you have frequented: mark down in writing the sins you have committed; make a general confession of your whole life, if you have not as yet made one. Oh! How much does a general confession contribute to regularity of life in a Christian! Consider that you have to settle accounts for eternity; and take care to adjust them as if you were on the point of rendering these accounts to Jesus Christ: at judgement. Banish from your heart every sinful affection, and every sentiment of rancour; remove every ground of scruple on account of the injury done to the property or character of others, or of scandal to your neighbour; and resolve to fly from all those occasions in which you should be in danger of losing God. Remember that what now seems difficult will appear impossible at the hour of death.

It is still more important for you to resolve to practise the means of preserving your soul in the grace of God. These means are,—hearing Mass every day, the meditation on the eternal truths, the frequentation of the sacraments of penance and Eucharist at least every eight days, the visit every day to the Most Holy Sacrament, and to an image of the divine Mother, attendance at her confraternity, spiritual reading, examination of conscience every evening, some special devotion to the Blessed Virgin, along with fasting every Saturday in her honour. Above all, resolve to recommend yourself frequently to God, and to the Blessed Virgin, and frequently to invoke, in the time of temptations, the sacred names of Jesus and Mary. These are the names by which you will be able to secure a happy death, and to obtain eternal life.

The practice of these means will be fore you a great sign of your predestination. And as to the past, trust in the blood of Jesus Christ, who now gives you these lights, because he desires your salvation; and trust in the intercession of Mary, who obtains these lights for you. Oh! If you adopt this mode of life, and place great confidence in Jesus and Mary, what aid will you receive from God, and what strength will your soul acquire? Dearly beloved reader, give yourself then instantly to God, who invites you, and begin to enjoy that peace of which you have been hitherto deprived through your own fault. And what greater peace can a soul enjoy than to be able to say, in going to rest at night. Should death come this night, I hope to die in the grace of God! How happy the man who, amid the terrors of thunder or of earthquakes, is prepared to accept death with resignation, should God be pleased to send it!

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Lord! With what fervour do I thank Thee for the light which Thou gavest me! I have so often abandoned Thee and turned my back upon Thee; but Thou hast not abandoned me. Hadst Thou abandoned me I should now be blind, as I have hitherto wished to be; I should be obstinate in my sins, and should not have the desire either to renounce sin or to love Thee. I now feel a great sorrow for having offended Thee, and great desire to be in the state of grace. I feel a hatred of these accursed delights which have made me lose Thy friendship. These sentiments are all graces which come from Thee, and make me hope that Thou wilt pardon and save me. Since, then, after all my sin, Thou hast not abandoned me—since Thou now wishest to save me, behold O Lord! I give myself entirely to Thee. I am sorry, above all things, for having offended Thee; and I propose to lose life a thousand times rather than forfeit Thy grace. I love Thee, o my Sovereign Good1 I love Thee, O my Jesus! Who hast died for me; and I hope in Thy blood, that Thou wilt not permit me to be ever again separated from Thee. O my Jesus! I will never more lose thee. I wish to love Thee always during life. I wish to love Thee at death. I wish to love Thee for all eternity. Preserve me then, O Lord! At all times and increase my love for Thee. This favour I ask through Thy merits. Mary, my hope! Pray to Jesus for me.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST DETACH OURSELVES FROM THE WORLD

It is also necessary to endeavour to be at all times in the state in which we desire to be at death. Blessed are he dead who die in the Lord.[209] St Ambrose says that they die well who, at the hour of death, are found dead to the world; that is, detached from the goods from which death will separate us by force. We ought then, from this moment, to accept the spoliation of our goods, and the separation from relatives and from everything in this world. Unless we do it voluntarily during life, we shall have to do it through necessity at death, but with extreme pain and great danger of eternal perdition. Hence St Augustine says, that to settle during life all temporal matters, and dispose by will of all the goods we shall have to bequeath, contribute greatly to a tranquil death; because when all worldly affairs are already adjusted, the soul may be entirely occupied in uniting itself to God. At that hour, we should think and speak only of God and of Paradise. These last moments are too precious to be squandered in earthly thoughts. At death is completed the crown of the elect; for it is then, perhaps, that they reap the greatest harvest of merits, by embracing, with resignation and love, death and all its pains.

But the Christian, who has not been in the habit of exciting these sentiments during life, will not have them at the hour of death. Hence some devout souls, with great spiritual profit to themselves are accustomed to renew every month, after being at confession and Communion, the Protestation of death along with the Christian acts, imagining themselves at the point of death, and to be near their departure from this world.[210] Unless you do this during life you will find it very difficult to do it at death. In her last illness, that great servant of God, Sister Catharine of St Alberts, of the order of St Teresa, sent forth a sigh, and said, "Sisters, I do not sigh through fear of death, for I have lived for twenty-five years in expectation of it; but I sigh at the sight of so many deluded Christians, who spend their life in sin, and reduce themselves to the necessity of making peace with God at death, when I can scarcely pronounce the name of Jesus."

Examine then, O my brother, if you are now attached to anything on this earth, to any person, to any honour, to your house, to your money, to conversation or amusements; and reflect that you are not immortal. You must one day, and perhaps very soon, take leave of them and thus expose yourself to the risk of an unhappy death? Offer from this moment all to God: tell him you are ready to give up all things whenever he pleases to deprive you of them. If you wish to die with resignation you must from this moment resign yourself to all the contradictions and adversities which may happen to you, and must divest yourself of all affections to earthly things. Imagine yourself on the bed of death, and you will despise all things in this world. "He," says St Jerome, "who always thinks that he is to die, easily despises all things."[211]

If you have not yet chosen a state of life, make choice of that state of life which at death you will wish to have selected, and which will make you die with greater peace. If you have already made choice of a state of life, do now what at death you will wish to have done in that state. Spend every day as if it were the last of your life: and perform every action, every exercise of prayer, make every confession and Communion, as if they were the last of your life. Imagine yourself every hour at the point of death, stretched on a bed, and that you hear that Proficiscere de hoc mundo which announces your departure from this world. Oh! How powerfully will this thought assist you from this earth! Blessed is that servant whom, when his Lord shall come, he shall find him so doing.[212] He who expects death every hour will die well, though death should come suddenly upon him.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Every Christian ought to be prepared to say at the moment the news of death is announced to him: Then, my God, only a few hours remain: during the short remainder of the present life, I wish to love Thee to the utmost of my power, that I may love Thee more perfectly in heaven. But little remains for me to offer to Thee. I offer Thee these pains, and the sacrifice of my life in union with the sacrifice which Jesus Christ offered for me on the Cross. Lord! The pains which I suffer are few and light compared with what I have deserved; such as they are, I embrace them as a mark of the love which I bear Thee. Provided I am to love Thee for eternity. I resign myself to all the punishments which Thou wishest to send me in this or the next life. Chastise me as much as Thou pleases, but do not deprive me of Thy love. I know that, on account of having so often despised Thy love, I deserved never more to love Thee; but Thou canst not reject a penitent soul. I am sorry, O Sovereign Good! for having offended Thee. I love Thee with my whole heart, and place all my trust in Thee. Thy death, O my Redeemer! is my hope. To Thy wounded hands I recommend my soul. Into Thy hands I commend my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of Truth. [213] O my Jesus, Thou hast given Thy blood for my salvation: do not suffer me to be separated from Thee. I love Thee, O eternal God, and hope to love Thee for eternity. Mary, my Mother, assist me at the awful moment of death. To thee I now consign my spirit: to thee I recommend myself. Deliver me from hell.

Consideration XI

VALUE OF TIME

"Son, observe the time."—Eccl. iv. 23.

FIRST POINT

TIME IS A TREASURE OF THE EARTH

SON, says the Holy Ghost, be careful to preserve time, which is the greatest and the most precious gift which God can bestow upon you in this life. The very pagans knew the value of time. Seneca said that no price is an equivalent for it.[214] But the saints have understood its value still better. According to St Bernardine of Sienna, a moment of time is of as much value as God; because in each moment a man can, by acts of contrition or of love, acquire the grace of God and eternal glory.[215]

Time is a treasure which is found only in this life; it is not found in the next, either in hell or in heaven. In hell the damned exclaim with tears: Oh! That an hour was given to us![216] They would pay any price for an hour of time, in which they might repair their ruin: but this hour they will never have. In heaven there is no weeping; but were the saints capable of weeping, all their tears would arise from the thought of having lost the time in which they could have acquired greater glory, and from the conviction that this time will never again be given to them. A deceased Benedictine nun appeared in glory to a certain person, and said that she was perfectly happy, but that if she would desire anything, it would be to return to life, and to suffer pains and privations in order to merit an increase of glory. She added that, for the glory which corresponds to a single Ave Maria, she would be content to endure till the day of judgement the painful illness which caused her death.

My brother, how do you spend your time? Why do you always defer till tomorrow what you can do to-day? Remember that the time which is past is no longer yours: the future is not under your control: you have only the present for the performance of good works. "Why, O miserable man," says St Bernard, "do you presume on the future, as if the Father had placed time in your power?"[217] St Augustine asks: "How can you, who are not sure of an hour, promise yourself tomorrow?"[218] If then, says St Teresa, you are not prepared for death to-day; tremble lest you die an unhappy death.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my God! I thank Thee for the time which Thou givest me to repair the disorders of my past life. Were I to die at this moment, the remembrance of the time I have lost should be one of my greatest torments. Ah, my Lord! Thou hast given me time to love Thee, and I have spent it in offending Thee. I deserve to be sent to hell from the first moment in which I turned my back upon Thee; but Thou hast called me to repentance, and hast pardoned me. I promised to offend Thee no more; but how often have I returned to sin? How often hast Thou pardoned my ungrateful relapses? Blessed forever be Thy mercy! If it were not infinite, how couldst Thou have had so much patience with me? Who could have borne with me so long> Oh! How sorry do I feel for having offended so good a God! My Saviour! The patience alone with which Thou didst wait for me ought to enamour me of Thee. Ah! Do not suffer me to live any longer ungrateful to the love Thou hast had for me. Detach me from every creature, and draw me entirely to Thyself. O my God! I will no longer dissipate the time Thou givest me to repair the evil that I have done; I will spend it all in serving and loving Thee. Give me holy perseverance. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness, and hope to love Thee for eternity. I thank Thee, O Mary! By they advocacy thou hast obtained for me this time which is given to me. Assist me now, and obtain for me the grace to spend it all in loving thy Son, my Redeemer, and in loving thee, my Queen and my Mother.

SECOND POINT

NEGLECT OF TIME

There is nothing more precious that time; but there is nothing less esteemed and more despised by men of the world. This is what St Bernard deplores when he says: Nothing is more precious than time, but nothing is regarded more cheaply."[219] The same saint adds: "The days of salvation pass away, and no one reflects that the day which has passed away from him can never return."[220] You will see a gambler spend nights and days in play. If you ask him what he is doing, his answer is: I am passing the time. You will see others standing several hours in the street, looking at those who pass by, and speaking on obscene or on useless subjects. If you ask them what they are doing, they will say: We are passing the time. Poor blind sinners! Who lose so many days; but days which never return?

O time despised during life! You will be ardently desired by worldlings at the hour of death. They will then wish for another year, another month, another day; but they will not obtain it: they will then be told that time shall be no longer. How much would they then pay for another week, or another day, to settle the account of their conscience? To obtain a single hour, they would, St Laurence Justinian, give all their wealth and worldly possessions.[221] But this hour shall not be given. The assisting priest shall say to the dying sinner: Hasten, hasten your departure from this world; for your time is no more.

The prophet exhorts us to remember God, and to procure his friendship, before the light fails. Remember Thy Creator. . . . before the sun and the light be darkened.[222] How great the distress and misery of a traveller who, when the night has come, perceives that he has missed the way, and that there is not time to correct the mistake. Such at death will be the anguish of the sinner who has lived many years in the world, and has not spent them for God. The night cometh, when no man can work.[223] For him, death shall be the night in which he will be able to do nothing. He hath called against me the time.[224] Conscience will then remind the worldling of all the time that God gave him, and that he has spent in the destruction of his soul; of all the calls and graces that he has received from God for his sanctification, and that he has voluntarily abused. The sinner will then see that the way of salvation is closed forever. Hence he will weep and say: O fool that I have been! O time lost! O life misspent! O lost years, in which I could have, but have not, become a saint! And now the time of salvation is gone forever. But, of what use are these sighs and lamentations, when the scene is about to close—the lamp on the point of being extinguished—and when the dying sinner has reached that awful moment on which eternity depends?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Jesus! Thou hast spent Thy whole life for the salvation of my soul. There has not been a single moment of Thy life in which Thou hast not offered thyself to the eternal Father to obtain for me pardon and eternal glory. I have been so many years in the world, and how many of them have I hitherto spent for Thee? Ah! All that I remember to have done produces remorse of conscience. The evil has been great, the good very little and all full of imperfections and tepidity, of self-love and forgetfulness of what Thou hast done for me. I have forgotten Thee, but Thou hast not forgotten me; when I fled from Thee, Thou didst follow me, and call me so often to Thy love. Behold me, O Jesus! I will resist no longer. Shall I wait till Thou abandon me? I am sorry, O Sovereign Good! For having separated myself from Thee by sin. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! Worthy of infinite love. Ah! Do not permit me ever again to lose this time, which Thou in Thy mercy givest me. Ah! Remind me always, O my beloved Saviour! Of the love Thou hast borne me, and of the pains Thou hast endured for me. Make me forget all things, that, during the remainder of my life, I may think only of loving and pleasing Thee. I love Thee, my Jesus, my love, my all! I promise, whenever Thou remindest me, to make acts of love. Give me holy perseverance. I place all my confidence in the merits of Thy blood. I also trust in thy intercession, O my dear Mother, Mary.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST PROFIT BY THE TIME

Walk whilst you have light.[225] We must walk in the way of the Lord during life, now that we have light; for, at the hour of death this light is taken away. Death is not the time for preparing, but for finding ourselves prepared. Be ye ready. At the hour of death we can do nothing: what is then done is done. O God! Were a person told that in a short time a trial should take place, on which would depend his life and his entire property, with what hast would he seek an able counsel to plead his cause! How little time would he lose in adopting every means of securing a favourable result! And what are we doing? We know for certain that the most important of all causes—the affair of eternal salvation—will soon be decided; the decision may take place every hour, and still we lost time.

Some may say: I am young; I will hereafter give myself to God. But remember that, as the Gospel remarks, the Lord cursed the fig-tree the first time he found if without fruit, although the season for figs had not arrived. By this Jesus Christ wished to signify that men should at all times, even in youth, bring forth fruits of good works; otherwise they will be accursed, and will never more bring forth fruit. May no man hereafter eat fruit of thee any more forever.[226] Such the malediction of the Redeemer on the fruitless fig-tree; such is his malediction against all who resist his calls. Satan regards the whole time of our life as short, and, therefore, in tempting us he loses not a moment. The devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time.[227] Then the devil loses no time in seeking our perdition; and shall we lose the time given to us to secure our salvation?

Some will say, What evil am I doing? O God, is it not an evil to lose time in gaming, in useless conversations, which are unprofitable to the soul? Does God give you time, that you may squander it? No: the Holy Ghost says, Defraud not thyself of the good day, and let not the part of a good gift overpass thee.[228] The workmen mentioned by St Matthew, though they did no evil, but only lost time, were rebuked by the master of the vineyard. Why stand ye here all the day idle?[229] On the day of judgement Jesus Christ will demand an account of every idle word. All the time that is not spent for God is lost time. "Believe," says St Bernard, "that you have lost all the time in which you have not thought of God."[230] Hence the Holy Ghost says, Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it earnestly, for neither work nor reason shall be in hell, whither thou art hastening.[231] The Venerable Sister Jane of the Most Holy Trinity, of the Order of St Teresa, used to say that, in the lives of the saints, there is no to-morrow. To-morrow is found in the lives of sinners, who always say: Hereafter, hereafter; and in this state they continue till death. Behold, now is the acceptable time.[232] To-day, if you shall hear his voice, hardens not your hearts.[233] If God call you to-day to do good, do it; for to-morrow it may happen that for you time will be no more, or that God will call you no more.

If you have hitherto spent the time in offending God, endeavour, like King Ezechias, to weep, during the remainder of your life, over your misspent years. I will recount to Thee all my years in the bitterness of my soul.[234] God spares your life that you may repair the time you have lost.[235] In explaining this passage, St Anselm says: "You will redeem the time if you do what you have neglected to do."[236] Of St Paul, St Jerome says that, though the last of the apostles, he was, on account of his great labours after he was called, the first in merits. Let us reflect that at each moment of time we may acquire new treasures of eternal riches. Were all the land round which you could walk, or all the money which you could count in a day, promised to you, would you not hasten to walk over the ground, or to count the money? At each moment you can acquire eternal treasures: will you, notwithstanding, squander your time? Say not what you can do to-day you will be able to do to-morrow; for this day will then be lost, and never return. When his companions spoke of the world, St Francis Borgia conversed with God by holy affections; and so recollected was he, that when his opinion was asked on the subject of conversation, he knew not what to answer. Being corrected for this, he said: "I would rather be regarded stupid and unlearned, than lose time."

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

No, my God, I will no longer lose the time which Thou in Thy mercy givest me. I should at this hour be in hell weeping without fruit. I thank Thee for having preserved my life: I wish during the remainder of my days to live only for Thee. Were I now in hell I should weep in despair, and without profit: I will now bewail the offences I have offered to Thee; and if I weep over them, I know for certain that Thou wilt pardon me. Of this the prophet assures me: Weeping, thou shalt not weep; He will surely have pity on thee?[237] Were I in hell, I could never more love Thee; and now I love Thee, and hope always to love Thee. Were in hell, I could ask no more graces; but now I hear Thee say: Ask, and ye shall receive. Since, then, I still have time to ask Thy graces, O God of my soul! I ask two graces: give me perseverance in They grace; give me Thy love; and then do with me what Thou pleasest; grant that in all the remaining moments of my life I may always recommend myself to Thee, saying: Lord! Assist me; have mercy on me; grant that I may never more offend Thee; make my love Thee. Most Holy Mary, my Mother! Obtain for me the grace always to recommend myself to God, and to ask hi, for perseverance and for his holy love.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SALVATION

"But we entreat ye, brethren . . . that you attend to your own business."—I Thess. .iv. 10,11.

FIRST POINT

SALVATION IS OUR OWN IMPORTANT AFFAIR

THE business of eternal salvation is to us the most important of all affairs; but it is also the most neglected by Christians. They are diligent, and lose no time in seeking to gain a lawsuit, or a situation of emolument. How many measures taken to attain these objects? How many means adopted? They neither eat nor sleep. And what efforts do they make to secure their eternal salvation? How do they live? To save their souls, the greater number of Christians do nothing; on the contrary, they do everything to bring their souls to perdition; they live as if death, judgement, hell, heaven, and eternity were not truths of faith, but fables invented by the poets. If a person loses a lawsuit, or a harvest crop, how great is his pain and distress of mind? With what deal does he labour to repair the loss? If worldlings lose a horse, or a dog, with what diligence do they seek after it? But if they lose the grace of God, they sleep, and jest, and laugh. All blush at being told that they neglect their worldly affairs, but how few are ashamed to neglect the business of eternity, which is the most important of all. The worldling says that the saints were truly wise, because they sought only the salvation of their souls, and still be attends to all worldly business, but utterly neglects the concerns of the soul. Brethren, says St Paul, let the great business of your eternal salvation be the sole object of all your care.[238] This is to you the most important of all affairs. Let us then be persuaded that eternal salvation is for us the most important affair,—the only affair,—and that if once neglected it is an irreparable affair if we ever make a mistake.

It is the most important affair, because if the soul be lost, all is lost. We ought to set a higher value on the soul than on all the goods of the earth. "The soul," says St John Chrysostom, "is more important than the whole world!"[239] To be convinced of this truth, it is enough to know that God himself has condemned his Son to death in order to save our souls. The Eternal Word has not refused to purchase them with his own blood.[240] Hence a holy Father says that man appears to be of as much value as God.[241] Hence Jesus Christ has asked: What exchange shall a man give for his soul?[242] For God so loved the world as to give His only Begotten Son.[243] If then such is the value of the soul, for what earthly good shall a man exchanged and lose it?

St Philip Neri with reason could say that he who does not attend to the salvation of his soul is a fool. Were there on this earth two classes of men? One mortal and the other immortal, and were the former to see the latter seeking after the things of this world, its honour, goods, and amusements, they should certainly exclaim: O fools that you are! You have it in your power to acquire eternal riches, and do you fix your thoughts on those miserable and transitory things? Will you, for these, condemn yourselves, to an eternity of torments in the next life? Leave us, for whom all shall end at death, to seek after these earthly goods. But no; we are immortal. How then does it happen that so many lose their souls for the miserable pleasures of this life? How does it come to pass, says Salvian that Christians believe in judgement, hell and eternity, and still live as if they feared them not?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! How have I spent so many years which Thou hast given me in order to secure my eternal salvation? Thou, my Redeemer, hast purchased my soul with Thy blood, and hast consigned it to me that I might attend to its salvation; and I have laboured only for its perdition by offending Thee who hast loved me so tenderly. I thank Thee for giving me time to be able to repair the great loss which I have suffered. I have lost my soul and Thy grace. Lord! I am sorry with my whole heart for my past offences, and I resolve, henceforth, to lose everything, even my life, rather than forfeit Thy friendship. I love Thee above all things, and I resolve always to love thee, my Sovereign Good! Who are worthy of infinite love. Assist me, my Jesus, that this purpose may not be like my past resolutions, to which I have been always unfaithful. Take me out of life rather than suffer me ever again to offend Thee or ever to cease to love Thee. O Mary, my hope, after Jesus, save me by obtaining for me holy perseverance.

SECOND POINT

SALVATION IS OUR OWN AFFAIR

The affair of eternal salvation is not only the most important, but it is the only affair to which we have to attend in this life. One thing is necessary.[244]St Bernard weeps over the blindness of Christians, who call the occupations of children trifles, and their own employments business. If the amusements of children be trifles, the employments of men are still greater follies. What, says the Redeemer, will it profit us to gain the whole world if we lose our souls?[245] My brother, if you save your soul, it will do you no harm to have lived here in poverty, afflictions, and contempt; for then you will have no more sorrows, and you will be happy for all eternity. But if you lose your soul, what will it profit you, in hell, to have indulged in all the amusements of the world, and to have enjoyed its riches and honours? If the soul be lost, amusements, riches and honours are lost—all is lost.

What answer will you give on the day of account? Were a king to send an ambassador to a city to transact some important business, and were legate, instead of attending to the charge intrusted to him, to spend all his time in banquets, comedies, and festivities, and thus injure the rights of his master, what account would the Sovereign demand of him at his return? But, O God! How strict must be the account which the Lord will exact of him who, after being placed in this world, not to indulge in amusements, nor to acquire wealth and dignity, but to save his soul, has attended to everything except to his own salvation? Worldlings think of the present, but not of the future. St Philip Neri conversing one day in Rome with Francis Zazzera, a young man of talent, who was attached to the world, said to him: "You will realise a great fortune; you will be a prelate, afterward, perhaps, a cardinal, and perhaps even Pope. But what must follow? What must follow? Go," said the saint, "and mediate on these last words." Francis went home, and after reflecting on the words what must follow? What must follow? He abandoned his secular pursuits, left the world, entered into the Congregation of St Philip and began to attend only to God.

It is our only affair, because we have but one soul. A prince asked, through his ambassador, a favour of Benedict XII, which could not be granted without sin. In answer, the Pope said—"Tell the prince that I if had two souls, I might, perhaps, lose one of them for him, and reserve the other for myself; but since I have but one, I cannot and will not lose it." St Francis Xavier used to say that there is but one good and one evil in the world: the former consists in the salvation of the soul, the latter in its damnation. St Teresa used frequently to say to her nuns—"One soul, one eternity." As if she said—One soul; if this be lost, all is lost; one eternity—the soul, if lost once, is lost forever. Hence David said—One thing have I asked of the Lord: this I will seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord.[246] Lord, I ask but one favour—save my soul and I ask nothing else.

With fear and trembling, work out your salvation.[247] He that does not fear and tremble for his salvation will not be saved: to save the soul, it is necessary to labour, and to do violence to nature. The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent bear it away.[248] To obtain eternal glory, our life must be found at death conformable to the life of Jesus Christ. Hence we must be careful, on the one hand, to avoid the occasions of sin; and, on the other, to adopt the means necessary for the attainment of eternal life. All would wish to be saved without trouble. "The devil," says St Augustine, "sleeps not, but labours strenuously for your perdition; and will you slumber when your eternal happiness is at stake?"[249]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! I thank Thee for making me now remain at Thy feet and not in hell, which I have so often deserved. But of what use would the life which Thou hast preserved be to me, should I continue to live without Thy grace. Ah! May this never be! I have turned my back upon Thee; I have lost Thee, O my Sovereign Good! I am sorry for it with my whole heart. Oh, that I had died a thousand times, rather than have offended Thee! I have lost Thee; but the prophet tells me that Thou art all goodness, and that Thou art easily found by the soul that seeks Thee. If I have hitherto fled away from Thee, I now seek Thee, and seek nothing but thee. I love Thee with all the affections of my heart. Accept me. Do not disdain to give Thy love to a soul that has at one time despised Thee. Teach me what I must do in order to please Thee; I am ready and willing to do it. Ah, my Jesus! Save this soul, for which Thou hast given Thy blood and Thy life; and in order to save me, give me the grace always to love Thee in this and in the next life. This grace I hope for through Thy merits. For this I also hope, O Mary, through thy intercession.

THIRD POINT

A FAILURE IN SAVING ONE'S SOUL IS AN IRREMEDIABLE EVIL

Important affair! Only affair! Irreparable affair! No error, says St Eucherius, can be compared with the error of neglecting eternal salvation. For all other errors there is a remedy: if you lose property in one way, you may recover it in another; if you lose a situation, there may be some means of afterwards regaining it; if you soon lose your life, provided your soul be saved, all is safe. But if you lose your soul the loss is irreparable. Death happens but once; the soul, if once lost, is lost forever. Nothing remains but to weep for eternity with the other miserable wretches in hell, where their greatest torment consists in the conviction, that the time of repairing their ruin is gone forever. The summer is over, and we are not saved.[250] Ask the worldly wise who are now in the pit of fire, what are their present sentiments; ask them if, now that they are condemned to that eternal prison, they feel happy at having made a fortune in this life. Listen to their wailing and lamentation: We have erred.[251] But of what use is it to know their error, now that there is no remedy for their eternal damnation? Should a man who could have preserved his palace at a small expense find it in ruins, how great would be his pain in reflecting on his own negligence, and on the impossibility of repairing the evil!

The greatest torment of the damned consists in the thought of having lost their soul, and of being damned through their own fault. Destruction is thy own, O Israel; thy help is only in me.[252] St Teresa says that if a person loses through his own fault a ring or even a trifle, his peace is distributed; he neither eats nor sleeps. O God! How great will be the torture of the damned Christian when, on entering hell and finding himself shut up in that dungeon of torments, he reflects on his misfortune, and sees that for all eternity there will be no relief, no mitigation of pain! He will say, "I have lost my soul, paradise and God; I have lose all forever! And why? Through my own fault."

But you will say—If I commit this sin, why should I not expect to escape damnation? I may still be saved. Yes; but you may also be damned; and it is more likely that you will be lost, for the Scriptures menace eternal woes to all obstinate traitors, such as you are in your present dispositions. Woe to you, apostate children, saith the Lord.[253] Woe to them, for they have departed from me.[254] By committing this sin, you at least expose your eternal salvation to great danger. And is this an affair to be exposed to risk? There is not question of a house, of a villa, or of a situation: there is question, says St John Chrysostom, of being sent into an eternity of torments, and of losing an eternity of glory. And will you risk on a perhaps this business of sovereign importance?

You say: Perhaps I shall not be lost: I hope that God will hereafter pardon me. But what happens in the mean time? You condemn yourself to hell. Tell me, would you cast yourself into a deep pool of water, saying, perhaps I shall not be drowned? Surely you would not; why then should not trust your eternal salvation to such a groundless hope, to a perhaps? Oh! How many has this accursed hope sent to hell! Do you not know that the hope of those who are obstinately determined to commit sin is not hope, but an illusion and presumption which move God not to mercy but to greater wrath? If you say that you are now unable to resist the temptation and passion to whose domination you submit, how will you resist them hereafter, when, by yielding to sin, you strength will not be increased, but greatly diminished? For, on the one hand, your own malice will render you more blind and obdurate; and, on the other, the divine helps will be withheld. Do you expect that the more you multiply sins and insults against God, the more abundantly he will pour upon you his lights and grace?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Jesus! Remind me always of the death Thou hast suffered for me, and give me confidence. I tremble lest the devil should make me despair at death by bringing before my view the many acts of treason I have committed against Thee. How many promises have I made never more to offend Thee after the light Thou hast given me! And after all my promises, I have, with the hope of pardon, again turned my back upon Thee. Then have I insulted Thee because Thou didst not chastise me? My Redeemer! Give me a great sorrow for my sins before I leave this world. I am sorry, O Sovereign Good! For having offended Thee. I promised to die a thousand times rather than abandon Thee. But make me in the mean time feel that Thou hast said to me what Thou didst say to Magdalene—Thy sins are forgiven thee—by giving me, before death, a great sorrow for all my iniquities, otherwise I fear my death will be troubled and unhappy. Be not Thou a terror to me: Thou art my hope in the day of affliction.[255] O my crucified Jesus! Be not a terror to me in my last moments. If I die before I have wept over my sins and have loved Thee, Thy wounds and Thy blood will inspire me with fear rather than with confidence. I do not ask of Thee consolations and earthly good during the remainder of my life, I ask of Thee sorrow and love. O my dear Saviour! Hear my prayer for the sake of that love which made Thee offer Thy life in sacrifice for me on Calvary. Mary, my Mother! Obtain for me these graces, along with holy perseverance till death.

Consideration XIII

THE VANITY OF THE WORLD

"What doth it profits a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?."—*Matt.*xvi.26.

FIRST POINT

THE GOODS OF THIS WORLD ARE USELESS

AN ancient philosopher called Aristippus was once shipwrecked, and lost all his goods. When he reached the shore, the people, through respect for his great learning, presented him with an equivalent of all he had lost. He wrote to his friends, exhorting them to imitate his example, and to seek only the goods which cannot be wrested from them by shipwreck. Now, our relatives and friends who are in eternity exhort us from the other world to attend only to the acquisition of goods which even death cannot take from us. Death is called the day of destruction.[256] It is the day of destruction, because on that day we shall lose all the goods of this earth—its honours, riches and pleasures. Hence, according to St Ambrose, we cannot call the things of this life our goods, because we cannot take them with us to eternity. Our virtues alone accompany us to the next life.[257]

What then, says Jesus Christ, does it profit us to gain the whole world, if, at death, by losing the soul, we lose all? Ah! How many young men has this great maxim sent into the cloister! How many anchorets has it sent to the desert! And how many martyrs has it encouraged to give their life for Jesus Christ! By this maxim St Ignatius of Loyola drew many souls to God, particularly the soul of St Francis Xavier, who was then in Paris, attached to the things of the world. "Francis," said the saint one day, "reflect that the world is a traitor, which promises but does not perform. And though it should fulfil all its promises, it can never content your heart. But let us grant that it did make you happy, how long will this happiness last? Can it last longer than your life; and after death what will you take with you to eternity? Where is the rich man that has ever brought with him a piece of money, or a servant to attend him? What king has ever carried with him a shred of the purple as a badge of royalty?" At these words St Francis abandoned the world, followed St Ignatius and became a saint,

Solomon confessed that whatsoever his eyes desired he refused them not;[258] but, after having indulged in all the pleasures of this earth, he called all the goods of the world vanity of vanities—"vanitas vanitatum." Sr Margaret of St Anne, a Discalced Carmelite, and daughter of the Emperor Rudolph the Second, used to say: "Of what use are kingdoms at the hour of death?" The saints tremble at the thought of the uncertainty of their eternal salvation. Fr Paul Segneri trembled, and, full of terror, said to his confessor: "Father, what do you think—shall I be saved?" St Andrew Avellino trembled, and with a torrent of tears, said: "Who knows whether I shall be saved or lost?" St Louis Bertrand was so much terrified by this thought, that, during the night, in a fit of terror, he sprang out of bed, saying: "Perhaps I shall be lost! And sinners, while they live in a state of damnation, sleep, and jest and laugh!"

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, Jesus, my Redeemer! I thank Thee for making me see my folly and the evil I have done in turning my back on Thee who hast given Thy blood and Thy life for me. Thou didst not deserve to be treated by me as I have treated Thee. Behold! If death now came upon me, what should I find but sins and remorse of conscience, which would make me die with great disquietude! My Saviour! I confess that I have done evil, and committed a great error in leaving Thee, my Sovereign Good! For the miserable pleasures of this world. I am sorry from the bottom of my heart. Ah! Through the sorrow which killed Thee on the Cross, give me a sorrow for my sins, which will make me weep during the remainder of my life over the injuries I have done Thee. My Jesus! Pardon me: I promise to displease Thee no more, and to love Thee forever. I am not worthy of Thy love, which I have hitherto so much despised. But Thou hast said that Thou lovest him who loves Thee. I love Thee; love me, then, O Lord! I do not wish to be any longer in enmity with Thee. I renounce all the grandeurs and pleasures of the world, provided Thou lovest me. Hear me, O my God! for the love of Jesus Christ. He entreats Thee not to banish me from Thy heart. To Thee I consecrate my whole being; to Thee I consecrate my life, my pleasures, my senses, my soul, my body, my will and my liberty. Accept me; reject not my offering, as I have deserved for having so often refused Thy friendship; cast me not away from Thy face. Most Holy Virgin, my Mother, Mary! Pray to Jesus for me. In thy intercession I place unbounded confidence.

SECOND POINT

THE GOODS OF THIS WORLD ARE CONTEMPTIBLE

There is a deceitful balance in his hand.[259] We must weigh things in the balance of God, and not in the deceitful balance of the world. The goods of this life are miserable goods' they do not content the heart; they soon end. My days have been swifter than a post: they have passed by as ships carrying fruits.[260] The days of our life passed and fly away' and of all the pleasures of this earth, what remains? They have passed like a ship, which leaves no trace behind. As a ship that passeth through the waters, whereof it is gone by, the trace cannot be found. [261] Ask so many of the rich and learned of the world, so many princes and emperors who are now in eternity, what they possess of all the pomps, and delights, and grandeur which they enjoyed in this life? They all answer, Nothing, nothing, "O man," says St Augustine, "you attend to what he had here; but attend to what he bring with him."[262] "You," says the saint, "regard only the goods which the rich man possessed; but observe what he takes with him at death—a fetid body and a rag of a garment to rot with him."

After death the great ones of the world are spoken of for a little while; but they are soon forgotten. Their memory hath perished with a noise.[263] And if they have gone to hell, what do they do and say in that place of woe? They weep and say, What hath pride profited us? Or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow. [264] What have our pomps and riches profited us, now that they are passed away like a shadow, and for us nothing remains but eternal torments, wailing and despair?

The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. [265] How prudent are worldings in earthly affairs! What toil do they endure in order to obtain a situation, or to acquire an estate? With what care do they attend to the preservation of bodily health! They adopt the safest means; they select the best physicians, the best remedies, and the purest air. But how careless are they about the concerns of the soul! And it is certain that health, situations and possessions will one day end; but the soul and eternity are everlasting. What do not the unjust, the vindictive, and voluptuous endure in order to attain their wicked objects? And will they refuse to suffer anything for the soul? O God! By the light of the death-candle, at that time of truth, worldlings know and confess their folly. Then they say, Oh, that I had left the world and led a life of sanctity! Pope Leo XI said at the hour of death, "It were better for me to have been porter in my convent than to be Pope." Honorious III also said in his last illness, "It would have been better for me to have remained in the kitchen of my monastery to wash the plates than to be chosen head of the Church." In his dying moments, Philip II, King of Spain, sent for his son, and throwing off his royal robes, showed him his breast eaten away by worms, and said to him, "Prince, behold how we die, and how the grandeurs of this world end. Oh," he exclaimed, "that I had been a lay-brother in some religious community, and had not been king!" He then ordered a cross to be fastened to his neck by means of a cord, and having made all his arrangements for death, he said to his son: "I wished you to be present at this scene, that you may see how the world treats monarchs in the end. Their death is like that of the poorest peasant. In short, he who leads the most holy life is in the greatest favour with God." This same son, who afterward Philip III, dying at the age of forty-three years, said: "My subjects, in the sermon to be delivered at my funeral, preach nothing but this spectacle which you behold: say that to have been king serves at death but to excite regret and pain." He then exclaimed, "Oh, that I had never been a king! Oh, that I have lived in a desert to serve God! I should now go with greater confidence to present myself at his tribunal, and should not now find myself in so much danger of being damned forever." But these desires at the hour of death serve only to increase the anguish and despair of those who have not loved God. Then, says St Teresa, "we should make no account of what ends with life; the true life consists in living in such a manner as not to have any reason to fear death." If then we wish to see the true value of earthly things, let us look at them from the bed of death and say, These honours, these amusements, these revenues will one day have an end; we ought then to labour to become saints, and rich in good which will accompany us to the other world, and which will make us content and happy for all eternity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Redeemer! Thou hast suffered so many pains and ignominies for my sake; and I have loved the pleasures and vanities of this earth to such an excess, that, for the sake of the, I have often trampled on Thy grace. But, since Thou didst not cease to seek after me when I despised Thee, I cannot, O my Jesus! Fear that Thou wilt now cast me away, when I seek and love Thee with my whole heart, and am more sorry for having offended Thee than I should be having suffered every other misfortune. O God of my soul! From this day forward I wish never to offend Thee, even by a venial fault. Make known to me what is displeasing to Thee. I will not, for any earthly good, do what I know to be offensive to Thee. Make known to me what I must do in order to please Thee. I am ready to do it. I wish to love Thee with a true love. I embrace, O Lord! All the pains and crosses which may come to from Thy hands, give me the resignation I stand in need of: here burn, here cut. Chastise me in this life, that in the next I may be able to love Thee for eternity. Mary, my Mother, to thee I recommend my soul, do not ever cease to pray to Jesus for me.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST WORK FOR HEAVEN

The time is short: it remaineth that. . . . they that use this world, be as if they used it not; for the fashion of this world passeth away.[266] What is our life on this earth but a scene, which passes away and ends very soon? The fashion of this world passeth away/[267] "The world," says Cornelius à Làpide. "is like a stage; one generation passes away, another comes." He, who acts the part of a king, takes not the purple with him. Tell me, O villa, O house, how many masters have you had? When the comedy is over, the king is no longer king; the master ceases to be master. You at present are in pos session of such a villa and palace; but death will come and they will pass to other masters.

The affliction of an hour maketh one forget great delights.[268] The gloomy hour of death brings to an end and makes us forget all the grandeur, nobility, and pomp of the world. Casimir, king of Poland, while he sat at a table with the nobles of his kingdom, died in the act of raising a cup to take a draught; and the scene ended for him. In seven days after his election, the Emperor Ceisus was killed, and the scene closed for Censius. Ladislaus, king of Poland, in his eighteenth year, while he was preparing for the reception of his bridge, the daughter of the king of France, was suddenly seized with a violent pain, while soon deprived him of life. Couriers were instantly despatched to announce to her that the scene was over for Ladislaus, and that she might return to France. By mediating on the vanity of the world, Francis Borgia became a saint. At the sight of the Empress Isabella, who had died in the midst of worldly grandeur and in the flower of youth, he, as has been already said, resolved to give himself entirely to God. "Thus, then," he said, "end the grandeurs and crowns of this world: I will henceforth serve a master who can never die."

Let us endeavour to live in such a manner that what was said to the fool in the Gospel may not be said to us at the hour of death: Thou fool, this night do they require thy soul of thee: and whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?[269] Hence, the Redeemer adds: So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.[270] Again he tells you to acquire the riches, not of the world but of God;—of virtues and merits, which are goods which shall remain with you for eternity in heaven. Lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither the rust nor the moth doth consume.[271] Let us then labour to acquire the great treasure of divine love. "What," says St Augustine, "has the rich man, if he has not charity? What does the poor man want, if he has charity?"[272] If a man had all the riches in the world, and has not God, he is the poorest of men. But the poor man, who possesses God, possesses all things. And who are they that possess God? He, says St John, that abideth in charity, abideth in God and God in him.[273]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! I do not wish that the devil should have any longer dominion over my soul: I wish that Thou alone be the lord and master of it. I will renounce all things in order to acquire Thy grace. I esteem it more than a thousand thrones and a thousand kingdoms. And whom shall I love but thee, who art infinitely amiable, who art infinite good, infinite beauty, bounty and love? Hitherto, I have abandoned Thee for the sake of creatures; this is, and always will be, to me a source of sorrow, which will pierce my heart with grief for having offended Thee, who hast loved me with so much tenderness. But since Thou hast favoured me with so many graces, I can no longer bear to see myself without Thy love. O my Lord! Take possession of my whole will and of all that I possess, and do with me what Thou pleasest. If I have hitherto been impatient under adversity, I ask pardon. O my Lord! I will never complain of Thy arrangements; I know that they are all holy, all for my welfare. Treat me, O my God! As Thou wishes; I promis e to be always content, always to thank Thee. Make me love Thee and I ask no more. What goods, what honours, what world can I love? O God! O God! I wish only for God. Happy thou, O Mary! Who didst love nothing in the world but God. Obtain for me the grace to imitate thee, at least during the remainder of my life. In thee I trust.

LIFE IS A JOURNEY TO ETERNITY

"Man shall go into the house of his eternity."—Eccl. xii.5.

FIRST POINT

MAN IS A TRAVELLER ON EARTH

SEEING that on this earth so many miscreants live in prosperity, and that so many saints live in tribulations, the very Gentiles, by the sole and of the light of nature, have known this truth—that, since there is a just God, there must be another life, in which the wicked are punished and the good rewarded. But what the Gentiles learned by the light of reason, we Christian know by faith. We have not here a lasting city, but we seek one that is to come.[274] This earth is not our country; it is for us a place of passage, from which we shall soon go to the house of eternity. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity." The house, then, dear reader, which you inhabit, is not your house; it is a hospital, from which you will soon, and when you least expect, be dislodged. Remember that when the time of death has arrived, you dearest relatives will be the first to banish you from it: and what will be your true house? The house of you body will be a grave, in which it will remain till the day of judgement; but your soul will go to the house of eternity—either to heaven or to hell. St Augustine tells that you are a stranger, a traveller, a spectator. [275] It would be foolishness in a traveller to spend all his patrimony in purchasing a villa or a house in a country through which he merely passes, and which he must leave in a few days. Reflect, says the saint, that in this world you are only on a journey; fix not your affections on what you see; look and pass on, and labour to procure a good house, in which you will have to dwell forever.

Happy you, if you save your soul! Oh! How delightful is heaven! All the princely palaces of this world are but stables compared with the city of paradise, which alone can be called the city of perfect beauty. There you will have nothing to desire; for you will be in the society of the saints, of the divine Mother, and of Jesus Christ, and will be free from all fear of evil; in a word, you will live in a sea of delights, and in unceasing joy, which will last forever. Everlasting joy shall be upon their heads.[276] This joy shall be so great, that at every moment for all eternity it will appear new. But unhappy you, if you are lost! You will be confined in a sea of fire and of torments, in despair, abandoned by all, and without God. And for how long? Perhaps, after the lapse of a hundred thousand years, your pains will have an end? A hundred and a thousand millions of years and ages will pass by, and your hell will always be at its commencement. What are a thousand years compared with eternity? Less than a day which is gone by. A thousand years in thy sight are as yesterday, which is past. [277] Would you wish to know the house which will be your dwelling for eternity? It will be that which you merit, and which you choose for yourself by your works.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Then, O Lord! Behold the house which I have deserved by the life which I led. Alas! It is hell, in which, from the first sin I have committed, I ought to dwell, abandoned by Thee, and without having it ever in my power to love Thee. Blessed forever be Thy mercy, which has awaited for me, and which now gives me time to repair the evil I have done. O my God! I will no longer abuse Thy patience. I am sorry above all things for having offended Thee, not so much because I have merited hell, as because I have outraged Thy infinite goodness. Never more, my God! Never more will I rebel against Thee; I desire death rather than offend Thee. O my Sovereign Good! Were I in dell, I could never love Thee, nor couldst Thou love me. I love Thee, and wish to be loved by Thee; this I do not deserve, but Jesus merits it, because he has offered Himself to Thee in sacrifice on the cross, that Thou mightest be able to pardon and love me. Eternal Father! Give me, then, for the sake of Thy Son, the grace to love Thee and to love Thee intensely. I love Thee, O my Father! Who hast given me Thy Son. I love Thee, O Sin of God! Who didst die for me. I love thee, O Mother of Jesus ! who, by the intercession, hast obtained for me time for repentance. O Mary! Obtain for me sorrow for my sins, the love of God, and holy perseverance.

SECOND POINT

MAN CAN SECURE ETERNAL HAPPINESS

If the tree fall to the south or to the north, in what place soever it shall fall there it shall be.[278] Wheresoever the tree of your soul will fall at death, there will it remain forever. There is no medium; you will be forever a king a heaven, or a slave in hell; forever in bliss, in an ocean of delights, or forever in despair in a pit of torments. In contemplating the fate of the rich glutton, who was esteemed happy in this world because he was rich, but was afterward confined in hell; and the condition of Lazarus, who was regarded to be miserable because he was poor, but was afterward raised to the glory of heaven. St John Chrysostom exclaimed: "O unhappy felicity, which dragged the rich man to eternal misery! O happy infelicity, which brought the poor Lazarus to the happiness of eternity!"[279]

Of what use is it to torture yourself, as some do, saying: Who knows whether I am among the predestined or not? When the tree is cut down, where does it fall? It falls on the side to which it inclines. Brother, to what side do you incline? What sort of life do you lead? Labour always to incline to the south; preserve your soul in the grace of God; fly from sin, and thus you will save your soul, and will be predestined. And in order to avoid sin, keep always before your eyes the thought of eternity, which St Augustine calls "the great thought"[280] This through has led so many young men to abandon the world and to live in deserts, in order to attend only to the care of the soul; and they have secured eternal life. And, now that they are saved, they will rejoice for all eternity at having sought during life nothing but the salvation of their souls.

Fr M Avila converted a certain lady, who lived at a distance from God, by saying to her: "Madam, reflect on these two words—always and never." In consequence of a thought which he had one day of eternity, Fr Paul Segneri could not sleep for several nights; and from that day forward gave himself up to a more rigorous life. Drexelius relates that a certain bishop was encouraged to lead a holy life by the thought of eternity, and by repeating within himself, "I stand every moment at the gate of eternity."[281] A certain monk shut himself up in a cave, an did nothing else but exclaim, O Eternity! O eternity!" He who believes in eternity," said Fr Avila, "and does not become a saint, should be confined in a madhouse."

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! Have mercy on me. I know that in committing sin I condemned myself to an eternity of torments; and I have been content to resist Thy will, and to incur this punishment. Ah, my Lord! Pardon me; I am sorry for my sins from the bottom of my heart. I do not wish ever more to oppose Thy holy will. How miserable should I be, hadst Thou taken me out of life during my career of sin! I should at this moment be condemned to remain forever in hell, to hate Thy will. But now I love it, and wish forever to love it. Teach me and give me strength henceforth to do Thy will. I will no longer resist Thee. O infinite Goodness! This grace only do I ask: Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Enable me to do Thy will perfectly; and I ask nothing more. And what, O my God! Doest Thou desire, but my welfare and my salvation? Ah, eternal Father! Hear my prayer, for the love of Jesus Christ, who has taught me to pray continually to Thee. In his name, I ask this grace—Thy will be done; thy will be done. Happy me if I spend the remainder of my life and if I end my days doing Thy will. O Mary! Happy thou, who hast always done the will of God perfectly! Obtain for me, through thy intercession, the grace to do his will during the remainder of my life.

TJHIRD POINT

MAN SHALL GO INTO THE HOUSE OF HIS ETERNITY

"Man shall go into the house of his eternity."[282] The prophet says man shall go, to show that each shall go to the house to which he wishes to go; he shall not be carried to it, but will go of his own accord. It is certain that God wills the salvation of all men, but he will not save us by force. He has placed before each of us life and death; whichsoever we choose, will be given us.[283] That which he shall choose, shall be given him.[284] Jeremias likewise says, that the Lord has given us two ways in which to walk; one the way to heaven, the other the way of hell. Behold, I set before you the way of life and the way of death."[285] The choice rests with us. But how will he who wishes to walk in the way of hell, be able to reach heaven? All sinners wish for salvation, and in the mean time they, by their own choice, condemn themselves to hell, with the hope of being afterward saved. But, who, says St Augustine, can be found, so foolish as to take poison with the hope of escaping death?[286] And still so many Christians, so many fools, kill their souls by sin, saying: I will hereafter think of a remedy. O delusion, which has sent so many souls to hell!

Let us not be so foolish; let us reflect that eternity is at stake. In erecting a house in which he expects to live for the remainder of his life, a man spares no trouble in seeking a beautiful site, and submits to great toil and fatigue in endeavouring to make the house commodious and airy. And why are men so careless when there is question of the house in which they must dwell for eternity? The business for which we labour, says St Eucherius, is eternity; there is not question of a house more or less commodious, more or less airy; but there is a question of being in a place full of delights, among the friends of God, or in a pit of all torments, in the midst of an infamous crowd of abandoned miscreants. And for how long? Not for twenty nor forty years, but for all eternity. This is a great point; it is not a business of little moment; it is an affair of infinite importance. When Thomas More was condemned to die by Henry VIII, his wife Louisa went to him for the purpose of prevailing on him to yield to the wishes of the king. He said to her: "Tell me, Louisa, how many years could I, who am now so old, expect to live?" "You might," answered Louisa, "live for twenty years more." "O foolish woman," rejoined the holy man, "do you want me, for twenty years of life on this earth, to forfeit an eternity of happiness, and to condemn myself to an eternity of torments." (Sander, Schism, angl.)

O God! Give me light. If eternity were a doubtful matter, or only resting on a probable opinion, we ought to make every effort in our power to lead a good life, lest, should the doctrine of eternity be true, we should expose ourselves to the danger of being eternally miserable; but it is not doubtful, but infallibly certain; not a mere opinion, but a truth of faith. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity." "Alas!" says St Teresa, "the want of faith is the cause of so many sins, and of the damnation of so many Christians." Let us then always enliven our faith, saying: "Credo in vitam æternam." I believe that after this life there is another which never ends. And with this thought always before, our eyes, let us adopt the means of securing eternal salvation. Let us frequent the sacrament; let us make meditation every day; and let us reflect on eternal life; let us fly from dangerous occasions. And if necessary, let us leave the world; for, to make ourselves sure of eternal life, no security can be too great.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

There is, then, my God! No medium; I must be forever happy, or forever miserable; either in a sea of joys or in a sea of torments; either forever with Thee in heaven or forever separated at a distance from Thee in hell. And this hell I know for certain I have so often deserved; but I also know for certain that Thou dost pardon all who repent, and that Thou rescuest from hell all who hope in Thee. Of this Thou assurest me. He shall cry to me. . . . I will deliver him and will glorify him.[287] Pardon me, then, O Lord! Pardon me immediately, and deliver me from hell. O Sovereign Good! I am sorry above all things for having offended Thee. Restore to me Thy grace as soon as possible, and give me Thy holy love. Were I now in hell, I could never more love Thee; I should have to hate Thee forever. Ah, my God! What evil hast Thou done to me that I should hate Thee? Thou hast loved me unto death. Thou art worthy of infinite love. O Lord! Do not permit me to be ever separated from Thee. I love Thee and will always love Thee. Who shall separate me from the charity of Christ?[288] Ah, my Jesus! Sin alone can separate me from Thee. Ah! Through the blood which Thou didst shed for me, do not permit me to be ever separated from Thee. Strike me dead, rather than suffer me to lose Thy love. "Ne permitta me separai a te." Mary, my Queen and my Mother! Assist me by thy prayers; obtain for me death and a thousand deaths rather than that I should be separated from the love of thy Son.

Consideration XV

THE MALICE OF MORTAL SIN

"I have brought up children and exalted them; but they have despised Me." Isaias, i.2.

FIRST POINT

THE SINNER INSULTS GOD

WHAT does the sinner do when he commits mortal sin? He insults God, he dishonours him, he afflicts him. In the first place, mortal sin is an insult offered to God. The malice of an insult is, as St Thomas says, estimated from the condition of the person who receives, and of the persons who offers, the insult. It is sinful to offend a peasant; it is more criminal to insult a nobleman; but to treat a monarch with contempt and insolence, is a still greater crime. Who is God? He is Lord of lords, and King of kings.[289] He is a being, of infinite majesty, before whom all the princes of the earth and all the saints and angels are less than an atom of sand. As a drop of bucket. . . . as a little dust.[290] The Prophet Osee adds, that compared with the greatness of God, all creatures are as insignificant as if they did not exist. All nations, he says, are before Him as if they had no being at all.[291] Such is God; and what is man? He is, according to St Bernard, a heap of worms, the food of worms, by which he shall be soon devoured. He is miserable, and poor and blind and naked.[292] Man is a miserable worm that can do nothing: he is so blind that he knows nothing, and so poor and naked that he possesses nothing. And this miserable worm voluntarily insults a God! "Vile dust," says the same St Bernard, "dares to provoke such tremendous majesty."[293] The angelic Doctor, then, had just reason to say that the sin of man contains, as it were, an infinite malice. And St Augustine calls sin "an infinite evil."[294] Hence, were all men and angels to offer themselves to death and annihilation, such an offering would not satisfy for a single in. God punishes sin with the pains of hell; but all theologians teach that this chastisement is less than sin deserves.[295]

And what punishment can be sufficient for a worm who assails his Lord? God is the Lord of all, because he has created all. All things are in Thy power. . . . Thou hast made heaven and earth and all things.[296] All creatures obey God. The winds, says St Matthew, and the sea obey Him. Fire, hail, snow, ice, stormy winds, which fulfil His will.[297] But when man sins, what does he do? He says to God, Lord, I will not serve Thee. Thou hast broken My yoke; thou hast burst My bonds; thou sadist I will not serve.[298] The Lord says to him: Seek not revenge; take not that property which belongs to another; abstain from that unchaste gratification. But man answers: I will have revenge; I will take possession of that property; I will indulge in that forbidden pleasure. Like Pharaoh, when Moses, on the part of God, commanded him to allow the people to go into the desert, the sinner answers: Who is the Lord that I should hear His voice, and let Israel go?[299] The sinner says the same—Lord, I know Thee not, I will do what I please; in a word, he insults the Lord to his face, and turns his back upon him. Mortal sin is precisely a turning away from God. Of this the Lord himself complains. Thou hast forsaken me, saith the Lord; thou art gone backward.[300] You have, says God, been ungrateful to me; you have turned your back upon me; you are gone backward. God ahs declared that he hates sin. Hence, he cannot but hate the sinner who commits it. But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike.[301] In committing sin, man dares to declare himself the enemy of God, and to contend single-handed with the Lord. He hath, says Job, strengthened himself against the Almighty.[302] What would you say if you saw an insect attack an armed soldier? God is the Omnipotent Being, who, by a rod, has created heaven and earth out of nothing. And if he wished, he can, by another act of his will, destroy all creatures. The Almighty Lord, who, at a beck, can utterly destroy . . . the whole world.[303] In consenting to sin, the sinner stretches out his arms against the Lord. He hath, says Job, stretched out his hand against God. He hath run against Him with his neck raised up and is armed with a fat neck.[304] He raises his neck, that is, he swells with pride and runs to insult God; he arms himself with a fat neck, that is, with ignorance which makes the sinner say, What harm have I done? What great evil is that sin which I have committed? God is merciful—he pardons sinners. What an insult! What temerity! What blindness.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold, O my God! at Thy feet the rash and daring rebel who has had the temerity and the audacity to insult Thee so often to Thy very face, and to turn his back upon Thee. Thou hast said: Cry to me, and I will hear.[305] Hell is too little for me; this I already know. But remember, O Lord! that I am more sorry for having offended Thee, who art infinite goodness than I would be for the loss of all my property and of my life. Ah, Lord! Pardon me, and do not permit me ever to offend thee more. Thou hast waited for me that I may forever bless Thy mercy and love Thee. Yes, I bless Thee, I love Thee, and I hope, through the merits of Jesus Christ, that I shall never again be separated from Thy love; Thy love has rescued me from hell. It is by Thy love that I am to be preserved from fin for the future. I thank Thee, my Lord, for the light and the desire Thou givest me to love Thee forever. Ah! take possession of my whole being—of my soul and body—of my powers and senses—of my will and liberty. I am Thine—save me. Thou art my only good; Thou art alone amiable; may Thou also be my only love. Give me fervour in loving Thee. I have offended Thee grievously. Hence it is not enough for me to love Thee, I wish to love Thee ardently, in order to compensate for the injuries I have done Thee. From Thee, who art omnipotent, I hope for this love. I also hope for it through thy prayers, O Mary! which are powerful before God.

SECOND POINT

THE SINNER DISHONOURS GOD

The sinner not only insults, but he also dishonours God. By the transgression of the law thou dishonoured God.[306] Yes; for he renounces God's grace, and for a miserable pleasure he tramples on the friendship of God. Were man to forfeit the divine friendship in order to gain a kingdom, or even the entire world, he should do a great evil; for the friendship of God is more valuable than the world and even a thousand worlds. But for what does the sinner insults the Lord? Wherefore hat the wicked provoked God?[307] For a little earth, for the gratification of revenge, for a beastly pleasure, for the indulgence of vanity or caprice. They violated Me among My people for a handful of barley and a piece of bread.[308] When the sinner deliberates whether he will give or refuse his consent to sin, he, as it were, takes in his hand a balance and examines whether the grace of God has more or less weight than the indulgence of his passion, vanity or pleasure; and when he consents to sin, he declares that his passion, vanity or pleasure is of greater value than the friendship of God. Behold the Lord covered with shame by the sinner!

Contemplating the greatness and majesty of God, David said, Lord, who is like to Thee?[309]

But seeing sinners compare and prefer a miserable gratification to his friendship, the Lord exclaimed, To whom have you likened Me, or made Me equal?[310] Then, he says, was that vile pleasure of greater value than my grace?—Thou hast cast Me off behind thy back?[311] Were you to forfeit a hand, or ten dollars, or even a much smaller sum, you would not have committed that sin. Then, says Salvin, is God alone so contemptible in your eyes, that he deserves to be despised for the indulgence of a passion, or for a miserable gratification?

Moreover, by offending God for the sake of his pleasure, the sinner makes that pleasure his god, by making it his last end. St Jerome says: "What a person desires, if he worships it, is to him a god. A vice in the heart is an idol on the altar." [312] Hence St Thomas says, "If you love delights, delights are your god."[313] And according to St Cyprian, "Whatever man prefers to God that he makes a god to himself."[314] When St Jeroboam rebelled against the Lord, he endeavoured to draw the people with him into idolatry. Hence, he placed before them his idols, saying: Behold thy gods, O Israel.[315] It is thus the devil acts; he represents a certain pleasure to the sinner, and says: "Make this your god: behold this pleasure, this revenge is your god: adhere to them and forsake the Lord." And in consenting to sin, the sinner obeys the devil, and in his heart adores as his god the pleasure in which he indulges.[316]

If the sinner dishonours God he surely does not dishonour him in his presence! Oh, he insults and dishonours God to his very face; for God is present in all places. Do I not full heaven and earth, saith the Lord?[317] This, sinners know, and still they dare to provoke God before his eyes. They provoke Me to anger before My face.[318]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Thou, then, my God, art an infinite good, and I have frequently exchanged Thee for a miserable pleasure, which I had scarcely indulged when it vanished. But Thou, though despised by me, now offerest me pardon if I wish for it and Thou promisest to give me Thy grace, if I repent of having offended Thee. Yes, my Lord! I repent with my whole heart of having outraged Thee so grievously: I detest my sins above all things. Behold! I already return to Thee, as I hope and Thou already receivest me and embracest me as Thy child. I thank thee, O infinite Goodness! But assist me now, and do not permit me ever gain to banish Thee from my heart. Hell will not cease to tempt me; but Thou art more powerful than hell. I know that I shall never more abandon Thee, if I always recommend myself to Thee. The grace, then, which I ask is, that I may always recommend myself to Thee, and that I may always say to Thee, as I now do, Lord, assist me; give me light, give me strength, give me perseverance, give me paradise; but above all, give me Thy love which is the true paradise of souls. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! And I wish always to love Thee. Hear me for the love of Jesus Christ. Mary, thou art the refuge of sinners; assist by thy prayers, a sinner who wishes to love thy God.

THIRD POINT

THE SINNER AFFLICTS GOD

The sinner insults God, he dishonours God, and fills the heart of God with grief and bitterness. There is nothing more galling than to be treated with ingratitude by a person tenderly loved and highly favoured. Whom does the sinner assail? He insults God who has created him, and has loved him so as to give his blood and his life for his salvation; and by committing mortal sin he banishes God from his heart. God comes to dwell in the soul that loves him. If any one loves Me . . . My Father will love him, and We will come to him, and will make Our abode with him.[319] God comes to dwell forever in the soul; he never departs from it, unless he is driven away. According to the Council of Trent, "He deserts not the soul, unless he is deserted." [320] But, O Lord! Thou knowest that the ungrateful sinner sill, in a few moments, banish Thee; why dost Thou not instantly depart from him? Wilt Thou wait until he expels Thee? Abandon him; depart from him before he offers Thee this great insult. "No," says the Lord, "I will not depart until he himself chases Me away."

Then, in consenting to sin, the soul says to God: Lord, depart from me. The wicked, says Job, have said to God, Depart from us.[321] The sinner, according to St Gregory, says the same, not in words, but acts. The sinner knows that God cannot dwell with sin; in yielding to sin, he sees that God must depart; hence by his conduct he says to God: Since Thou canst not remain in me along with my sin, depart—farewell. And through the very door by which God leaves the soul, the devil enters. Then he goeth and taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there.[322] In baptising an infant, the priest commands the devil to depart. "Go out from him, unclean spirit, and make room for the Holy Ghost."[323] Yes; for the soul, by receiving the grace of God, becomes his temple. Know you not, says St Paul, that you are the temple of God?[324] But, in consenting to sin, man does the very contrary: he says to God, who is in his soul: "Go out from me, O Lord, make room for the devil."[325] Of this the Lord complained to St Bridget, saying, that he is treated by the sinner as a king expelled from his throne. "I am like a monarch banished from his own dominions; and in my place the worst of plunderers is chosen."[326]

What pain should you feel if you received a grievous insult from a person on whom you have lavished favours? This is the pain which you have given to your God who laid down his life for your salvation. The Lord calls heaven and earth to pity him on account of the ingratitude of sinners. Hear, O ye heavens, and give ear, O earth, . . . I have brought up children and exalted them, but they have despised Me. [327] In a word, by their iniquities sinners afflict the heart of God. But they provoked to wrath and afflicted the Spirit of the Holy One.[328] God is not susceptible of pain; but were he capable of sorrow, a single mortal sin should, as Far Medina teaches, be sufficient to make him die through pure grief. "Mortal sin would, were it possible, destroy God himself because it would be the cause of infinite sadness in God."[329] Thus, as St Bernard says, "Sin, as far as in it lies, destroys God."[330] In committing mortal sin, the sinner, as it were, gives poison to God, and does all in his power to deprive him of life. The sinner, says David, hath provoked the Lord. [331] And according to St Paul, he tramples on the Son of God. For he despises all that Jesus Christ has done and suffered in order to take away the sins of the world.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Then, my Redeemer, as often as I have sinned, I have banished Thee from my soul, and have done what would, were it possible for Thee to die, have taken away Thy life. I now hear Thee ask: What evil have I done Thee? Tell Me. What displeasure have I given Thee that thou shouldst offer Me so many insults? Lord, Thou hast given me existence, and hast died for me. Behold the evil Thou hast done me. What answer then can I make? I say that I have deserved a thousand hells; Thou hast just ground for sending me to everlasting torments. But remember the love which make Thee die on the cross for my salvation; remember the blood which Thou hast shed for my sake, and have mercy on me. But I know that Thou dost not wish that I despair; on the contrary Thou makest me feel that Thou standest at the door of my heart and that by Thine inspirations Thou knockest for admission. I stand at the gate, and knock. Thou tellest me to open—Open to Me, my sister. Yes, my Jesus: I banish sin from my soul; I am sorry for it with my whole heart, and I love Thee above all things. Enter, O my love! The gate is open; enter, and never more depart from me. Bind me to Thyself by Thy love, and do not permit me to be ever separated from Thee. No, my God, we will never again be disunited; I embrace Thee and unite Thee to my heart; give me holy perseverance. "Ne permittas me separari a Te." Mary, my Mother, assist me always; pray to Jesus for me; obtain for me this favour, that I may never more lose his grace.

Consideration XVI

THE MERCY OF GOD

"Mercy exalteth itself above judgement."—St James, ii.13.

FIRST POINT

GOD WAITS FOR THE SINNER

GOOD is naturally diffusive—that is, inclined to communicate its good even to others. But God, who is by nature infinite, goodness, as St Leo expresses himself,[332] has an infinite desire to impart his own felicity to us; and therefore his inclination is, not to chastise, but to show mercy to all. To punish is, according to Isaias, a work opposed to the inclination of God. He shall be angry . . . that he may do His work, His strange work: His work is strange to Him.[333] And when the Lord chastise in this life, he does it in order to show mercy in the next. O God! . . . Thou hast been angry, and hast had mercy on us.[334] He appears angry that we may enter into ourselves and detest our sins. Thou hast shown Thy people hard things; Thou hast made us drink the wine of sorrow.[335] And when he sends us any chastisement, he does it because he loves us, and wishes to deliver us from eternal punishment. Thou hast given a warning to them that fear Thee that they may flee from before the bow, that Thy beloved may be delivered. [336] And who can sufficiently admire and praise the mercy of God toward sinners in waiting for them, in calling them, and in receiving them when they return? Oh! How great is the mercy of God in waiting for our repentance! My brother, when you offended God, he could have struck you dead; but he waited for you, and instead of chastising you, he conferred favours upon, he preserved your life, and provided for you. He pretended not to see your sins that you might repent. Thou overlookest the sin of men for the sake of penance.[337] But, O Lord, how does it happen that Thou canst not bear to behold a single sin, and beholdest so many of them in silence? Thou canst not look on iniquity; why lookest Thou upon them that do unjust things, and holdest Thy peace?[338] Thou beholdest the blasphemer, the unchaste, the vindictive man, multiplying iniquities from day to day; and Thou dost not chastise him; and why so much patience. Therefore the Lord waiteth that He may have mercy on thee. [339] God waits for sinners, that they may amend and that thus he may pardon and save them.

St Thomas says that all creatures, fire, the earth, air, water, by a natural instinct, would wish to punish and to take vengeance on the injuries done to their Creator.[340] But God in his mercy restrains them. But, O Lord! Thou waitest for these impious wretches that they may see their wickedness; but dost not Thou see that they ungratefully take advantage of Thy mercy to offend Thee still more? Thou hast been favourable to the nation: Thou hast been favourable to the nation; art Thou glorified?[341] And why so much patience? Because God wills not the death of the sinner; but that he be converted and live.[342] O patience of God! St Augustine goes so far as to say that God were he not God, would be unjust on account of his excessive patience toward sinners.[343] To wait for those who abuse patience to become more insolent, appears to be an injustice to the divine honour. "We sin," continues the holy Doctor "we adhere to sin."[344] Some make peace with sin, and sleep in sin for months and years. "Gaudemus de peccato"—We rejoice at sin; others go so far as to boast of their wickedness; and Thou art appeased.[345] We provoke Thee to anger—Thou invitest us to mercy. [346] We appear to be engaged with God in a contest in which we labour to provoke him to chastise our guilt; and he invites us to pardon.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Lord! I know that I deserve to be at this moment in hell. Hell is my house.[347] But through Thy mercy, I am not now in that place of woe, but I am here at Thy feet, and fell that Thou wishes and commandest me to love Thee. Thou shall love the Lord thy God.[348] I hear Thee tell me that Thou wilt pardon me if I repent of the injuries I have done Thee. Yes, my God: since Thou wishest me, a miserable rebel against Thy majesty, to love Thee, I love Thee with my whole heart, and I feel more regret for the outrages I have offered to Thee, than for any evil that could have befallen me. Ah! Enlighten me, O inifinite Goodness; make me sensible of the wrongs I have done Thee. I will no longer resist Thy calls. I will give no more displeasure to a God who has loved me so tenderly, who has pardoned me so often and with so much love. Ah! That I had never offended Thee, my Jesus ; pardon me, and grant that, from this day forward, I may love nothing but thee: that I may live only for Thee who didst die for me; that I may suffer for Thy love, since Thou hast suffered so much for the love of me. Thou hast loved me from eternity: Grant that for eternity I may burn with Thy love. I hope for all things, O my Saviour, through Thy merits; I trust also in thee, O Mary, save me by thy intercession.

SECOND POINT

GOD CALLS THE SINNER

Consider, moreover, the mercy of God in calling the sinner to repentance. When Adam rebelled against the Lord, and hid himself from his face, behold, God, having lost Adam, goes in search of him, and calls him as it were with tears, Adam, where art thou?[349] "These," says Fr Pereira in his commentary on this passage, "are the words of a father seeking a lost son."[350] My brother, God has often done the same to you. You fled from God, and he sought after you, calling you at one time by his inspiration, at another by remorse of conscience, now by sermons, again by tribulations, and by the death of your friends. Speaking of you, Jesus appears to say I have laboured with crying: ny jaws are become hoarse. [351] My son, I have almost lost my voice in calling you to repentance. Remember, O sinners, says St Teresa, that the Lord who will one day be your Judge, is now calling you to return to him.

Dearly beloved Christian, how often have you been deaf to the calls of God? You deserved that he should call you no more; but your God has not ceased to call you, because he wishes to make peace with you, and to save you. Who was it that called you? A God of Infinite Majesty. And what were you but a miserable fetid worm! Why did he call you? For no other purpose than to restore to you the life of grace which you had lost? Return ye and live.[352] To acquire the divine grace, it would be but little to live in a desert during your entire life. God offered to give you his grace at each moment, if you wished to obtain it by making an act of contrition and you refused. And after all this, God has not abandoned you, he ahs gone in search of you, as it were weeping, and saying: Son, why will you bring yourself to perdition? And why will you die, O house of Israel?[353]

When man commits a mortal sin, he banishes God from his soul. The wicked have said to God, Depart from us.[354] But what does God do? He places himself at the door at that ungrateful heart. Behold, I stand at the gate and knock.[355] He even appears to entreat the soul to allow him to enter, Open to Me, my sister.[356] He grows weary praying for admission. I am weary of entreating thee.[357] Yes, says St Denis, the Aeropagite, God follows sinners like a despised lover, entreating them not to destroy their souls.[358] And this precisely the Apostle meant when he wrote to his disciples. For Christ, I beseech you to be reconciled to God.[359] In explaining this passage, St John Chrysostom makes a beautiful reflection "Christ himself entreats you; but what does he entreat you to do? To be reconciled with God; for it is not God that acts like an enemy, but you."[360] The saint's meaning is, that the sinner has not to labour in order to move God to make peace with him; for he, and not God, refuses peace.

Ah! This good Lord goes every day in search of so many sinners, continually saying to them: Ungrateful souls do not fly away any longer; tell me why you fly away from me? I love your welfare, and desire nothing else than to make you happy. Why will you destroy yourselves? But, O Lord, what is it Thou dost? Why so much patience and so much love toward these rebels? What good dost Thou expect from them? It redounds but little to Thy honour to show such an excess of love for the miserable worms that fly away from Thee. What is a man that Thou shouldst magnify him? Or why dost Thou set Thy heart upon him?[361]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold, O Lord at Thy feet an ungrateful soul, imploring mercy. Father, forgive me. I call Thee Father, because Thou wishest me thus to call Thee. My Father, pardon me. I do not deserve pity, for I have treated Thee with ingratitude because Thou hast been bountiful to me. Ah, my God! Through that goodness which did not allow Thee to abandon me when fled from Thee, receive me, now that I return to Thee. Give me O my Jesus, a great sorrow for the offences I have offered to Thee, and give me the kiss of peace. I am sorry above all things for the injuries I have done Thee: I detest and abhor them, and I united this hatred and abhorrence to that which Thou, O my Redeemer didst feel for them in the garden of Gethsemane. Ah! Pardon me through the merits of that blood which Thou hast shed for me in the garden. I promise firmly never more to depart from Thee, and to banish from my heart every affection which is not for Thee. My Jesus, my love! I love Thee above all things: I wish always to love thee, and love Thee alone; give me strength to execute this good will, make me all Thine. O Mary, my hope after Jesus! Thou art the Mother of mercy: pray to God for me, and have pity on me.

THIRD POINT

GOD RECEIVES THE SINNER WITH KINDNESS

The princes of the earth disdain even to look at the rebel who comes to ask pardon; but God acts not in this manner with us: He will not turn away His face from you, if you return to Him.[362] God cannot turn away his face from those who return and cast themselves at his feet; no, for he himself invites them, and promises to receive them as soon as they come. Return to me, said the Lord, and I will receive thee.[363] Turn to Me . . . and I will turn to you, saith the Lord of Hosts.[364] Oh! With what love and tenderness does God embrace the sinner that returns to Him. This love and tenderness Jesus Christ wished to give us to understand by the parable of the sheep which the shepherd, when he found it, placed on his shoulders. Doth he not lay it upon his shoulder, rejoicing; and coming home, call together his friends and neighbours, saying to them: Rejoice with me, because I have found my sheep that was lost.[365] The Redeemer adds: There shall be joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance.[366] This tenderness the Saviour declared more fully in the parable of the prodigal son; in which he tells us that he is the father who, when he saw his lost son returning, runs to meet him, and before his son utters a word, embraces and kisses him, and in embracing him, almost swoons away through tenderness of consolation. And running to him he fell upon his neck and kissed him.[367]

The Lord promises that, if sinners repent, he will even forget their sins, as if they had never offended him. If the wicked do penance. . . . living he shall live . . . I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done.[368] He even goes so far as to say, Come and accuse Me, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made as white as snow.[369] As if he said: Sinners, come and accuse Me; if I do not pardon you, reprove me, upbraid me with having been unfaithful to my promises. But no; God knows not how to despise a humble and contrite heart.

The Lord glories in showing mercy and granting pardon to sinners. And therefore shall He be exalted sparing you.[370] And how long does he deter pardon? Not an instant: he grants it immediately. Weeping, says the Prophet Isaias, thou shalt not weep; He will surely have pity on thee.[371] Sinners, exclaims the prophet, you have not long to weep; at the first tear the Lord will be moved to pity: At the voice of thy cry, as soon as He shall hear, He will answer thee.[372] God does not treat us as we treat him: we are deaf to the calls of God: but as soon as he shall hear, he will answer thee; the very instant you repent and ask forgiveness, God answers and grants your pardon.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my God! Against whom have I rebelled? Against Thee who art so good, against Thee that hast created me, and died for me. After so many acts of treason, Thou hast borne with me. Ah! The thought of the patience Thou hast had with me ought to make me live always on fired with Thy love. And who would have borne so long as Thou hast the injuries which I have done Thee? Miserable shall I be, should I ever again offend Thee, and condemn myself to hell! I already see that Thy mercy can bear with me no longer. I am sorry, O Sovereign Good, for having offended Thee. I love Thee with my whole heart: I am resolved to give Thee all the remainder of my life. Hear me, O Eternal Father, through the merits of Jesus Christ: give me holy perseverance and Thy love: hear me, O my Jesus! For the sake of the blood which Thou hast shed for me. We therefore beseech Thee; assist Thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood.[373]O Mary, my Mother! Look upon me, "turn thy eyes of mercy to us," and draw me entirely to God.

Consideration XVII

ABUSE OF DIVINE MERCY

"Knowest thou not that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance."—Rom. ii.4. .

FIRST POINT

GOD IS MERCIFUL, BUT HE IS ALSO JUST

WE read in the parable of the cockle that the servants of the good man of the house, seeing that it had grown up in the field along with the wheat, wished to pluck it up. Will thou, said they that we go and gather it up?[374] No, replied the master; suffer it to grow up, and then it shall be gathered and cast into the fire. In the time of the harvest, I will say to the rappers: Gather up first the cockle, and bind it in bundles to burn.[375] In this parable we see, on the one hand, the patience with which the Lord treats sinners and on the other, the rigour with which he chastises the obstinate. St Augustine says that the devil deludes men in two ways*, by despair and hope.*[376] After the sinner has offended God, the enemy, by placing before his eyes the terror of divine justice, tempts him to despair; but before he sins, the devil encourages him to sin with the hope of divine mercy. Hence the saint gives to all the following advice: "After sin, hope for mercy; before sin, fear justice."[377] He, who abuses God's mercy to offend him, is undeserving of mercy. God shows mercy to those who fear him, but not to those who avail themselves of his mercy to banish the fear of God from their hearts. Abulensis says that he who offends justice may have recourse to mercy; but to whom can he have recourse, who offends mercy itself?

It is hard to find a sinner so sunk in despair as to wish for his own damnation. Sinners wish to sun, without losing the hope of salvation. They sin and say: God is merciful; I will commit this sin, and will afterward confess it. They say, observes St Augustine, "God is good, I will do what I please."[378] Behold, the language of sinners; but O God, such too was the language of so many who are now in hell.

Say not, says the Lord, that the mercies of God are great: that however enormous your sins may be, you will obtain pardon by an act of contrition. And say not: The mercy of the Lord is great: He will have mercy on the multitude of ny sins. [379] Say it not, says the Lord; and why? For mercy and wrath quickly come from Him, and His wrath looketh upon sinners.[380] The mercy of God is infinite; but the acts of his mercy or his mercies are finite. God is merciful but he is also just. "I am just and merciful," said Our Lord to St Bridget; "but sinners regard me only as merciful."[381] St Basil writes that sinners wish to consider God only as good and merciful. To bear with those who avail themselves of the mercy of God to offend him, would not, says Fr M.Avila, be mercy, but a want of justice. Mercy is promised, not to those who abuse it, but those who fear God. And His mercy, said the divine mother, to those that fear Him.[382] Against the obstinate, threats of just retribution have been pronounced; says St Augustine, as God is not unfaithful to his promises, so he is not a liar in his threats.[383]

Beware, says St John Chrysostom, when the devil, not God, promises you divine mercy that he may induce you to commit sin. "Never attend to that dog that promises to you the mercy of God."[384] "Woe," says St Augustine, "to him who hopes in order to sin."[385] Oh! How many, says the saint, has this vain hope deluded and brought to perdition! "They who have been deceived by this shadow of vain hope cannot be numbered."[386] Miserable the man who abuses the mercy of God to offer new insults to his majesty! St Bernard says that Lucifer's chastisement was accelerated, because he rebelled against God with the hope of escaping punishment. King Manasses sinned: he afterward repented, and obtained pardon. His son Ammon, seeing that his father's sins were so easily forgiven, abandoned himself to a wicked life with the hope of pardon, but for Ammon there was no mercy. Hence, St John Chrysostom asserts that Judas was lost because he sinner, through confidence in the benignity of Jesus Christ.[387] In fine, God bears, but he does not bear forever. Were God to bear forever with sinners, no one would be damned; but the most common opinion is that the greater part of adults, even among Christians, are lost. Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are that go in thereat.[388]

According to St Augustine, he who offends God with the hope of pardon "is a scoffer, not a penitent."[389] But St Paul tells us that God does not allow himself to be mocked.[390] To continue to offend God as often and as long as the sinner pleases, and afterward to gain heaven, would be to mock God. For what things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap.[391] He that sows sin, has no reason to hope for anything else than chastisement and hell. The net with which the devil drags to hell almost all Christians who are damned, is the delusion by which he leads them into sin with the hope of pardon. Sin freely, he says to them; for, after all your iniquities, you will be saved. But God curses the man that sins with the hope of mercy. The hope of sinners after sin is pleasing to God, when it is accompanied with repentance; but the hope of the obstinate is an abomination to the Lord.[392] As the conduct of a servant who insults his master because he is good and merciful, irritates the master, so such hope provokes God to inflict vengeance.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! I have been one of those who have offended Thee because Thou wert bountiful to me. Ah, Lord! Wait for me, do not abandon me. I am sorry, O infinite Goodness! For having offended Thee and for having so much abused Thy patience. I thank Thee for having waited for me till now. Henceforth I will never more betray Thee as I have hitherto done. Thou hast borne with me so long, that Thou mightest one day see me a lover of Thy goodness. Behold this day has, I hope arrived: I love Thee above all things, and esteem Thy grace more than all the kingdoms of the world: rather than lose it, I am ready to forfeit life a thousand times. My God, for the love of Jesus Christ, give me holy perseverance till death, along with Thy holy love. Do not permit me ever again to betray Thee, or to cease to love Thee. Mary! Thou art my hope: obtain for me this gift of perseverance and I ask nothing more.

SECOND POINT

THE SINNER ABANDONED BY GOD

Some will say: God has hitherto shown me so many mercies; I hope he will treat me with the same mercy for the future. But I answer: And will you insult God again, because he has been so merciful to you? Then, says St Paul, do you thus despise the mercy and patience of God? Do you not know that the Lord has borne with you to this moment, not that you may continue to offend him, but that you may weep over the evil you have done? Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and patience and long-suffering? Knowest thou not that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance?[393] If through confidence in the divine mercy you continue to sin, the Lord will cease to show mercy. Except you be converted, says David, he will brandish his sword.[394] Revenge is mine, and I will repay thee in due time.[395] God waits; but when the time of chastisement arrives, he waits no longer, but executes vengeance.

Therefore the Lord waiteth, that he may have mercy on you.[396] God waits for sinners that they may amend: but when he sees that the time given to bewail their sins is employed in multiplying crimes, he then calls the very time to judge them. He hath called against me the time.[397] "The very time," says Gregory, "comes to judge."[398] Thus the very time given, and the very mercies shown to sinners, will serve to make God chastise them with greater rigour, and abandon them sooner. We would have cured Babylon, but she is not healed: let us forsake her. [399] And how does God abandon sinners? He either sends them a sudden death, and makes them die in sin, or he despises them of his abundant graces, and leaves them with the sufficient grace, with which they can, but will not, save their souls. The blindness of their understanding, the hardness of their heart, the evil habits which they have contracted, will render their salvation morally impossible; and thus they will be, if not absolutely, at lest morally abandoned. I will take away the hedge, thereof, and it shall be wasted.[400] Oh! What a chastisement! When the master of the vineyard takes away its hedges, and leaves it open to men and to beasts, does not show that he abandons it? It is thus that God acts when he abandons the soul: he takes away the hedge of holy fear, and of remorse of conscience, and leaves it in darkness. And then all the monsters of crime will enter the soul. Thou hast appointed darkness, and it is night: in it shall all the beasts of the woods go about.[401] And the sinner, abandoned in that obscurity, will despise the grace of God, heaven, admonitions and excommunications; and will make a jest of his own damnation. The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, contemneth.[402]

God will not chastise the sinner in this life; but, not to be punished in this world will be the greatest chastisement of the wicked. Let us have pity on the wicked, but he will not learn justice.[403] On this passage St Bernard says, "This mercy I do not wish for: it is above all wraths."[404] Oh! What a chastisement is it when God abandons the sinner into the hands of his sins, and appears not to demand any further account of them! According to the multitude of his wrath he will not seek him.[405] God appears not to be enraged against sinners. My jealousy shall depart from you, and I will cease and be angry no more.[406]—He appears to allow them all that they desire in this life. I let them go according to the desires of their heart. [407] Miserable the sinner that prospers in this life! His prosperity is a sign that God waits to make him a victim of his justice for eternity. Why, said Jeremias, doth the way of the wicked prosper? He answers: Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice.[408] There is no punishment greater than that which God inflicts, when he permits a sinner to add sin to sin. Add thou iniquity upon their iniquity . . . let them be blotted out of the book of the living.[409] In explaining these words, Bellarmine says that "there is no punishment greater than when sin is the punishment of sin?"[410] It would be a smaller punishment to be struck dead by the Lord after their first sin; fir, by dying afterward they will suffer as many hells as they have committed sins.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My God! I know that in my miserable state I have deserved to be deprived of Thy grace and light; but seeing the light which Thou now givest me, and feeling that Thou now callest me to repentance, I have just reason to hope that Thou hast not as yet abandoned me. And since, O Lord! Thou hast not abandoned me, multiply Thy mercies on my soul, increase Thy light, increase my desire to serve and love Thee. Change me, O omnipotent God! And from being a traitor and rebel, make me a great lover of Thy goodness, that I may one day enter heaven to praise Thy mercies for all eternity. Thou dost then wish to pardon me, and I desire nothing but the pardon of my sins and the gift of Thy love. I am sorry, O infinite Goodness, for having so often offended Thee. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! Because Thou commandest me to love Thee; I love Thee, because Thou well deservest my love. Ah, my Redeemer, through the merits of Thy blood, gives Thy love to a sinner whom Thou hast loved so ardently, and whom Thou hast borne with so patiently for so many years: I hope for every grace from Thy mercy. I hope to love Thee always till death, and for eternity. The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever.[411] I will praise Thy mercy, O my Jesus. I will forever praise thy mercy, O Mary, who hast obtained for me so many graces; I acknowledge that I have received them all through thy intercession. Continue, O my Mother to assist me by thy prayers and to obtain for me holy perseverance.

THIRD POINT

UNFORTUNATE IS HE WHO ALLOWS THE TIME OF MERCY TO PASS BY

It is related in the life of Fr Louis La Nusa, that in Palermo there were two friends, who went one day to take a walk. One of them, called Cæsar, who was a comedian, seeing the other oppressed with melancholy, said: How long is it since you were at confession? Is it on account of your long absence from the sacraments that you are so much troubled? Listen to me: "Fr La Nusa told me one day that God gave me twelve years to live, and that if, within that period, I did not amend, I should die an unhappy death. I have since travelled through so many parts of the world; I have had many attacks of sickness, one of which brought me to the brink of death; but, in this month the twelve years will be completed, and I now feel better than in any part of my past life." He then invited his friend to hear, on Saturday, a new comedy which he had composed. But what happened? On Saturday, the 24th November, 1688, as he was going to the stage, he was seized with apoplexy, and died suddenly. He expired in the arms of a female comedian, and thus the comedy ended. But let us make the application to ourselves. Brother, when the devil tempts you again to sin, if you wish to be lost, you have it in your power to commit sin; but do not then say that you wish to be saved. As long as you wish to sin, regard yourself as damned, and imagine that God writes the sentence of your damnation, and that he says to you: ?[412] Ungrateful soul, what more ought I to do for you, that I have not done? But, since you wish to be lost, go into eternal fire; the fault is your own.

But you will say, Where then is the mercy of God? Ah, unhappy soul? Do you not feel that God has shown you mercy in bearing with you for so many years, after so many sins? You should remain forever prostrate on the earth, thanking him for his mercy, and saying: The mercies of the Lord that we are not consumed?[413] By committing a single mortal sin, you have been guilty of a greater crime that if you have trampled under foot the first monarch in the world. You have been guilty of so many mortal sins, that if you had committed against your brother the injuries which you have offered to God, he would not have borne with you. God has not only waited for you, but he has so often called you and invited you to pardon. What is there that I ought to have done more?[414] If God had stood in need of you, or if you had conferred a great favour upon him, could he show you greater mercy? If, then, you offend him again, you will change his mercy into wrath and vengeance.

It, after the master had given it another year to produce fruit, the fruitless fig-tree still remained barren, who could expect that the Lord would allowed it more time, or would not have cut it down? Listen then, to the admonition of St Augustine: "O fruitless tree! The axe is deferred; be not secure; you will be cut down."[415] Your punishment, says the saint, has been delayed, but not taken away; if you abuse any longer the divine mercy, you shall be cut down: in the end vengeance will fall upon you. What do you wait for? Will you wait till God sends you to hell? But should he send you there, you already know that your ruin is irreparable! The Lord is silent, but he is not silent forever: when the time of vengeance arrives he no longer holds his peace. These things hast thou done, and I was silent. Thou thoughtest unjustly that I should be like to thee. I will reprove thee, and set before thy face. [416] I will place before your eyes the mercies I have shown you, and will make these very mercies judge and condemn you.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God, unhappy me, should I henceforth be unfaithful to Thee, and betray Thee again after the light Thou now givest me. This light is a sign that Thou wishest to pardon me. I repent, O Sovereign Good, of all the injuries I have done Thee because they have offended Thee, who art infinite goodness. In Thy blood I hope for pardon and I hope for it with certainty: but should I again turn my back upon Thee, I would deserve a hell created on purpose for myself. And what makes me tremble, O God of my soul! Is, that I may again lose Thy grace. I have so often promised to be faithful to Thee, and have afterward rebelled against Thee. Ah, Lord! Do not permit it; do not ever abandon me to the great misfortune of seeing myself again Thy enemy. Send my any chastisement, but not this. Do not permit me to be separated from Thee. Shouldst Thou see that I shall again offend Thee, strike me dead, rather than permit me so great an evil? I am content to suffer the most cruel death, sooner than have to weep over the misery of being again deprived of Thy grace. Do not permit me to be separated from Thee. I repeat this prayer, O my God: grant that I may repeat it always. Do not permit me to be separated from Thee? [417] I love Thee, my dear Redeemer! I do not wish to be separated from Thee. Through the merits of Thy death, give me an ardent love, which will bind me so closely to Thee, that I may never more be able to dissolve the union. O Mary, my Mother, I fear that if I again offend God, thou too wilt abandon me. Assist me then, by thy prayers: obtain for me holy perseverance and the love of Jesus Christ.

Consideration XVIII

THE NUMBER OF SINS

"Because sentence is not speedily pronounced against the evil, the Children of men commit evil without fear"—Eccles. viii.11.

FIRST POINT

THE MEASURE IS DETERMINED FOR EACH ONE

If God instantly chastises the man who insults him, we certainly should not see him so much outraged as we do at present. But because the Lord does not instantly punish sinners, but waits for them, they are encouraged to offend him the more. It is necessary to understand that, though God waits and bears, he does not wait and bear forever. It is the opinion of many holy Fathers—of St Basil, St Jerome, St Ambrose, St Cyril of Alexandria, St John Chrysostom, St Augustine and others—that as God (according to the words of Scripture, Wis. xi. 21, Thou hast ordered all things in measure, and number and weight)[418] has fixed for each the number of his days, the degrees of health and talent which he will give to him, so he has also determined the number of sins that he will pardon; and when this number is completed, he will pardon no more. Eusebius of Cæsarea says the same thing: "God waits up to a certain number and afterwards abandons;" and to speak also the above-mentioned Fathers.

And these Fathers have not spoken at random, but according to the sacred Scriptures. In one place the Lord says that he restrained his vengeance against the Amorrrithes, because the number of their sins was not as yet filled up: For as yet the iniquities of the Amorrithes are not at the full.[419] In another place he says: I will not add any more to have mercy on the house of Israel.[420] Again he says: All the men who have tempted Me ten times shall not see the land.[421] Thou hast, says Job, sealed up my offences as it were in a bag.[422] Sinners keep no account of their sins; but God keeps an account of them, the when the harvest is ripe, that is, when the number of sins is completed, he may take vengeance on them. Put ye in the sickles; for the harvest is ripe.[423] In another place he says: Be not without fear about sin forgiven, and add not sin to sin.[424] As if he said: O sinner! You must tremble even on account of the sins which I have forgiven you; for if you add another, it may happen that this new sin, along with those which have been pardoned, may complete the number, and then there will be no more mercy for you. The Lord waiteth patiently, that when the day of judgement shall come, he may punish them in the fullness of their sins.[425] God waits till the measure of iniquities is filled up, and then he chastise the sinner.

Of such chastisements there are many examples in the Scriptures. Saul disobeyed God a second time, and was abandoned. When he entreated Samuel to intercede for him, saying: Bear, I beseech thee, my sin, and return with me that I may adore the Lord. [426] Samuel answered: I will not return with thee, because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee. [427] We have also the example of Balthasar, who, after having profaned the vessels of the temple at table, saw a handwriting on the wall—Mene, Theccel, Phares. Daniel came, and in explaining these words, among other things, said: Thou art weighted in the balance, and art found wanting.[428] By these words he gave the king to understand that in the balance of divine justice the weight of his sins had made the scale descent. The same night Balthasar, the Chaldean king, was killed.[429] Oh! How many miserable sinners meet with a similar fate! They live many years, multiplying sins; but when the number is filled up, they are struck dead, and cast into hell! They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment they go down to hell.[430] There are some who spend their time in investigating the number of the stars, the number of the angels, or the number of years which each one will live. But who can discover the number of sins which God will pardon each individual? We should, therefore, tremble. My brother, it may be that God will pardon you no more after the first criminal pleasure which you indulge, after the first thought to which you consent, or after the first sin which you commit.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! I thank Thee. How many for fewer sins than I have committed are now in hell! For them there is no pardon—no hope. And I am still living: I am not in hell: but, if I wish, I can hope for pardon and for Paradise. I am sorry above all things for all my sins, because by them I have offended Thee, who art infinite goodness. Eternal Father, look on the face of Thy Christ?[431] Behold Thy Son dead on the cross for my sake; and through his merits have mercy on me. I wish to die rather than offend Thee any more. When I consider the sins I have committed, and he graces Thou hast bestowed upon me, I have just reason to fear that, if I commit another sin, the measure will be completed, and I shall be damned. Ah! Assist me by Thy grace; from Thee I hope for light and strength to be faithful to Thee. And if Thou seest that I should again offend Thee, take me out of my life, not that I hope to be in a state of grace. My God! I love Thee above all things, and I feel a greater fear of incurring Thy enmity than of death. For Thy mercy's sake do not permit me any more to become Thy enemy. Mary, my Mother, has pity on me; assist me; obtain for me holy perseverance.

SECOND POINT

THE MEASURE IS NOT THE SAME FOR ALL

Some sinners say: But God is merciful. Who, I ask, denies it? The mercy of God is infinite; but though his mercy is infinite, how many are cast into hell every day? The Lord hath sent Me to heal the contrite heart.[432] God heals those who have a good will. He pardons sins, but he cannot pardon the determination to commit sin. These sinners will also say: I am young. You are young; but God counts not years, but sins. The number of sins which God pardons is not the same for all: some he pardons a hundred: others a thousand sins: others he send to hell after the second sin. How many has the Lord condemned to eternal misery after the first sin? St Gregory[433] relates that a child of five years, for uttering a blasphemy was condemned to hell. The Most Holy Virgin revealed to that great servant of God, Benedicta of Florence, that a girl of twelve years old was damned after her first sin. A boy of eight years died after his first tin, and was lost. In the Gospel of St Matthew we find that the Lord instantly cursed the fig-tree the first time he saw it without fruit. May no fruit grow on thee forever. And immediately the fig-tree withered away. [434] Another time God said: For three crimes of Damascus, and for four, I will not convert it.[435] Perhaps some daring sinner may have the temerity to demand an account of God why he pardons some three sins, but not four. In this we must adore the judgements of God, and say with the apostle: O the depth of the riches of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are His judgement and unsearchable His ways![436] "The Lord," says St Augustine, "knows whom he spares and whom he does not spare. To those who receive mercy he gives it gratuitously; from those who do not receive mercy, it is justly withheld."[437]

The obstinate sinner may say: But I have so often offended God, and he has pardoned me; I also hope he will pardon me the sin which I intend to commit. But, I ask, must God spare you forever, because he has not hitherto chastised you? The measure shall be filled up, and vengeance shall come. Samson continued to allow himself to be deluded by Dalila, hoping that, as on former occasions, he would escape from the Philistines. I will go out as I did before, and shake myself.[438] But at last he was taken, and lost his life. Say not, I have sinned, and what harm hath befallen me? Say not, says the Lord, I have committed so many sins, and God has not chastise me; for the Most High is a patient rewarder, [439] that is, he will one day come and punish all; and the greater the mercy which he will have shown, the more severe shalt be the chastisement which he will inflict. St Chrysostom says that God should be dreaded more when he bears with the obstinate sinner, than when he punishes him suddenly.[440] Because, according to St Gregory, if they remain ungrateful, God punishes with the greatest rigour those whom he waits for with the greatest patience.[441] And it often happens, adds the saint that they whom God has borne with for a long time, die unexpectedly, and without time for repentance.[442] And the greater the light which God will have given, the greater will be your blindness and obstinacy in sin. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of justice, than after they have known it, to turn back.[443] And St Paul says that it is morally impossible for a soul that sins after being enlightened, to be again converted. For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gifts . . . and are fallen away, to be renewed to penance.[444]

The threats of the Lord against those who are deaf to his calls are truly alarming. Because I have called, and you have refused . . . I also will laugh at your destruction, and will mock when that shall come to you which you feared.[445] Mark the words—I also: they mean that as the sinner has mocked God by his confessions, by promising fidelity, and afterward betraying him: so the Lord will mock him at the hour of death. The wise man says: As a dog that returned to the vomit, so is the fool that repeateth his folly. [446] In explaining this text, Denis the Carthusian says, that as a dog that eats what he has just vomited is an object of disgust and abomination, so the sinner, who relapses into sins which he has detested in the tribunal of penance, renders himself hateful in the sight of God.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold me, O my God, at Thy feet. I am that disgusting dog that has so often eaten the forbidden apples, which I before detested. I do not deserve mercy; but O my Redeemer, the blood which Thou hast shed for me encourages and obliges me to hope for it. How often have I offended Thee and Thou hast pardoned me! I promised never more to offend Thee, and I have afterward returned to the vomit and Thou hast again pardoned me. What do I wait for? Is it that Thou mayest send me to hell or that Thou mayest abandon me into the band of my sins, which would be a greater punishment than hell? No, my God! I wish to amend and in order to be faithful to Thee, I will put all my confidence in Thee. I will, whenever I am tempted, always and instantly have recourse to Thee. Thitherto I have trusted in my promises and resolutions and have neglected to recommend myself to Thee in my temptations: this has been the cause of my ruin. Henceforth Thou shalt be my hope and my strength and thus I shall be able to do all things. I can do all things in Him that strengthened me.[447] Give me grace then, O my Jesus, through Thy merits, to recommend myself to Thee and to ask Thy aid in my wants. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good, amiable above every good: I wish to love Thee alone; but it is from Thee I must receive aid to love Thee. O Mary, my Mother, do thou also assist me by thy intercession; keep me under thy protection, and make me always invoke thee when I am tempted. Thy name shall be my defence.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST ALWAYS FEAR

My son, hast thou sinned? Do so no more; but, for thy former sins, pray that they may be forgiven thee.[448] Behold, dear Christian, the advice which your good Lord gives you because he desires your salvation. Son, offend me no more: but from this day forward be careful to ask pardon for your past transgressions. My brother, the more you have offended God, the more you should tremble at the thought of offending him again; for the next sin which you commit will make the balance of divine justice descend, and you will be lost. I do not say absolutely that after another sin there will be no more forgiveness for you; for this I do not know: but I say that it may happen. Hence, when you are tempted, say within yourself: Perhaps God will pardon me no more, and I shall be lost. Tell me; were it probable that certain food contained poison, would you eat it? If you had reason to think that on a certain road your enemies lay in wait to take away your life, would you pass that way as long as you could find another more free from danger? And what security, or even what probability, have you that if you relapse into sin, you will afterward repent sincerely of it; and that you will not return again to the vomit? What just reason have you to believe that God will not strike you dead in the very act of sin, or that, after your sin, he will not abandon you.

If you purchase a house, you spare no pains to obtain all the securities necessary to guard against the loss of your money; if you take medicine, you are careful to assure yourself that it cannot injure you; if you pass over a torrent, you cautiously avoid all danger of falling into it; and for a miserable gratification, for a beastly pleasure, you will risk your eternal salvation, saying: I expect o go to confession after this sin. But when, I ask, will you go to confession? Perhaps on Sunday. And who has promised that you will live till Sunday? Perhaps you intend to go to confession tomorrow? But who promised you tomorrow? "Do you cling," says St Augustine, "to a day, who are not sure of an hour?"[449]How can you promise yourself that you will go to confession tomorrow, when you know not whether you will be among the living in another hour? "He," continues the saint, "who has promised pardon to penitents has not promised tomorrow to sinners; perhaps he will give it, and perhaps he will not."[450] If you now commit sin, God, perhaps will give you time for repentance, and perhaps he will not; and should he not give it, what will become of you for all eternity? In the mean time, by consenting to sin, you lose your soul for the sake of a miserable pleasure, and expose yourself to the risk of being lost forever. Would you, for that vile gratification, risk a momentary pleasure, expose to danger your all—your money, your houses, your possessions, your liberty and life? Surely you would not. Will you then, for that wretched delight, lose all—your soul, heaven and God? Do you believer that heaven, hell and eternity are truths of faith, or that they are fables? Do you believe that if death overtakes you in sin, you will be lost forever? Oh. What temerity! what folly! To condemn yourself by your own free act to an eternity of torments with the hope of afterward reversing the sentence of your condemnation. No one is so foolish as to take poison with the hope of being preserved from death; and will you condemn yourself to eternal death, saying, I will, perhaps, be hereafter delivered from it? O folly, which has brought, and brings, so many souls to hell! Thou hast, says the Lord, trusted in thy wickedness . . . Evil shall come upon thee, and thou shalt not know the rising therefore.[451] You have sinned through a rash confidence in the divine mercy; vengeance will unexpectedly fall upon you, and you will not know whence it comes.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold, O Lord! One of those fools who have so often lost their soul and Thy grace with the hope of afterward recovering them. And hadst Thou struck me dead in those nights in which I was to sin, what would have become of me? I thank Thy mercy, which has waited for me, and which now makes me sensible to my folly. I see that Thou desirest my salvation; and I too wish to save my soul. I am sorry, O infinite Goodness for having so often turned my back upon Thee. I love Thee with my whole heart. And I hope in the merits of Thy Passion. O my Jesus! That I will never again be one of those fools. Pardon me at this moment and give me the gift of Thy grace. I will never leave Thee again. In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; let me never be confounded.[452] Ah no; I hope O my Redeemer, never more to suffer the misfortune and confusion of seeing myself deprived of Thy grace and love. Grant me holy perseverance, and give me the grace always to ask it of Thee by invoking Thy holy name and the name of Thy Mother, and by saying: Jesus, assist me; most holy Mary, pray for me. Yes, my Queen, if I have recourse to thee, I shall never be conquered. And when the temptation continues, obtain for me the grace not to cease to invoke thy aid.

Consideration XIX

THE STATE OF GRACE AND OF DISGRACE WITH GOD

"Man knoweth not the price thereof"—Job, xxviii.13. .

FIRST POINT

DIGNITY TO WHICH THE GRACE OF GOD RAISES US

IF, says the Lord, thou will separate the precious from the vile, shalt be as my mouth.[453] They who know how to distinguish what is precious from what is vile, are like God, "who knows how to refuse the evil and to choose the good." Let us examined now great a good it is to be in grace of God, and how great and evil to be in enmity with God. Men do not understand the value of divine grace. Man knoweth not the price thereof.[454] Hence, they exchange it for vanity, for a little earth, or for a beastly pleasure; but it is an infinite treasure which makes us worthy of the friendship of God. For, says the Wise Man, she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God.[455] Hence, a soul in grace is the friend of God. The Gentiles, who were deprived of the light of faith, deemed it impossible for a creature to attain to the friendship of God; and they who were guided only by the light of nature, could scarcely think otherwise; for, as St Jerome says, "Friendship either finds or makes equal."[456] But God has declared in several places in the Holy Scriptures, that by means of this grace we become his friends, if we observe his law. You are my friends if you do the things which I command. I will not now call your servants, . . . but I have called friends.[457] Hence, St Gregory exclaims: "O goodness of God! We do not deserve to be called even servants, and he condescends to call us friends."[458]

How fortunate would the man esteem himself, who should have the king for his friend! In a vassal, it would be temerity to presume to seek the friendship of his sovereign; but it is not temerity in a soul to aspire to the friendship of its God. St Augustine[459] relates that two courtiers entered into a monastery of hermits, and that one of them began to read the life of St Antony the Abbot. He read, and in reading his heart became gradually divested of worldly affections. Turning to his companion, he said: "What do we seek? We can hope for nothing more than the friendship of the emperor. And through how many perils do we reach this greater danger? And how long will this last?" Friend, fools that we are, what do we seek? The most we can expect to gain in the service of the emperor is, to become his friends: and should we succeed in gaining his friendship, we shall expose our eternal salvation to greater risk. It is with difficulty we can ever become the friends of Cæsar: "but, if I wish, I am this moment the friend of God."

Whosoever, then, is in the state of grace is the friend of God. He also becomes the son of God: You are gods and the son of the Most High.[460] This is the great gift which we have received from the divine love through Jesus Christ. Behold, says St John, what manner of charity the Father hath bestowed upon us—that we should be called, and should be, the sons of God.[461] Moreover, the soul in the state of grace is the spouse of God. I will espouse thee to me in faith.[462] Hence the father of the prodigal, when his son returned, ordered a ring to be put on his finger, in token of his espousal. Lastly, the soul becomes the temple of the Holy Ghost. Sr Mary d'Oignies saw a devil go out from an infant who was receiving baptism and the Holy Ghost enter with a multitudes of angels.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Therefore my God! When my soul had the happiness of being in Thy grace, it was Thy friend, Thy child, Thy spouse, and Thy temple; but by committing sin, it lost all, and became Thy enemy and the slave of hell. But I thank Thee, O my God, for giving me time to recover Thy grace. I am sorry above all things for having offended Thee, O infinite Goodness and I love Thee above all things. Ah! Receive me again into Thy friendship. For Thy mercy's sake do not reject me. I know that I deserve to be banished from Thy face; but by the sacrifice which He offered on Calvary; Jesus Christ has merited for me mercy and pardon. Thy kingdom come. My Father (it is thus Thy Son has taught me to call Thee)—My Father, come with Thy grace to reign in my heart; grant that I may serve Thee alone, that I may live for Thee alone, and that I may love Thee alone. And lead us not into temptation. Ah! Do not permit my enemies to tempt me so that I may be conquered. But deliver us from evil. Deliver me from hell; but deliver me first from sin, which alone can lead me to hell. O Mary, pray for me and preserve me from the great misfortune of ever seeing myself in sin and deprived of the grace of thy and my God.

SECOND POINT

ADVANTAGES THAT THE GRACE OF GOD PROCURES FOR US

St Thomas of Aquino says that the gift of grace surpasses every gift that a creature can receive, since it is a participation of the divine nature.[463] And before him, St Peter said the same: "that by these ye may be made partakers of the divine nature.[464] So great things Jesus Christ has merited for us his Passion: he has communicated to as the same splendour that he received from the Father. And the glory which Thou hast given to Me, I have given to them.[465] In fine, a soul in the state of grace is one thing with God. He, says St Paul, that is joined to the Lord is one spirit.[466] The Redeemer has said that in a soul that loves God, the Three Persons of the Most Holy Trinity dwell. If any one love Me, my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and we will make our abode with him.[467]

So great is the beauty of a soul in the state of grace, that God himself extols it. How beautiful art thou! How beautiful art thou![468] The Lord appears never to take his eyes off the soul that loves him, nor to close his ears to his petitions. The eyes of the Lord are upon the just: and His ears unto their prayers.[469] St Bridget used to say that a man could not behold the beauty of a soul in the grace of God, without dying through joy. And St Catharine of Sienna, seeing a soul in the state of grace, said that she would willingly have given her life to prevent that soul from losing such beauty. Hence she kissed the ground on which priests walked, because through them souls recover the grace of God.

How many treasures of merits can a soul in the state of grace acquire? Each moment it can merit an eternity of glory. St Thomas teaches that every act of love merits for the soul eternity life.[470] Why then should we envy the great ones of the earth? If we are in the grace of God, we can constantly acquire far more greatness in heaven. A certain lay-brother of the Society of Jesus, as Fr Patrignani relates in his Menologies, appeared after death, and said that he and Philip the Second, King of Spain, were in the enjoyment of glory; but that his glory in heaven was as far superior to that of Philip, as that monarch was raised above him on this earth. Moreover, he alone who has experienced it, can conceive the peace which a soul in the grace of God enjoys in this life. O taste and see that the Lord is sweet.[471] The words of the Lord cannot fail. Much peace have they that love thy law.[472] The peace of a soul that is untied with God surpasses all the pleasures that the sense and the word can give. The peace of God which surpasseth all understanding.[473]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my Jesus! Thou art the good pastor, who allowed Thyself to be slaughtered in order to give life to Thy sheep. When I fled away from Thee, Thou didst not cease to follow and seek after me: Thou receivest me now that I seek Thee, and cast myself with a penitent heart at Thy feet. Give me again Thy grace which I have miserably lost through my own fault. I am sorry for it with my whole heart; I would wish to die of sorrow at the thought of having so often turned my back on Thee. Pardon me through the merits of the painful death which Thou didst suffer for me on the cross. Bind me with the sweet chains of Thy love, and do not permit me ever more to fly away from Thee. Since I have merited the eternal torments of hell, give me strength to bear with patience all the crosses which Thou sendest me. Since I have deserved to be for eternity under the feet of the devils, make me embrace with love all the contempt and insults which I shall receive from men. Finally make me obedient to all Thy holy inspirations, and give me grace to conquer all human respect for the love of Thee. I am resolved henceforward to serve Thee only: let others say what they please, I will serve Thee alone, O my most amiable God! Thee only do I wish to please. But give me Thy aid, without which I can do nothing. I love Thee, O my Jesus with my whole heart, and I trust in Thy blood. Mary, my hope, assists me by thy prayers. I glory in being thy servant, and thou dost glory in saving sinners who have recourse to thee. Come to my relief and save me.

THIRD POINT

ENMITY WITH GOD

Let us now see the misery of a soul that is in enmity with God. It is separated from God, his sovereign good. Your iniquities, says the prophet Isaias, have divided between you and your God.[474] Hence the soul is no longer his, and he is no longer its God. You are not my people and I will not be yours.[475] The soul not only belongs no longer to God, but God even hates if and condemns it to hell. God does not hate any of his creatures; he does not hate the wild beast, the vipers or the toad. Thou loveset all things that are, and hatest none of the things which Thou hast made.[476] But he cannot refrain from hating sinners. Thou hatest all the workers of iniquity.[477] Yes; God cannot but hate sin, which is diametrically opposed to his will; and in hating sin he must necessarily hat the sinner who is united to his sin. But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike.[478]

O God! If a man has for his enemy a monarch of the earth, he cannot sleep, he is every moment in dread of death. And how can he who is the enemy of God enjoy peace? He may escape the vengeance of his sovereign by concealing himself in a wood, or by taking refuge in a distant country. But who can fly from the hands of God? Lord, says David, if I shall ascend into heaven, if I shall hide myself in hell, wheresoever I go, Thy hand can reach me. If I ascent into heaven, Thou art there; if I descend into hell, Thou art present . . . Even there also shall Thy hand lead me.[479]

Poor sinners! They are cursed by God, cursed by the angels, cursed by the saints, cursed also every day on earth by all priests and religious, who, in reciting the divine office, proclaim them accursed. They are cursed who decline from thy commandments.[480] Moreover, the soul that is at enmity with God has lost all its merits. Should a man be equal in merit to St Paul the Hermit, who lived forty-eight years in a cave; to St Francis Xavier, who gained ten millions of souls to God; or to St Paul the Apostle, who, according to St Jerome, surpassed in merit all the other apostles—that man, if he commit a single mortal sin, loses all. All his justices which he hath done shall not be remembered.[481] Behold the ruin which the enmity of God produces; it transforms the child of God into the slave of Lucifer; his beloved friend into an enemy whom he sovereignly hates; and the heir of heaven into one condemned to hell. St Francis de Sales used to say that, were the angels capable of weeping they should shed tears of pity the sight of a soul that commits mortal sin and loses the divine grace.

But the greatest misery is that the angels would, if it were in their power, weep; and the sinner weeps not. "A Christian," says St Augustine, "if he loses a sheep or any other valuable animal, weeps over the loss, and neither eats nor sleep; but when he loses the grace of God, he eats and sleeps, and shed not a single tear.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Behold, O Redeemer! The miserable state to which I have brought myself. To make me worthy of Thy grace, Thou didst spend thirty-three years in toil and pains; and I, for the poisoned pleasure of a moment, have despised and lost it. I thank Thy mercy, which still give me time to recover it if I wish. Yes, I wish to do everything in my power to regain it. Tell me what I must do in order to obtain Thy pardon. Dost Thou wish me to repent? O my Jesus! I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended Thy infinite Goodness. Dost Thou wish me to love Thee? I love Thee above all things. Hitherto I have unfortunately employed my heart in loving creatures and vanities. From this day forward I will live only for Thee; I will love only Thee my God, my treasure, my hope and my strength. I will love Thee, O Lord, my strength.[482] Thy merits, Thy wounds, O my Jesus, shall be my hope and my strength; from Thee I hope for strength to be faithful to Thee. Give me then, O my Redeemer the gift of Thy grace, and do not permit me ever again to depart from Thee. Divest my soul of all worldly affections, and to inflame my heart with Thy holy love. Kindle in it the fire of Thy love. Mary, my Mother, who wert always on fire with divine love, make me burn like thee with the love of God.

THE FOLLY OF THE SINNER

"For the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God."—I. Cor., iii.19. .

FIRST POINT

THE LARGE NUMBER OF FOOLS

THE Venerable John Avila would have divided the world into two prisons, one for the incredulous; the other for Chris tians who live in sin at a distance from God. The prison of the latter he would have called the prison of fools. But the greatest misery and misfortune is that these miserable men esteem themselves wise and prudent, though they are the most foolish and imprudent of mortals. And unfortunately they are exceedingly numerous. The number of fools is infinite.[483] Some are foolish through love of honours; some for the sake of pleasures; and others from attachment to the miserable goods of this earth. And great as their folly is, they have the temerity to call the saints fools, because they despise the goods of this life in order to gain eternity salvation and the possession of God, who is true and supreme good. They deem it folly to embrace contempt, and to pardon injuries; folly to abstain from sensual pleasures, and to practise mortification; folly to renounce honours and riches, to love solitude and a humble and hidden life. But they never reflect that the Lord has called their wisdom folly. For, says the apostle, the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God.[484]

Ah! They will one day confess their folly; but when? When there will be no remedy for it. They will then say in despair: We fools esteemed their life madness and their end without honour.[485] Ah! Fools that we have been! We regarded the lives of the saints as folly; but now we know that we have been miserably foolish. Behold how they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints.[486] Behold how they have obtained a place among the happy number of the children of God, and have secured their lot among the saints—an eternal lot, which will make them happy for eternity; and we are among the number of the slaves of the devils, condemned to burn in this pit of torments of all eternity. Therefore we have erred, thus they shall conclude their lamentation, from the way of truth, and the light of justice hath not shined unto us.[487] Then we have erred by shutting our eyes to God's light; and what renders our condition still more forlorn is, that for our error there is no remedy, and there will be none as long as God will be God.

How great then the folly of sinners, who, for a worthless gain, for a little smoke, for a transient delight, lose the grace of God! What would not a vassal do in order to gain the favour of his sovereign? O God, for a miserable gratification, to lose God, the supreme God; to lose paradise, to forfeit peace in this life, by bringing into the soul the monster sin, which, by its remorse, will torture it unceasingly and to condemn yourself voluntarily to everlasting woe! Would you indulge in that forbidden pleasure if, in punishment, your hand was to be burned? Or if you were to be shut up for a year in a grave? Would you commit that sin, if after consenting to it, you should forfeit a hundred crowns? And still you believe and know that in yielding to sin, you lose heaven and God, and that you are condemned to eternal fire: and after all you transgress the divine law.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O God of my soul! What should be my lot at this moment, if Thou hast not shown me so many mercies? I should be in hell among the number of the foolish to which I have belonged. I thank Tee, O my Lord! And I entreat Thee not to abandon me in my blindness. I feel that Thou tenderly callest and invitest me to ask pardon, and to hope for great graces from Thee, after the insults I have offered to Thee. Yes, my Saviour! I hope Thou wilt admit me among Thy children; I am worthy to be called Thy child, after having so often insulted Thee to Thy face. Father, I am not worthy to be called Thy child: I have sinned against heaven and before Thee.[488] But I know that Thou goest in search of the strayed sheep and that Thou feelest consolation in embracing Thy lost children. My dear Father! I am sorry for having offended Thee. I cast myself at Thy feet, and embrace them: I will not depart till Thou pardon and bless me.

I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me.[489] Bless me, O my Father! And let the fruit of Thy benediction be, a great sorrow for my sin, and a great love for Thee. I love Thee, O my Father! I love Thee with my whole heart. Do not permit me ever more to depart from Thee. Deprive me of all; but do not strip me of Thy love. O Mary, if God is my Father, thou art my Mother. Do thou also bless me. I do not deserve to be thy son: accept me for thy servant; but make me a servant who will always love thee tenderly and always confide in thy protection.

SECOND POINT

GREAT FOLLY

Poor sinners! They labour and toil for the attainment of worldly sciences, or the art of gaining the goods of this life, which will soon end, and neglect the goods of the next life, which is everlasting! They lose their reason to such a degree, that they become not only fools, but senseless beasts; for living like brute animals, they attend not to what is lawful or unlawful, but only follow the beastly instincts of the senses, and embrace what is pleasing to the flesh, without ever reflecting on what they lose, or on the eternal ruin which they bring upon themselves. To live in this manner is, to act not like a man, but like a senseless beast. St John Chrysostom says: "We call him a man who preserves intact the image of man; but what is this image of man: To be rational."[490] To be a man is to be rational—that is, to act according to reason, and not according to the sensual appetite. Were beasts to receive from God the use of reason, and to act according to its dictates, we should say that they acted like men; and on the other had, when a man follows the impulse of the senses in opposition to reason, it must be said he acts like a beast.

O that they would be wise, and would understand, and would provide for their last end.[491] He, who acts according to the rules of prudence, looks to the future—that is, to what must happen at the end of life—to death and judgement, and after judgement, hell or heaven. Oh! How much wise is the peasant who saves his soul than the monarch who brings himself to hell. Better is a child who is poor and wise than a king that is old and foolish, who knoweth not to foresee hereafter.[492] O God! Would not all pronounce the man to be a fool, who in order to gain a shilling, would risk his entire property? And will he not be considered foolish, who, for a momentary gratification, forfeits the grace of God, and expose his soul to the danger of eternal perdition? The care of present and the total neglect of eternal goods and evils is the ruin of the immense multitude of the damned.

God has certainly not placed us in this world to become rich, or acquire honours, or to indulge our senses, but to gain eternal life. But the end life everlasting.[493] And nothing but the attainment of this end is of importance to us. One thing is necessary.[494] But there is nothing that sinners despise more than this end: they think only of the present; they each day walk toward death, and approach the gate of eternity, but know not whither they are going. "What would you think," says St Augustine, "of a pilot, who, when asked where he is going should answer, that he did not know? Would not all exclaim that he is bringing the ship to ruin? Such," adds the saint "is the man who runs out of the way."[495] Such are the wise of the world, who know how to acquire wealth, to indulge in amusements, to gain posts of honour and emolument, but know not how to save their souls. The rich glutton knew how to lay up wealth; but he died, and was buried in hell.[496] Alexander the Great knew how to acquire many kingdoms; but in a few yeas he died, and was lost forever. Henry VIII knew how to preserve his throne by rebelling against the Church; but seeing at death that he lost his soul, he exclaimed: We have lost all. How many miserable sinners now weep and cry out in hell: What hath pride profited us? Or what advantage hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow.[497] Behold, they exclaim, for us all the goods of the world have passed away like a shadow, and nothing remains but eternal wailing and everlasting torments.

Before man is life and death, that which he shall choose shall be given him.[498] Beloved Christian, God places before you in this world, life and death—that is, the voluntary privation of forbidden pleasures, by which you will gain eternal life; or the indulgence of them, by which you merit everlasting death. What do you say? What choice do you make? In making the choice, act like a man, and not like a senseless beast. Act like a Christian who believes in the Gospel and says: What doth it profit a man if he gains the whole world and suffer the lost of his own soul?[499]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! Thou hast given me reason, Thou hast given me the light of faith, and I have acted like a senseless beast, by losing Thy grace for the miserable pleasure of the senses, which have passed away like air; and now I find nothing but remorse of conscience, and debts to Thy divine justice. Enter not into judgement with Thy servant?[500] Ah Lord! Judge me not according to my merits but treat me according to Thy mercy. Give me light, give me sorrow for the offences that I have committed against Thee, and pardon me. "I have gone astray like a sheep that is lost; seek thy servant." I am a lost sheep; and unless Thou seek after me, I shall be lost forever. Have pity on me for the sake of that blood which Thou hast shed for me. I am sorry, O Sovereign Good! For having left Thee, and for having voluntarily renounced Thy grace. I would wish to die of sorrow but give me an increase of sorrow. Bring me to heaven that there I may sing Thy mercies. Mary, my Mother, thou art my refuge: pray to Jesus for me: beg of him to grant me pardon and holy perseverance.

THIRD POINT

TRUE WISDOM

Let us be persuaded that the truly wise are they who know how to acquire the divine grace, and the kingdom of heaven; and let us incessantly implore the Lord to give us the science of the saints, which he gives to all who ask it from him.[501] Oh! What a precious science to know how to love God, and to save our souls! This science consists in knowing how to walk in the way of salvation, and to adopt the means of attaining eternal life. The affair of salvation is of all affairs the most necessary. If we know all things, and know not how to save our souls, our knowledge will be unprofitable to us, and we shall be forever miserable: but on the other hand, though we should be ignorant of all things, we shall be happy for eternity, if we know how to love God. "Blessed is the man," says St Augustine, "who knows Thee though he be ignorant of other things."[502] One day, Br Giles said to St Bonaventure: Happy you, Fr Bonaventure, who are so learned. I am a poor, ignorant man, who knows nothing. You can become more holy than I can. "Listen," replied the saint: "If an ignorant old woman love God more than I do, she shall be more holy than I am." On hearing this, Br Giles began to exclaim O poor old woman! Poor old woman! Listen, listen: if you love God, you can become more holy than Fr Bonaventure.

"The unlearned rise up," says St Augustine: "and bear away the kingdom of heaven."[503] How many souls and illiterate Christians, who, though unable to read, know how to love God and are saved! And how many of the learned of this world are damned! But the former, not the latter, are truly wise. Oh! How truly wise were St Paschal, St Felix the Capuchin, St John of God, though unacquainted with human sciences! Oh! How truly wise were so many holy men, who abandoning the world, shut themselves up in the cloister, or spent their lives in the desert! How truly wise were St Benedict, St Francis of Assisi, and St Louis of Toulouse, who renounced the throne! Oh! How truly wise were so many martyrs, so many tender virgins, who refused the hand of princes, and suffered death for the sake of Jesus Christ! That true wisdom consists in despising the goods of this life, and in securing a happy eternity, even worldlings know and believe: hence of persons who give themselves to God, they say: Happy they, who are truly wise, and save their souls! In fine, they who renounce the goods of the world to give themselves to God are said to be undeceived. What then should we call those who abandon God for worldly goods? We should call them deluded men.

Brother, to what class do you wish to belong? In order to make a good choice, St Chrysostom tells you to visit the sepulchres of the dead.[504] The grave is the school in which we may se the vanity of earthly goods, and in which we may learn the science of the saints. "Tell me," says St Chrysostom, "are you able there to discover who ahs been a prince, a noble, or a man of learning? For my part," adds the saint, "I see nothing but rottenness, worms and bones. All is but a dream, a shadow."[505] Everything in this world will soon have an end, and will vanish like a dream or a shadow. But, dearly beloved Christians, if you wish to be truly wise, it is not enough to know your end, it is necessary to adopt the means of attaining it. All would wish to be saved and to be saints; but because they do not employ the means, they never acquire sanctity, and are lost. It is necessary to fly from the occasions of sin, to frequent the sacraments, to practise mental prayer, and above all to impress on the heart the following maxims of the Gospel: What doth it profits a man if he gains the whole world?[506] He that loveth his life shall lost it.[507] That is, we must even forfeit our life in order to save the soul. If any man will come after me, let him deny himself.[508] To follow Jesus Christ it is necessary to refuse to self-love the pleasures which it seeks. Life is His good will.[509] Our salvation consists in doing the will of God. These, and other similar maxims, should be deep impressed on the soul.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O Father of mercies! Behold my miseries, and have pity on me; give me light, make me sensible of my past folly, that I may bewail it, and make known to me Thy infinite goodness, that I may love it. My Jesus! Do not deliver up to beast the souls that confess to Thee.[510] Thou hast expended Thy blood for my salvation: do not permit me ever more to be, as I have hitherto been, the slave of the devils. I am sorry, O my Sovereign Good, for having abandoned Thee. I curse all the moments in which I voluntarily consented to sin; and I embrace Thy holy will, which desires nothing but my welfare. Eternal Father!

Through the merits of Jesus Christ, give me strength to do all that is pleasing to Thee. Strike me dead rather than permit me to oppose Thy holy will. Assist me by Thy grace to banish from my heart every affection which does not tend to Thee. I love Thee, O God of my soul! I love Thee above all things: and from Thee I hope for every good, for pardon, for perseverance in Thy love, and for paradise, that there I may love Thee for eternity. O Mary, ask these graces for me. Thy son refuses thee nothing. My hope! I trust in thee.

UNHAPPY LIFE OF THE SINNER: AND THE HAPPY LIFE OF HIM WHO LOVES GOD

"There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord."—Isa. xiviii. 22

"Much peace have they that love Thy law."—Ps. cxviii.165. .

FIRST POINT

THE WORLD CANNOT MAKE US HAPPY

IN this life all men seek after peace. The merchant, the soldier, the man who goes to law, labour with the hope of making a fortune, and of thus finding peace, by worldly fortune, by a more exalted post, by gaining a lawsuit. But poor worldlings seek from the world that peace which the world cannot give. God alone can give peace which the world cannot give. God alone can give us peace. The holy Church prays in the following words: "Give to Thy servants that peace which the world cannot give."[511] No; the world with all its goods cannot content the heart of man: for he was created not for them, but for God alone: hence God alone can make him happy and content. Brute animals, that have been made for sensual delights, find peace in earthly goods. Give to an ox a bundle of hay, and to a dog a piece of flesh, and they are content, they desire nothing more. But the soul that has been created for no other end than to love God, and to live in union with him, will never be able to find peace or happiness in sensual enjoyments: God alone can make it perfectly content.

The Son of God gave the appellation of fool to the rich man who, after having reaped a rich harvest from his fields, said to himself: Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years: take thy rest, eat, drink and made good cheer. [512] "Miserable fool!" says St Basil, have you the soul of a swine, of a brute, that you expect to make it happy by eating, drinking, or by sensual delights?"[513] A man may be puffed up, but he cannot be satisfied by the goods of this world. On the words of the Gospel, behold we have left all things.[514]St Bernard writes that he saw different classes of fools labouring under different species of folly. All had a great thirst for happiness: some were satiated with the goods of the earth, which is a figure of the avaricious; others with the wind, the figure of the ambitious, who seek after empty honours: others seated round a furnace, swallowing the sparks that were thrown from it; these were the passionate and vindictive: others, in fine, drank putrid waters from a fetid lake: and these were the voluptuous and unchaste. Hence, turning to them, the saint exclaims: O fools! Do you not see that these things increase rather than diminish your thirst! The goods of this world are but apparent goods, and therefore they cannot satisfy the heart of man. You have eaten, says the Prophet Aggeus, but have not had enough.[515] Hence, the more the avaricious man possesses, the more he seeks to acquire. "The possession of great wealth," says St Augustine, "does not close, but rather extends, the jaws of avarice."[516] The more the unchaste man wallows in the mire of impurity, the greater is his disgust, and at the same time, his desire for such beastly pleasures; and how can dung and carnal filthiness content the heart? The same happens to be the ambitious man, who wishes to satisfy his desires by smoke; for he always attends more to what he wants then to what he possesses. After having acquired many kingdoms, Alexander the Great wept, because he had not dominion over other countries. If worldly goods could content the human heart, the rich and the monarchs of the earth would enjoy complete happiness; but experience shows the contrary. Solomon tells us that he refused no indulgence to his senses. Whatsoever my eyes desired, I refused them not. [517] But after all his sensual enjoyments what did he say? Vanity of vanities, and all is vanity. [518] That is, everything in this world is mere vanity, a pure lie, pure folly.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! What now remains of all the offences I have offered to Thee, but pain, bitterness and merits for hell? I am not sorry for the pain and remorse which I now feel; on the contrary, they console me, because they are the gift of Thy grace and make me hope that, since Thou inspirest these sentiments, Thou wishes to pardon me. What displeases me is the pain I have given Thee, my Redeemer, who loved me so tenderly. I deserved, O my Lord, to be abandoned by Thee but, instead of abandoning me, I see that Thou offerest me pardon, and that Thou art the first to ask for a reconciliation. O my Jesus! I wish to make peace with Thee, and desire Thy grace more than every earthly good. I am sorry, O infinite Goodness, for having offended Thee; I would wish to die of sorrow for my offences. Ah! Through the love which Thou didst entertain for me when Thou didst expire on the cross, pardon me, receive me into Thy heart, and change my heart, so that henceforth I may please Thee as much as I have hitherto offended Thee. I now renounce, for Thy sake, all the pleasures that the world can give me and I resolve to forfeit my life rather than lose Thy grace. Tell me what I must do in order to please Thee; I wish to do it. What pleasures, what honours, what riches can I seek? I wish only for Thee, my God, my joy, my glory, my treasure, my life, my love, my all. Give me O Lord, strength to be faithful to Thee. Give me the grace to love Thee, and then do with me what Thou pleasest. Mary, my Mother and my hope! Take me under thy protection, and obtain for me the grace to belong entirely to God.

SECOND POINT

INTERIOR TORMENTS OF THE SINNER

But, according to Solomon, the goods of this world not only do not content the heart, but they are even a source of pain and affliction of spirit. And behold all is vanity and affliction of spirit.[519] Poor sinners! They seek for happiness in their sins, but they find nothing but bitterness and remorse. Destruction and happiness in their ways, and the way of pace they have not known.[520] What peace? What peace? There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord.[521] In the first place, sin brings with it a dread of divine vengeance. The man that is beset with powerful enemies neither eats nor sleeps in peace. And can he who has God for his enemy enjoy repose? Fear to them that work evil.[522] When the man who is in the state of sin hears the roaring of thunder, oh! How does he tremble! Every lead that moves excites terror. The sound of dread is always in his ears.[523] He is always flying away though no one pursues him. The wicked man fleeth when no man pursueth.[524] He is pursued by his own sin. After having killed his brother Abel, Cain said: Everyone therefore that findeth me, shall kill me.[525] God assured him that no one should injure him. And the Lord said to him: No; it shall not be so.[526] But, notwithstanding this assurance, Scripture tells us that Cain dwelt a fugitive on the earth.[527] He was always flying from one place to another. And who, but his own sin, was the persecutor of Cain?

Sin also brings with it remorse of conscience, that cruel worm which unceasingly gnaws the soul. If the miserable sinner goes to a festivity, to a comedy, to a place of amusement, his conscience will say to him, you are the enemy of God: should you die in your sin, where will you go? The torture of remorse of conscience is so great even in this life, that to free themselves from it, some have committed suicide. It is related of a certain man, who had killed an infant, that, in order to get rid of the stings of remorse, he entered into a monastery; but finding no peace even there, he went before a judge, confessed his crime, and was condemned to death.

What is a soul without God? The Holy Ghost compared it to a sea agitated by the tempest. The wicked are like the raging sea, which cannot rest.[528] Were a person brought to a musical exhibition, or to a ball, and obliged to remain suspended by a cord, which his head downward, could he enjoy the entertainment? Such is the state of a man who lives in the enjoyment of worldly goods, but without God: his soul is as it were turned upside down. He may eat and drink and dance, he may wear costly apparel, and may acquire honours, dignities, and possessions; but he never will have peace. There is no peace to the wicked.[529] God alone imparts peace; but he gives it to his friends, not to his enemies.

"The goods of this earth," says St Vincent Ferrer, "do not enter the soul. They are waters which do not penetrate where there is thirst."[530] The sinner may wear embroidered robes and the riches jewels; he may indulge the palate as much as he pleases; but his poor soul will be full of thorns and gall; and therefore with all his riches, pleasures, and amusements, you will see him always unhappy and ready to fly into a rage and fury at every contradiction. He who loves God resigns himself to the divine will in adversity, and enjoys peace; but he who lives in opposition to the divine will, cannot conform to it, and therefore he has no means of tranquillising the soul. The miserable man serves the devil; he serves a tyrant who repays him with gall and bitterness. Ah! The words of God can never fail. Because thou didst not serve the Lord thy God with joy and gladness, thou shalt serve the enemy in hunger and thirst, and nakedness, and in want of all things.[531] What do not the vindictive suffer after they have gratified their resentment? The unchaste, after they have attained their wicked object? What do not the ambitious, the avaricious endure? Oh, how many are there, who, if they suffer for God as much as they suffer to bring themselves to their own damnation, would become great saints?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my lost life! O my God! If to serve Thee I had suffered the pain which I have endured in order to offend Thee, how many merits should I now find treasured up for Paradise! Ah, my Lord, for what have I abandoned Thee, and lost Thy grace? For poisoned and momentary pleasures, which, as soon as they were indulged, disappeared and left my soul full of thorns and bitterness. Ah, my sins, I detest you, I curse you a thousand times. I bless Thy mercy, O my God! which has borne with me so patiently? I love Thee, O my Creator and Redeemer! Who hast given Thy life for me, and because I love Thee, I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended Thee. My God, my God! Why have I lost Thee? For what have I exchanged Thee? I now know the evil I have done; and I resolved to lose everything, even life, rather that lose Thy love. Give me light, O Eternal Father! For the sake of Jesus Christ; make know to me Thy greatness, and the nothingness of the goods which the devils present to me in order to make me lose Thy grace. I love Thee but I desire to love Thee with greater ardour. Grant that Thou alone may be my only though, my only desire, my only love. I hope for all from Thy goodness, through the merits of Thy Son. Mary, my Mother, through the love which thou bearest to Jesus Christ, I entreat thee to obtain for me light and strength to serve him and to love him till death.

THIRD POINT

HAPPINESS OF THE JUST ON EARTH

Then all the goods and delights of this world cannot content the human heart. Who can satisfy all its desires? God alone. Delight in the Lord and He will give thee the requests of thy heart.[532] The heart of man is always in search of goods that will make him happy. He enjoys riches, pleasures, honours and he is not content; for these are finite goods, and he was created for an infinite good. But, let him seek God, let him unite himself to God, and behold he is content, all his desires are satisfied. Delight in the Lord and He will give thee the requests of thy heart. During all the time which St Augustine spent in sensual delights, he never found peace. This he afterwards confessed when he gave himself to God. "Our heart is restless till it rests in thee."[533] My God I know that all is vanity and affliction, and that Thou alone art the true peace of the soul. "All things are hard, and thou alone repose."[534] Hence he afterward wrote: "What do you seek, O miserable man? Seek one good, in which are all goods."[535] While he was in sin, David went to his gardens, and indulged in the pleasures of the table and all other royal entertainments; but the table, the gardens, and the creatures in which he tool delight, said to him: David, do you expect that we shall make you happy! It is not in our power to content your heart. Where is your God? Go and find your God; he alone can satisfy the cravings of your soul. Hence, in the midst of all his enjoyments, David wept continually. My tears have been my bread day and night, while it is said to me daily: Where is thy God?[536]

But, oh! How content and happy does God make the faithful souls that love him! After having left all for God, without shoes, almost naked, and dead from cold and hunger, St Francis of Assisi, enjoyed a paradise in saying: "My God and my all." After he had become a religious, St Francis Borgia was obliged, in travelling often to lie on a bed of straw; but so abundant were the consolations which he experienced, that he could not sleep. When St Philip Neri left all things, he used, after going to rest, to receive so much consolation from God, that he would say: O my Jesus, allow me to sleep. Fr Charles of Lorraine, who was descended from the princes of Lorraine, and entered the Society of Jesus, began sometimes to dance through joy in his poor cell. In the plains of India, St Francis Xavier would uncover his breast and exclaim: "Enough, O Lord." No more consolation: my heart can bear no more. St Teresa used to say that a single drop of heavenly consolation gives more content than all the pleasures and amusements of the world can give. Ah! God cannot but fulfil his promises to give peace and happiness to all who renounce worldly goods for his sake. And everyone that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, for My name's sake, shall receive an hundred f old, and shalt possess life everlasting.[537]

What then do we seek after? Let us go to Jesus Christ, who calls us, saying: Come to Me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you.[538] Ah! The soul that loves God enjoys that peace which surpasses all the pleasures and gratifications which the world and the senses can give. It is true that in this life, event he saints have to submit to pains and crosses; for this earth is a place of merit, and it is impossible to merit without suffering. But, according to St Bonaventure, divine love, like honey, renders things the most bitter, sweet and amiable. He that loves God, loves the will of God, and therefore he rejoices in sorrows, because in embracing them he knows that he gives delight and pleasure to his God. "We see the cross," says St Bernard, "but not the unction."[539] We behold only the mortifications which the lovers of God endure, and the pleasures from which they abstain; but we do not see the spiritual delights with which the Lord consoles them. Oh! If sinners tasted the peace enjoyed by a soul that wishes for nothing but God, O taste and see, says David, that the Lord is sweet.[540] My brother, begin to make meditation every day, to communicate frequently to converse with God; and you will find that during the short time which you spend with him, he will give you greater consolation than the world, with all its amusements, as ever given you. O, taste and see! He who has not tasted, cannot understand how God contents the soul that loves him.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My dear Redeemer! How have I been hitherto so blind as to abandon Thee, who art an infinite good, and the fountain of all consolations, for the miserable and momentary gratification of the senses? I am astonished at my blindness, but I am still more astonished at Thy mercy, which has so bountifully borne with me. I thank Thee for making me now sensible of my folly, and of my obligation to love Thee. I love Thee, O my Jesus! With my whole soul but I desire to love Thee with greater fervour. Increase my desire and my love. Enamour my soul of Thee, who art infinitely amiable—of Thee, who hast left nothing undone to gain my love; of Thee, who so ardently desirest my love. If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean.[541] Ah, my dear Redeemer, purify my heart from all impure affections, which hinder me to love Thee as I would wish! It is not in my power to inflame my whole heart with the love of Thee, and to make it love nothing but Thee. This requires the power of Thy grace, which can do all things. Detach me from every creature, banish from my soul every affection that is not for Thee, make me all Thine. I am sorry above all things for all the displeasure I have given Thee. I resolve to consecrate all the days of my life to Thy holy love; but it is only Thy grace that can make me fulfil this resolution. Grant me, O Lord, this grace for the sake of the blood which Thou didst shed for me with so much pain, and so much love. Let it be the glory of Thy power to make my heart, which was once full of earthly affections, now become all flames of love for Thee, O infinite Good! O mother of fair love, O Mary! By thy prayer make my whole soul burn, as thine did, with the charity of God.

THE HABIT OF SIN

"The wicked man, when he is come into the dept of sins, contemneth."—Ps. xviii. 13.

FIRST POINT

THE HABIT OF SIN BLINDS THE SOUL

THE evil inclination to sin is one of the greatest injuries that we have received from the sin of Adam. This made the Apostle weep when he saw himself impelled by concupiscence to the very evil which he abhorred. I see another law in my members. . . . captivating me in the law of sin.[542] Hence it is so difficult for us, whoa re drawn to evil by this concupiscence and by so many enemies, to reach, without sin, the land of bliss. What would you say of a traveller who, being obliged to cross an agitated sea in a shattered vessel, would load the ship with a burden which, even in a calm sea, would be sufficient to sink the vessel? What hopes could you entertain of the safety of such a man? Now, we may say the same of the man who has contracted an evil habit: he must pass the sea of this life (a sea always tempestuous, in which so many perish) in the weak and shattered vessel of the flesh, to which we are united: and he overloads this vessel with sins of habit. It is very difficult for such a man to save his soul; because a bad habit blinds the understanding, hardens the heart and thus makes the sinner obstinate till death.

First, a bad habit blinds the understanding. Why do the saints always implore light from God, and tremble lest they should become the greatest sinners in the world? Because they know that if thy lose God's light they may commit the greatest crimes. How does it happen that so many Christians live obstinately in sin until they are lost in the end*? Their own malice blinded them.*[543] Sin blinds them, and thus they are lost. Every sin produces blindness; the more sins are multiplied, the greater the blindness they produce. God is our light; and therefore, the farther the soul is removed from God, the blinder it becomes. His bones, says Job, shall be filled with the vices of his youth.[544] As the light of the sun cannot enter a vessel filled with clay; so a heart replete with vices cannot admit the light of God. Hence we see certain sinners lose the divine light, so that they go on from sin to sin without ever thinking of repentance. The wicked walk round about.[545] Fallen into the dark pit of sin, they do nothing but commit sins, they speak only of sins, they think only of sinning, and scarcely feel any longer that sin is an evil. The very habit of sin, says St Augustine, does not allow them to see the evil which they do.[546] Hence they live as if they no longer believed in the existence of God, of heaven, hell or eternity.

And behold! after an evil habit is contracted, the sins which before excited horror are now viewed with indifference. Make them, says David, like a wheel, and as stubble before the wind.[547] See, says Gregory, how a straw is blown about by every breath of air. In like manner a person, before he fails into sin, resists and combats temptations, at least for some time; but, after having contracted a bad habit, he yields instantly to every temptation, and falls in every occasion of sin; and why? Because the habit of sin has deprived him of light. St Anselm says that the devil acts toward certain sinners like a person who fastens a cord to a bird: he allows it to fly away; but, whenever he pleases, draws it back to the earth. These are, accordingly to the saint, habitual sinners. St Bernardine says (tom. iv. serm. xv.) that some continue to commit sin without being exposed to any dangerous occasion. He compares habitual sinners to the wings of a windmill, which are driven round by every wind, and turn the mill even when there is no corn to be ground, and against the will of the master. You will find habitual sinners who indulge in bad thoughts even without any occasion to excite them, without pleasure, and drawn into them as it were involuntarily and forcibly by the effects of evil habits. As St Augustine says a bad habit brings on a certain necessity.[548] And according to St Bernardine, evil habits are changed into our nature.[549] Hence, as it is necessary for a man to breathe, so it appears that habitual sinners become the slaves of sin, and bring themselves into a necessity of falling into sin. I have said that they become slaves of sin. There are servants, who serve for wages and slaves, who serve by force and without remuneration. With these we may compare certain miserable men, who sin even without pleasure.

The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins contemneth.[550] This passage St Chrysostom explains of habitual sinners, who, sunk in an abyss of darkness, despise corrections, sermons, censures, hell and God: they despise everything and resemble the vulture that waits to be killed by the fowler, rather than abandon the dead body on which it feeds. Fr Recupito relates that a man condemned to death, even when going to the place of execution, raised his eyes, saw a young female, and consented to a bad thought. Fr Gisolfo relates that a blasphemer, who had been likewise condemned to death, when thrown off the scaffold, broke out into a blasphemy. St Bernard goes so far as to say that it is almost useless to pray for habitual sinners,—that we must weep over them as lost forever. If they no longer see their danger, how can they escape the precipice? To preserve them from it, a miracle of grace is necessary. The miserable wretches will open their eyes in hell, when the sight of their misery will serve only to make them weep more bitterly over their folly.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My God! Thou hast bestowed more favours on me than on others, and I have done greater injuries to Thee than any person whom I know. O sorrowful heart of my Redeemer, so much afflicted and tortured on the cross at the sight of my sins; give me through Thy merits a lively sense of my faults, and a lively sorrow for them. Ah, my Jesus! I am full of vices, but Thou art omnipotent: Thou canst easily fill my soul with Thy holy love. I therefore hope in Thee, who art infinite Goodness and infinite mercy. I repent, O Sovereign Good of having offended Thee. O that I had died rather than have ever offended Thee! I have forgotten Thee; but Thou hast not forgotten me; this I see with the light which Thou now givest me. Since, then, Thou givest me this light, give me also strength to be faithful to Thee. I promise to die a thousand times rather than ever turn my back upon Thee. But in Thy aid I place my hopes. In Thee! O Lord, I have hoped; let me never be confounded. I hope, O my Jesus, in Thee, that I shall never more see myself confounded in sin, and deprived of Thy grace. To thee also, O Mary, my mistress, I turn. In thee, O Lady! I have hoped; let me not be confounded forever. O my hope, I trust in thy intercession, that I shall never again see myself the enemy of thy Son. Ah! Beg of him to strike me dead rather than abandon me to this sovereign misfortune.

SECOND POINT

THE HABIT OF SIN HARDENS THE HEART

A bad habit hardens the heart. And this hardness of heart God justly permits in punishment of resisting his calls. The Lord, says the Apostle, hath mercy on whom He will: and whom He will He hardeneth.[551] According to St Augustine, God hardens the sinner by not showing mercy.[552] It is not that God directly hardens habitual sinners, but he subtracts his graces in punishment of their ingratitude for past favours, and thus their heart becomes hard like a stone. His heart shall be as hard as a stone, and as firm as a smith's anvil.[553] Hence, it is that, while others are softened, and shed tears in hearing sermons on the rigour of divine justice, on the pains of the damned, or on the Passion of Jesus Christ, the habitual sinner remains unmoved, he speaks and listens to others speaking on these subjects with as much indifference as if they did not concern him; and thus these sermons will serve to render him more obdurate. His heart shall be as firm as a smith's anvil.

Even sudden deaths, earthquakes, thunder and lightning will no longer strike terror into the heart of the habitual sinner; instead of awaking, and making him enter into himself, they will rather encourage him in the deadly sleep of death and perdition in which he slumbers: At Thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, they have all slumbered.[554] An evil habit gradually takes away all remorse of conscience; to the habitual sinner crimes the most enormous appear trifling. The commission of sin is naturally accompanied with shame; but, according to St Jerome, they who contract evil habits lose even the shame of committing sin.[555] St Peter compares the habitual sinner to the swine that wallows in the mire.[556] As the swine wallowing in the mire feels not is stench, so the habitual sinner perceives not the stench of his crimes, which disgusts all others. "And," says St Bernardine, "what wonder is it that, after the mire of sin has blinded him, he should not see his miserable condition, even when God scourges him for his iniquities?[557] Hence, it happens that, instead of regretting his sins, he rejoices at them, he laughs at them, and boasts of them. They are glad when they have done evil.[558] A fool worketh mischief as it were for sport.[559] Are not these clear signs of diabolical obduracy? They are, says St Thomas of Villanova, all signs of damnation.[560] My brother, tremble lest this may happen to you. If you have contracted any evil habit, endeavour to abandon it now that God calls you. Rejoice and be glad as long as conscience reproves you; for it is a sign that God has not as yet abandoned you; but amend, and instantly shake off the bad habit; it you do not, the wound will become gangrenous, and you will be lost.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O Lord, how shall I be able to thank Thee as I ought for so many graces which Thou hast bestowed upon me? How often hast Thou called, and I have resisted? Instead of being grateful to Thee, and loving Thee, for having delivered me from hell, and for having called me with so much love, I have continued to provoke Thy wrath, by offering repeated insults to Thee. O my God! I will no longer outrage Thy patience: I have offended Thee enough. Thou alone, who art infinite Goodness, couldst have borne with me till the present moment. But I now see that Thou canst bear no longer with me. Pardon me then, O my Lord and my Sovereign Good! Pardon me all the injuries I have offered to Thee. I am sorry for them with my whole heart, and purpose never more to offend Thee. Shall I forever continue to provoke Thee? Ah, be appeased with me, O God of my soul! Not through my merits, for which nothing else is reserved but vengeance and hell, but through the merits of Thy Son and my Redeemer, in which I place all my hopes. For the love of Jesus Christ, receive me into favour, and give me perseverance in Thy love. Banish from me all impure affections and draw me entirely to Thyself. I love thee, O supreme God! I love Thee, O sovereign lover of souls! who art worthy of infinite love. Oh! that I had always loved Thee. O Mary, my Mother! Obtain for me the grace to spend the remainder of my life not in offending, but in loving thy Son, and in bewailing the displeasure I have given him.

THIRD POINT

THE HABIT OF SIN LEADS TO FINAL IMPENITENCE

When the understanding is deprives of light, and the heart hardened, the sinner ordinarily makes a bad end, and dies obstinate in his sin. A hard heart shall fare ill at the end.[561] The just continue to walk in the straight path. The path of the just is right to walk in.[562] But habitual sinners always walk round about.[563] They give up sin for a little, and afterward return to it. Their damnation St Bernard regards as certain. "Woe to the man who follows this circle."[564] Some of them say: I will amend before death; but it is very difficult for a habitual sinner, even in his old age, to change his life. A young man, says the Holy Ghost, according to his way, even when he is old, he will not depart from it.[565] We are very weak. Your strength, says the Prophet Isaias, shall be as the ashes of tow.[566] Hence, as St Thomas of Villanova says, the soul deprived of grace cannot abstain from committing new sins.[567] But would it not be the extreme of folly to play for, and voluntarily to lose, all your property with the hope of the man who continues to live in the midst of sins, and hopes at the last moment of life to repair all the evil he has done. Can the Ethiopian or the leopard change the colour of his skin? And how can he who has long indulged in the habit of sin, lead a good life? If, says the Prophet Jeremias, the Ethiopian can change his skin, or the leopard his spots, you also may do well when you have learned evil.[568] Hence the habitual sinner, in the end, abandons himself to despair. Such is the manner in which his life terminates. But he that is hardened in mind shall fall into evil.[569]

On the words of Job, He hath torn me with wound upon wound, he hath rushed in upon me like a giant.[570] St Gregory says that a person may, perhaps, be able to defend himself after the first wound; but after every additional one, he loses strength, till in the end he loses his life. So it is with sin. After the first and second transgressions, the sinner will have some strength (that is, through the aid of God's grace); but, if he continue in the habit of sin, it will rush on him like a giant. How is it possible for the sinner to escape death after his strength has been diminished, and his wounds multiplied? Sin, as the Prophet Jeremias says, like a huge stone, oppresses the sinner.[571] St Bernard compares the habitual sinner with a man who ahs fallen under a large stone, which he has not strength to remove. It is as difficult for the former to shake off his bad habits, as it is for the latter to get rid of the load that presses upon him. "The man on whom the weight of a bad habit presses, rises with difficulty."[572]

The habitual sinner may say: Is my salvation then hopeless? No, you are not beyond hope: if you wish to apply it, there is still a remedy for the past. But a certain author says, that in grievous maladies very severe remedies are necessary. If to a sick man in danger of death, and unwilling to take medicine, because he is not aware of the malignity of his disease, the physician said: Friend, you will certainly die unless you take such a medicine: what would be the answer of the invalid? He would say, "As my life is in danger, I am ready to obey all your directions." Dearly beloved Christian, if you are an habitual sinner, I say the same to you. You are very ill; you are one of those invalids who, as St Thomas of Villanova says, are seldom cured;[573] you are on the brink of perdition. But if you wish to recover from your illness, there is a remedy for you; however, you must not expect a miracle of grace. You must on your part labour hard to take away the occasions of sin, to avoid bad company, and resist temptations by recommending yourself to God as soon as you perceive them: you must adopt the means of salvation, by going frequently to confessions, by reading a spiritual book every day, by practising devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and continually imploring her to obtain for you strength not to relapse into sin. You must do violence to yourself: otherwise the threat of the Lord against obstinate sinners will fall upon you. You shall die in your sin. And if you do not adopt these means now that the Lord gives you light, you will scarcely adopt them hereafter. Listen to God calling you to repentance. Lazarus, come forth. Poor sinner! You are long dead: go forth from the dark grave of your sinful life. Respond at once to the call, and give yourself instantly to God. Tremble lest this should be the last call for you.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my God! What do I wait for? Shall I wait till Thou dost abandon me and send me to hell? Ah, Lord, bear with me; I wish to change my life, and to give myself to Thee. Tell me what I must do and I will do it. O blood of Jesus! Assist me. O Mary, advocate of sinners, come to my relief. O eternal Father! Have mercy on me through the merits of Jesus and Mary. I am sorry, O God of infinite Goodness! For having offended Thee, and I love Thee above all things. Pardon me for the sake of Jesus Christ, and give me Thy love. Give me also a great fear of being lost, should I again offend Thee. Light, O God! light and strength. I hope for everything from Thy mercy. Thou didst bestow so many graces on me when I wandered at a distance from Thee; I hope for far greater graces, now that I return to Thee, resolved to love nothing but Thee. I love Thee, my God, my life, my all. I love thee also, O my Mother, Mary! To thee I consign my soul; preserve it by thy intercession from ever returning to a state of enmity with God.

THE DELUSIONS WHICH THE DEVIL PUTS INTO THE MINDS OF SINNERS

(Although the preceding considerations contain many of the sentiments contained in this, it will be useful to collect them all together, in order to dissipate the usual illusions by which the devil succeeds in inducing sinners to relapse.)

FIRST POINT

I WILL GO TO CONFESSION.—I CANNOT RESIST

LET us imagine a young man who has fallen into grievous sins, which he has already confessed, and who is restored to the friendship of God. The devil again tempts him to relapse: the young man resists for a while; but, in consequence of the delusions suggested by the enemy, he begins to vacillate. Tell me, young man, I say to him: What will you do? Will you now, for this miserable pleasure, forfeit the grace of God, which you have just acquired and which is more valuable than the whole world? Will you, yourself, write the sentence of eternal death, and condemn yourself to burn forever in hell? No, you answer, I do not wish to damn myself, I wish to be saved: If I commit this sin, I will afterward confess it. Behold the first delusion of the devil! Then you say that you will afterward confess it; but in the mean time you lose your soul. Tell me, if you had a jewel worth a thousand crowns, would you throw it into a river, saying, I will make a diligent search for it, and hope to find it? You hold in your hand the precious jewel of your soul, which Jesus Christ has purchased with his blood and you voluntarily cast it into hell (for in punishment of every mortal sin, you are condemned to eternal fire), and say: I hope to recover it by a good confession. But should you not recover it, what will be the consequence? To recover the divine grace, true repentance, which is the gift of God, is necessary. Should God not give you the grace of repentance; should death overtake you, and not allow you time to go confession, what will become of you?

You say that you will go to confession before the lapse of a week. And who promises you that you will live for week? You then say that you will go to confession tomorrow. And who promises you tomorrow? St Augustine says: "God has not promised tomorrow: perhaps he will give it, and perhaps he will not." Perhaps he will deny it to you, as he has denied it to so many others who have gone to bed in good health, and have been found dead in the morning. How many have been struck dead in the act of sin, and sent to hell? And should the same happen to you, how will you be able to repair your eternal ruin? Be assured that by this delusion—I will afterward go to confession—the devil has brought thousands and thousands of Christian to hell. It is difficult to find a sinner so abandoned to despair as to wish for his own damnation. In committing sin, all sinners hope to repent and go to confession; it is thus that so many miserable souls are lost; and now there is no remedy for their damnation.

But you say: At present I cannot resist this temptation. Behold the second delusion of the devil, who makes it appear to you that at present you have not strength to resist your passions. First, it is necessary to know that, as the Apostle says: God is faithful, and never permits us to be tempted above our strength.[574] Moreover, I ask, if you are unable to resist your passions, how will you be able to resist them hereafter? After you have yielded to one by your consent to sin he will have gained an increase of strength against you, and you will have become weaker. If, then, you are now unable to extinguish the flame of passion, how can you expect to extinguish it when it has grown stronger? You say: God will give me his aid. But this aid he gives you at present. Why, then, do you not correspond with his grace and conquer your passion? Perhaps you expect that God will give you more abundant helps and graces after you have multiplied sins. If at present you wish for greater help and strength, why do you not ask them from God? Ask, and it shall be given you.[575] God cannot violate his promise. Have recourse to him, and he will give you the strength which you require in order to resist every temptation. God does not command impossibilities; but by his commands he admonished us to do what we can with the actual aid which he gives us; and when this aid is not sufficient to enable us to resist temptations, he exhorts us to ask additional help, which he gives whenever we pray for it.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Then, my God! Why hast Thou been so bountiful to me, and I so ungrateful to Thee? We have been engaged in a mutual contest. I fled away from Thee, and Thou didst seek after me. Thou didst confer benefits on me, and I offered insults to Thee. Ah, Lord, the goodness alone which Thou hast shown me ought to enamour me of Thee; for, when I multiplied sins, Thou didst multiply Thy graces. And when have I merited the light which Thou now givest me? My Lord, I thank Thee for it with my whole heart, and I hope to thank Thee for it eternally in heaven. I hope in Thy blood for eternal salvation and I hope for it with certainty, since Thou hast treated me with so much mercy. I hope that Thou will give me grace never more to betray Thee. I purpose with Thy grace to die a thousand times rather than ever again offend Thee. I have offended Thee sufficiently. During the remainder of my life I wish to love Thee. And how can I but love a God who, after having died for me, has waited for me with so much patience, in spite of the numberless injuries I have done him. O God of my soul, I repent of all my sins with whole heart. I would wish to die of sorrow for them. But if I have hitherto turned my back upon Thee, I now love Thee above all things; I love Thee more than myself. Eternal Father! Through the merits of Jesus Christ, assist a miserable sinner, who wishes to love Thee. Mary, my hope! assist me; obtain for me the grace always to have recourse to thy Son, and to thee as often as the devil tempts me to offend God again.

SECOND POINT

GOD IS MERCIFUL

God is merciful. Behold the third delusion of sinners by which an immense number are lost! A learned author says that the mercy of God sends more souls to hell than his justice; for sinners are induced, by a rash confidence in the divine mercy, to continue in sin, and thus are lost. God is merciful. Who denies it? But great as is his mercy, how many does he sent o hell every day? God is merciful: but he is also just; and therefore he is obliged to punish those who offend him. He shows mercy but to whom? To them who fear him. He hath strengthened His mercy toward them that fear Him. As a father hath compassion on his children, to hath the Lord compassion on them that fear Him.[576] But he executes justice on those who despises him, and abuses his mercy to insult him the more. God pardon sin; but he cannot pardon the will or the determination to sin. St Augustine says, that he who sins with the intention of afterward repenting, is not a penitent, but a mocker of God's majesty. But the Apostle tells us that God does not allow himself to be mocked. Be not deceived. God is not mocked.[577] It would be a mockery of God to insult him as often and as much as you please, and afterward to expect heaven.

But as God has shown me so many mercies hitherto, so I hope he will treat me with mercy hereafter. Behold the fourth delusion! Then, must the Lord because he has had compassion on you, show mercy forever, and never chastise you? No: the greater have been his mercies to you, the more you have reasons to fear that, if you offend him again, he will pardon you no more, but will take vengeance on your sins. Say not: I have sinned, and what harm hath befallen me? For the Most High is a patient rewarder. [578] Say not: I have sinned, and have not been punished; for though God endures, he will not to do so forever. When the number of mercies which he has resolved to show to the sinner is exhausted, he then punishes all his sins together. And the longer God has waited for his repentance, the more severe will be his punishment, says St Gregory.[579]

If then, O my brother, you see that you have often offended God, and that he has not sent you to hell, you should say: The merits of the Lord, that we are not consumed.[580] Lord! I thank Thee for not having sent me to hell as I deserved. Consider how many have been damned for fewer sins than you have committed, and labour to atone, by penance and other good works for the offences you have offered to God. The patience which he has had with you, and the great mercies which he has shown to you, and not to others, ought to animate you not to offend him again, but to serve and love him.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My crucified Jesus, my Redeemer and my God! Behold a traitor at Thy feet. I am ashamed to appear before Thee. How often have I mocked Thee! How often have I promised to offend Thee no more! But my promises have been so many treasons; for when the occasion of sin was presented to me I have forgotten Thee, and have again turned my back upon Thee. I thank Thee that I am not now in hell, but at Thy feet, where Thou enlightenest me and callest me to Thy love. Yes; I wish to love Thee, my Saviour and my God! And I wish never more to despise Thee. Thou hast borne with me lon g enough. I see that Thou canst bear with me no longer. Unhappy me, if after so many graces, I offend Thee again! Lord, I sincerely wish and resolve to change my life: I wish to love Thee as much as I have offended Thee. It consoles me to have to deal with Thee, who art infinite goodness: but I am sorry above all things for having so much despised Thee, and I promise Thee all my love for the future. Pardon me through the merits of Thy Passion; forget the injuries I have done Thee, and give me strength to be faithful to Thee during the remainder of my life. I love Thee, O my Sovereign Good! and I hope to love Thee forever. My dear God! I will never more abandon Thee. O Mary, Mother of God! Bind me to Jesus Christ and obtain for me the grace never again to depart from his feet. In Thee I trust.

THIRD POINT

I AM YOUNG—PERHAPS

But I am young. God compassionates youth. I will hereafter give myself to God. We are now at the fifth delusion. But do you not know that God counts, not the years, but the sins of each individual? You are young! But how many sins have you committed? There are many persons of very advanced age who have not been guilty of the tenth part of the sins which you have committed. And do you not know that God has fixed the number and measure of sins which he will pardon each? The Lord waiteth patiently, says Holy Scripture, that when the day of judgement shall come, He may punish them in the fullness of their sins.[581] That is, God has patience, and waits for a certain time; but when the measure of the sins which he has resolved to pardon is filled up, he pardons no more, but chastises the sinner of sending him a sudden death while in the state of damnation, or he abandons him in his sin—a chastisement worse than death. I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be wasted.[582] If you had encompassed a field with a hedge, and cultivated it many years, and found that after all your labour and expense it produced no fruit, what would you do with it? Would you not take away the hedge and abandon it? Tremble, lest God should treat you in a similar manner. If you continue to offend him, you will gradually lose remorse of conscience—you will cease to think of eternity, or of the salvation of your soul—you will lose all light and fear: behold the hedge taken away: behold your soul already abandoned by God.

Let us come to the last delusion. You say: It is true that if I commit this sin, I shall lose the grace of God, and shall be condemned to hell; it may be that in punishment of it I shall be damned; but it may also happen that I shall afterward make a good confession, and save my soul. Yes, it may, I admit, happen that you will be saved; for I am not a prophet, and therefore I cannot say for certain, that, if you commit this sin, God will show you no more mercy. But you cannot deny that, if, after the great graces God has bestowed upon you, you offend him again, you will expose yourself to very great danger of being lost forever. Attend to the language of Scripture. A hard heart shall fare evil at the last. [583] Evil-doers shall be cut off.[584] The wicked will in the end be cut off by divine justice. What things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap. [585] He that sows sins, will reap nothing but pains and torments. I called and you refused . . . I will laugh in your destruction, and will mock when that shall come to you which you feared.[586] I have called you, says the Lord, and you have mocked me; but I will mock you at the hour of death. Revenge is mine, and I will repay them in due time.[587] To me belongs the punishment due to sins: I will inflict it when the time of vengeance arrives. Such are the threats of the Scriptures against obstinate sinners; such is the chastisement which reason and justice demand. You say: It may happen, after all, that I shall be saved. I again admit that this may happen; but is it not the height of folly to trust the eternal salvation of your soul to a perhaps?—to a possibility of escaping hell when your salvation is so very improbable? Is eternal life an affair to be exposed to such imminent danger?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My dear Redeemer! Prostrate at Thy feet, I thank Thee for not having abandoned me after I had committed so many sins. How many who have offended Thee less than I have will never receive the light which Thou now givest me? I see that Thou earnestly desirest my salvation, and I wish to be saved, principally for the sake of pleasing Thee. I wish for heaven that there I may eternally sing the mercies which Thou hast shown me. I hope that Thou hast already pardoned me. But should I still be Thy enemy in consequence of not repenting as I ought of the offences I have offered to Thee. I am now sorry for them with my whole soul; they displeased me above all things. Pardon me for Thy mercy's sake, and increase continually my sorrow for having offended Thee who art so good a God. Give me sorrow—give me love. I love Thee above all things, but I love Thee too little. I wish to love Thee ardently. This love I ask and hope for from Thee. Hear me, O my Jesus! Thou hast promised to hear all who pray to Thee. O Mary, Mother of God, tell me that thou never allowest a soul that recommends itself to thee to go away disconsolate. I trust in thee; recommend me to thy Son, and obtain for me eternal life.

THE PARTICULAR JUDGEMENT

"We must all be manifested before the judgement seat of Christ."—2. Cor v.10.

FIRST POINT

THE GUILTY SOUL BEFORE ITS JUDGE

CONSIDER the appearance, the accusation, the examination, and the sentence. With regard to the appearance of the soul before its Judge, it is the common opinion of theologians, that the particular judgement takes place at the very moment of death; and that on the very spot where the soul is separated from the body, it is judged by Jesus Christ, who will not send, but will come himself to judge it according to its works. At what hour you think not the Son of man will come.[588] "He will," says St Augustine, "come in love to the good, in terror to the wicked."[589] Oh! How great will be the terror of the soul the first time it sees the Redeemer, and sees his countenance full of wrath! Who, says the prophet Nahum, shall stand before the face of His indignation?[590] This thought made Fr Louis Ponte tremble so as to shake the cell in which he lay. Hearing the Dies Iræ sung, and reflecting on the terror of the soul when it is presented before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, the venerable P. Juvenal Ancina took, and afterwa rd executed, the resolution of forsaking the world. The sight of the wrath of the Judge will announce the sentence. The wrath of the King is as messengers of death.[591]St Bernard says that the soul will suffer more in seeing the indignation of Jesus Christ than in hell itself.[592] When presented before an earthly judge, criminals have been known to perspire with a cold perspiration. Such was the confusion which Piso felt at the thought of appearing as a criminal before the senate, that he killed himself. How great is the pain of a child, or of a vassal, in appearing before an angry parent or an enraged sovereign! Oh, how much greater will be the pain and confusion of the soul when it beholds Jesus Christ enraged against it for the insults which it offered to him during life! They shall look upon me whom they have pierced.[593] The soul will see in wrath the Lamb that bore with it so patiently during life, and tat there is no hope of appeasing his anger. This shall make the soul call upon the mountains to fall upon it and to hide it from the fury of the wrathful Lamb.[594] Speaking of judgement, St Luke says: Then they shall see the Son of Man.[595] Oh! What pain will the sight of the judge in the form of man excite in the soul of the sinner! The sight of a Man-God who died for his salvation will upbraid him with his ingratitude. When the Saviour ascended into heaven, the angels said to the disciples: This Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven, shall to come as you have seen Him going into heaven.[596]

With the same wounds with which he ascended into heaven, Jesus Christ will come to judge the soul. "Great joy of the beholders," says the Abbot Rupert, "great terror of those who are in expectation."[597] The wounds of the Redeemer will console the just and terrify the wicked. When Joseph said to his brothers, I am Joseph, whom you sold, the Scripture tells us that, through fear, they were silent and unable to utter a word.[598] His brethren could not answer him, being struck with exceeding great fear. Now what answer will the sinner make to Jesus Christ? Will he dare to ask mercy when he must first render an account of his abuse of the mercy which he has received? "With what face," says Eusebius Emissenus, "will you, who are to be first judged for contempt of mercy, ask for mercy?"[599] What, then, will become of him? Where, says St Augustine, will he fly? He will behold an angry judge above; hell open below; on one side his own sins accusing him; on the other, the devils ready to inflict chastisement; and within, the remorse of his conscience. "Above shall be an enraged Judge; below, a frightful chaos; on the right, sins accusing him; on the left, the devils dragging him to punishment; within, a burning conscience: beset in this manner, whither will the sinner fly?[600]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

O my Jesus! I will always call Thee Jesus. Thy name consoles and encourages me because it reminds me that Thou art my Saviour, who didst die for my salvation. Behold me at Thy feet. I acknowledge that I have deserved hell as often as I have offended Thee by mortal sin. I am unworthy of pardon, but Thou hast died to merit pardon for me. Pardon me, then, immediately, O my Jesus, before Thou comest to judge me. I shall not then be able to ask pardon: I can now ask it from Thee, and I hope for it. Thy wounds will then fill me with terror, but now they give me confidence. My dear Redeemer! I am sorry above all things for having offended Thy infinite goodness. I purpose to submit toe very pain, every loss, rather than forfeit Thy grace. I love Thee with my whole heart. Have pity on me. "Have mercy on me, O God, according to Thy great mercy." O Mary, Mother of mercy, obtain for me a great sorrow for my sins, pardon and perseverance in thy divine love. I love thee, O my queen, and trust in thee.

SECOND POINT

NOTHING WILL REMAIN HIDDEN

Consider the accusation and scrutiny: The judgement sat and the books were opened.[601] There will be two books, the Gospel and conscience. In the Gospel will be read what the accused should have done, and in his conscience what he has done. "Each individual," says St Jerome, will see what he has done."[602] In the balance of divine justice, nor riches nor dignities, nor nobility, but works only, will have weight. Thou art weighted in the balance, said Daniel to Balthasar, and art found wanting.[603] "Neither his gold," says Fr Alvarez, "nor his wealth, but the king alone, is weighed."[604] The accusers will then come forward; and first of all the devil. "The devil," says St Augustine, "will be at hand, and will recite the words of your profession. He will charge us before our face with what we have done, he will state the day and the hour in which we have sinned."[605] He will recite the words of your profession—that is, he will bring forward the promises we have made and afterward violated: he will recount all our sins, pointing to the day and hour in which they were committed. According to St Cyprian, he will then say to the Judge, "I have suffered neither stripes nor scourges for these men."[606] I have suffered nothing for this ungrateful sinner; and, to become my slave, he has forsaken you, who have died for his salvation: he therefore belongs to me. Their angel guardians will also, as Origen says, accuse sinners; each of them will say: I have laboured so many years for the salvation of that man, but he has despised my admonitions. Thus "his very friends will then despise him."[607] The very walls within which he sinned shall bear witness against the sinner. The stone shall cry out of the wall.[608] His own conscience will accuse him. Their conscience, says St Paul, bearing witness to them . . . in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men.[609] Their very sins, says St Bernard, will speak and say, "You have made us; we are your works; we shall not desert you."—Lib. Med. cap. ii. Finally, according to St Chrysostom, the wounds of Jesus Christ will accuse the sinner:

"the nails shall complain of thee, the wounds and the cross of Christ shall speak against thee." The examination will now begin.

I, says the Lord, will search Jerusalem with lamps.[610] The lamp, says Mendozza, penetrates every corner of the house. In explaining the words with lamps, Cornelius a Lapide says, that God shall then place before the sinner the examples of the saints, all the lights and inspirations bestowed upon him during his life, and all the years that had been given him that he might do good. He hath called against me the time.[611] The sinner shall have to render an account of every glance of the eye. According to the prophet Malachi, the Lord shall purify the sons of Levi, and shall refine them as gold.[612] As gold is refined by removing the dross, so our good works confessions and communions will be subjected to a severe examination. When I shall take a time, I will judge justices.[613] In fine, St Peter tells that at judgement, the just will scarcely be saved. If the just shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?[614] If the sinner must answer for every idle word, what account will he have to give for consenting to so many bad thoughts, for uttering so many obscene words? Speaking of the authors of scandal, who have robbed him of so many souls, the Lord says: I will meet him as a bear that is robbed of her whelps.[615] With regard to works, the Judge will say: Give her of the fruit of her hands.[616] Reward him according to the works which he has performed.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Jesus, wert Thou now to reward me according to my works, hell would be my lot. O God! How often have I myself written the sentence of my condemnation to that place of torments! I thank Thee for the patience with which Thou hast borne me so long. O God! were I now obliged to appear before Thy judgement-seat, what account should I have to render of my past life! Enter not into judgement with Thy servant. Ah Lord, wait for me a little longer, do not judge me yet. Wert Thou now to judge me, what should become of me? Wait for me, since Thou hast treated me with so many mercies hitherto, grant me this new favour, infuse into my heart a great sorrow for my sins. I am sorry, O infinite Good, for having so often despised Thee. I love Thee above all things. Eternal Father! Pardon me for the love of Jesus Christ; and through his merits, grant me holy perseverance. My Jesus! I hope for all things from Thy blood. Most holy Mary, in thee I trust. "Turn, then, O most gracious advocate, thy eyes of mercy toward us." Behold my miseries and have pity on me.

THIRD POINT

THE SENTENCE

In fine, to obtain eternal life, the soul must be found, at judgement, to have led a life conformable to the life of Jesus Christ. Whom he foreknew, he predestined to be made conformable to the image of his Son.[617] It was this that made Job tremble. What shall I do when God shall rise to judge me and when he shall examine, what shall I answer him?[618] Philip II rebuking a domestic for having told him a lie, said to him: Is it thus you deceive me? The domestic went home, and died of grief. What will the sinner do? What answer will he make to Jesus Christ, his Judge? He will, like the man in the Gospel, who came to the feast without the nuptial garment, remain silent, because he will not know what to answer. His very sins will close the sinner's mouth. All iniquity shall stop her mouth.[619] St Basil says that the sinner will then suffer more from shame than from the very fire of hell.[620]

Finally, the Judge will pass sentence. Depart from Me ye cursed into everlasting fire.[621] Oh! What an awful thunder-clap will that sentence be to the sinner! "Oh! How frightfully," says Denis, the Carthusian, "will that thunder resound!"[622] "He," says St Anselm, "that does not tremble at such thunder, sleeps not, but is dead."[623] Eusebius writes, that the terror of sinners at hearing the sentence of their condemnation, will be so great, that, if they could, they would die again.[624] "The wicked shall be seized with such dismay at the sight of the Judge pronouncing sentence, that, were they not immortal, they should die a second time." There is then no more time for prayer, no more intercessors whom the sinners can invoke. "There," says St Thomas of Villanova, "there is no opportunity of praying; there no intercessor, no friend, no father, shall assist."[625] To whom will the sinner then have recourse? Is it to God, whom he ahs so much despised? "Who," says St Basil, "shall deliver you? Is it that God whom you have insulted?"[626] Perhaps he may have recourse to the saints, or to Mary? No: for then the stars—that is, his holy advocates—shall fall from heaven and the moon, which represents Mary, shall not give her light.[627] "Mary," says St Augustine, "will fly from the gate of heaven."[628]

"O God! With what indifference," exclaims St Thomas of Villanova. "do we listen to persons speaking on judgement! We appear to feel as little as if the sentence of condemnation could not fall upon ourselves, or as if we were not to be judged.[629] "And is it not," says the same saint, "great folly to entertain security in so perilous an affair."[630] My brother, St Augustine admonishes you not to say: Will God really send me to hell?[631] Say it not, says the holy Doctor; for even the Jews did not persuade themselves that they should be exterminated. So many of the damned did not believe that they would be cast into hell, but afterward the final vengeance came upon them. And end is come, the end is come. . . . Now I will accomplish My anger in thee, and will judge thee.[632] And thus, as St Augustine says, the same will also happen to you. "The day of judgement will come, and you shall find the threats of God verified."[633] At present it depends on us to choose whatever sentence we please. It is in our power, says St Eligius, to determine the character of the sentence which we shall receive. What then must we do? We must adjust our accounts before judgement. Before judgement prepare thee justice.[634] St Bonaventure says that, to escape the danger of failing in business, prudent merchants frequently review and settle their accounts. The Judge may be appeased before judgement, but not during judgement," says St Augustine.[635] Let us then say with St Bernard: "I desire to present myself before Thee already judged, and not to be judged."[636] O my Judge, I wish to be judged and punished during life, which is a time of mercy and pardon; for after death will be the time of justice.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

My God! If I do not appease Thee now, there will then be no more time for turning away from Thy anger. But how shall I, who have so often despised Thy friendship for miserable beastly pleasures, be able to appease Thy wrath? I have repaid with ingratitude Thy immense love. How can a creature ever make sufficient satisfaction for having offended the Creator? Ah, my Lord! I thank Thee, for giving me in Thy mercy a means of appeasing Thy anger and satisfying Thy justice. I offer Thee the blood and death of Jesus Christ, Thy Son and behold! I see a superabundant atonement and satisfaction made to Thee. To appease Thy anger, my repentance is also necessary. Yes, my God! I repent with my whole heart of all the injuries I have done Thee. Judge me now, O my Redeemer! I detest above all things all the offences I have offered to Thee. I love Thee with my whole heart and above all things, and I purpose to love Thee always, and to die rather than ever offend Thee again. Thou hast promised to pardon all who repent. Ah! Judge me now, and absolve me from my sins. I accept the punishment which I deserve, but reinstate me in Thy grace, and preserve me in it till death. Such is my hope. O Mary, my Mother! I thank thee for all the mercies which thou hast obtained for me. Ah! Continue to protect me to the end.

THE GENERAL JUDGEMENT

"The Lord shall be known when He executeth judgements."—Ps. ix. 17.

FIRST POINT

THE GENERAL RESURRECTION

AT present there is no one in this world more despised than Jesus Christ. There is more respect shown to a peasant than to the Lord; for we are afraid to insult a peasant, or provoke him to anger, lest he should seek revenge. But insults are offered to God, and are repeated as wantonly as if he could not avenge them whenever he pleases. The wicked, says Job, looked upon the Almighty as if He could do nothing.[637] Therefore the Redeemer has appointed a day of general judgement, and which is called in the Scripture, the day of the Lord; on which Jesus Christ will make known the greatness of his majesty. The Lord shall be known when He executeth judgments.[638] Hence that day is called, not a day of mercy and pardon, but a day of wrath, a day of tribulation and distress, a day of calamity and misery.[639] Yes, for then the Lord will come to repair the honour which sinners have sought to take from him on this earth. Let us examine how the judgement of this great day will take place.

The coming of the Judge will be preceded by fire. A fire shall go before Him.[640] Fire will descend from heaven, and shall burn the earth and all things upon the earth. The earth, and the works which are in it, shall be burnt up.[641] Thus palaces, churches, villas, cities, kingdoms, all must be reduced to one heap of ashes. This house, defiled by sins, must be purified by fire. Behold the end of all the riches, pomps, and pleasures of this earth. After the death of all men, the trumpet will sound, and all will rise again.[642] "As often," says St Jerome, "as I consider the day of judgement, I tremble; that trumpet appears always to sound in my ears, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgement.[643] At the sound of this trumpet, the souls of the just will descend to be untied to the bodies with which they served God in this life; and the unhappy souls of the damned will come up from hell to take possession of the accursed bodies with which they offended God.

Oh! How great will be the difference between the bodies of the just and the bodies of the damned! The just will appear whiter, more beautiful, and more resplendent than the sun. Then the just shall shine as the sun.[644] Happy he who knows how to mortify his flesh in his life by refusing it forbidden pleasures; and who, to keep it under greater check, imitates the saints, by denying it even lawful gratifications, and by treating it with severity and contempt. Oh! How great will then be the happiness of those who will have practiced mortification of the flesh! We may estimate it from the words which St Peter of Alcantara addressed after death to St Teresa: "O happy penance, which merited for me so great glory."[645] But, on the other hand, the bodies of the reprobate will appear black and hideous, and will send forth an intolerable stench. Oh! How great the pain of the damned in taking possession of their bodies! Accursed body, the soul will say, to indulge you, I have brought myself to perdition. And the body will say: Accursed soul! Why have you, who had the use of reason, allowed me the pleasures which have merited for you and me the eternal torments of hell?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Jesus and my Redeemer, who will be one day my judge, pardon me before that day arrives. Turn not away Thy face from me.[646] Thou art now a Father to me: and, like a father, receive into Thy friendship a son who casts himself with sorrow at Thy feet. My Father, I ask pardon. I have offended Thee: I have unjustly forsaken Thee. Thou didst not deserve such treatment from me. I repent of it: I am sorry for it with my whole heart. Turn not away thy face from me; do not cast me off as I deserved. Remember the blood which Thou hast shed for me, and have pity on me. My Jesus, I wish for no other judge than Thee. "I willingly," says St Thomas of Villanova, "submit to the judgement of him who died for me, and who, that he might not condemn me has condemned himself to the cross." St Paul has said the same. Who is he that shall condemn? Christ Jesus that died.[647] My Father, I love Thee and for the future, I will never more depart from Thy feet. Forget the injuries I have done Thee, and give me a great love for Thy goodness. I desire to love thee more than I have offended Thee; but if Thou dost not assist me, I shall not be able to love Thee. Assist me, O my Jesus! Make me always grateful to Thy love, that on the day of judgement, I may be found in the valley of Josaphat, among the number of Thy lovers. O Mary, my Queen and my advocate! Assist me now, for if I am lost, thou wilt not be able to help me on that day. Thou prayest for all; pray also for one who glories in being thy devoted servant, and who places so much confidence in thee.

SECOND POINT

THE VALLEY OF JOSAPHAT

After their resurrection, all men will be told by the angels to go to the valley of Josaphat, that there they may be judged, Nations, nations, in the valley of destruction; for the day of the Lord is near.[648] When the whole human race will be assembled, the angels will come and separate the reprobate from the elect. The angels shall go out, and shall separate the wicked from among the just.[649] The just will stand on the right, and the wicked will be driven to the left. How great would be the pain that you would feel at being driven away from a party of pleasure, or at being expelled from the church! But how much greater will be the pain of those who are banished from the society of the saints! "What think you," says the author of the Imperfect Work, "must be the confusion of the wicked, when, after being separated from the just, they will be abandoned?"[650] This confusion alone would, according to St Chrysostom, be sufficient to constitute a hell for the reprobate. The son will be separated from the father, the husband from the wife, and the master from the servant. One shall be taken and one shall be left.[651] Tell me, my brother, what place do you think will fall to you? Would you wish to be found at the right hand? If you do, abandon the life which leads to the left.

In the life the princes of the earth and the worldly rich are deemed fortunate, but the saints, who live in poverty and humiliations, are despised. O faithful souls who love God, be not troubled at seeing yourselves in contempt and tribulations on this earth: Your sorrow shall be turned into joy.[652] On the day of judgement you will be called truly fortunate, and will have the honour of being declared as belonging to the court of Jesus Christ. Oh! How beautiful will then be the appearance of St Peter of Alcantara, who was despised as an apostate! of St John of God, who was treated as a fool! of St Peter Celestine, who, after having renounced the papal throne, died in prison! Oh! How great will then be the honours of so many martyrs who have been torn to pieces by their executioners! Then shall every man have praise from God.[653] But on the other hand, how horrible will be the appearance of Herod, of Pilate, of Nero, and so many other great men of this earth, who are now damned! O lovers of the world, in the valley, in the valley I expect you. There, without doubt you will change your sentiments, there you will weep over your folly. Miserable beings, who for the sake of making a figure for a short time on the theatre of this world, will afterward have to act the part of reprobate in the tragedy of judgement. The elect will then be placed on the right; according to the apostle, they will, for their greater glory, be raised in the air above the clouds, and will go with the angels to meet Jesus Christ descending from heaven. We shall be taken up together with them to meet Christ into the air.[654] But the damned, like so many goats destined for the slaughter, will be compelled to remain at the left, waiting for the Judge, who will publicly pronounce sentence of condemnation against all his enemies.

But behold the heavens are already opened; the angels come to assist at the Judgement, carrying the symbols of the Passion of Jesus Christ. "When," says St Thomas, "the Lord comes to judge, the sign of the cross and the other emblems of his passion shall be exhibited."[655] The cross especially will appear. And then, says the Redeemer, shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn.[656] Oh! Says Cornelius à Lapide, how great, at the sight of the cross, will be the wailing of sinners who, during life, disregarded their own salvation, which the Son of God purchases at so dear a price! Then, says St Chrysostom, "shall the nails complain of thee; the wounds, the cross of Christ shall speak against thee."[657] The holy apostles and all their imitators will act as successors at the general judgement, and shall, together with Jesus Christ, judge the nations. The just shall shine . . . They shall judge nations.[658] Mary, the Queen of angels and saints, will also come to assist at the judgement. Lastly, the eternal Judge will come seated on a throne of majesty and light. And they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with much power and majesty.[659] At their presence, says the prophet Joel, the people shall be in grievous pains.[660] The sight of Jesus Christ will console the elect; but in the reprobate it will excite more pain than hell itself. "It would," says St Jerome, "be easies to bear the pains of hell than the presence of the Lord."[661] St Teresa used to say: "My Jesus, afflict me with every pain, but do not allow me to Thy countenance enraged against me on that day." And St Basil says, "This confusion surpasses all torture."[662] Then will be verified the prediction of St John, that the damned will call upon the mountains to fall upon them, and to hide them from the sight of an angry judge. And they shall say to the mountains and rocks: Fall upon us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.[663]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O my Redeemer! O Lamb of God who hast come into the world, not to punish, but to pardon sins; ah! pardon me immediately: pardon me before the arrival of that day on which Thou wilt judge me. Then the sight of Thee O divine Lamb! who hast borne with me so long and with so much patience, should, if I were lost, be the hell of hells. Ah! I say again, pardon me soon: draw me by Thy merciful hand from the abyss into which my sins have cast me. I repent, O sovereign Good! of having offended Thee, and of having offended Thee so grievously. I love Thee, my judge, who hast loved me so tenderly. Ah! Through the merits of Thy death, grant me a great grace, which will transform me from a sinner into a saint. Thou hast promised to hear all who pray to Thee. Cry to me and I will hear thee.[664] I do not ask earthly goods: I ask Thy grace, Thy love and nothing else. Hear me, O my Jesus! through the love which Thou didst bear to me when Thou didst die on the cross for my salvation. My beloved Jesus, I am a criminal, but a criminal who loves Thee more than he does himself. Have pity on me. Mary, my Mother, come to my aid, and come immediately; now is the time that thou canst assist me. Thou didst not abandon me when I lived in forgetfulness of thee and of God; come to my relief now that I am resolved to serve thee always, and never more to offend my Lord. O Mary, after Jesus, thou art my hope.

THIRD POINT

THE ETERNAL SENTENCE

But, behold! The judgement already begins. The books, which shall be the consciences of each individual, are opened. The judgement sat, and the books were opened.[665] The witnesses against the reprobate will be—first, the devils, who according to St Augustine, will say: "Most just God, declare him to be mine who has unwilling to be yours."[666] Secondly, they will be their own consciences: Their own conscience bearing witness to them.[667] The very walls of the house in which they have offended God will bear testimony, and will cry for vengeance against them. The stone shall cry out of the wall.[668] Finally the Judge himself, who has been present at all the insults offered to him, will give evidence against the sinner. I am the Judge and the witness, saith the Lord.[669] St Paul says, that then the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness.[670] He will make known to all men the most secret and shameful sins of the reprobate, which they concealed even in the tribunal of confession. I will discover thy shame to thy face.[671] The Master of the Sentences, along with other authors, is of opinion that the sins of the elects will not be manifested; but will, according to the words of David, be covered: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiver, and whose sins are covered .[672] But St Basil teaches that with a single glance all will see, as in a picture, the sins of the damned. If, says St Thomas (De Hum. Chr. a.25), in the garden of Gethsemane, at the words of Christ, "I am He," the soldiers who came to take him prisoner fell prostrate on the ground, what will be the condition of the damn when, sitting in judgement, he will say to them: Behold, I am He whom you have so much despised.?

But now comes the sentence. Jesus Christ will first turn to the elect, and address them in these consoling words: Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.[673] So great was the consolation which St Francis of Assisi felt when he learned by revelation that he was predestined, that he could not contain himself. How great will be the joy of the elect in hearing the Judge say to him: Come, blessed children, come to a kingdom; for you there are no more pains, no more fears, you are and shall be saved forever. I bless the blood which I have shed for you, and I bless the tears which you have shed for your sins. Let us ascend into Paradise, where we shall remain together for all eternity! The most holy Mary will also bless her servants, and will invite them with her to heaven. And thus, singing Allelujas, the elect will enter heaven in triumph, to possess, to praise, and to love God forever.

But on the other hand, the reprobate, turning to Jesus Christ, will say to him: What will become of us? Since, the Judge will say, you have renounced and despised my grace, depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire.[674] Depart; begone from Me; I wish neither to see nor to hear you ever more. You cursed, go and since you have despised my blessing, go accursed. And where, O Lord, will they go? Into fire, into hell, to burn both in soul and in body. And for how many years, or for how many ages? Into everlasting fire; for all eternity; as long as God shall be God. After this sentence, says St Ephrem, the reprobate will take leave of the angels, of the saints, of relatives, and of the divine Mother. "Farewell, ye just! Farewell, O cross! Farewell, O paradise! Farewell, fathers and children, for we shall never see any of you again! Farewell, O Mary, Mother of God!"[675] Then, in the middle of that valley, a put will be opened, into which the devils and the damned will fall. O God! They will see those gates closed, never to be opened, never, never for all eternity. O accursed sin, to what a melancholy end will you one day lead so many poor souls! O unhappy souls, to whom this unhappy end is reserved!

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Saviour and my God! What sentence shall I receive on that day? If, O my Jesus! Thou now demandest an account of my life, what could I say to Thee but that I deserve a thousand hells? Yes, it is true. O my divine Redeemer! I deserve a thousand hells; but remember that I love Thee and that I love Thee more than myself, and for the insults I have committed against Thee, I feel so great a sorrow that I would be content to have suffered every evil rather than have offended Thee. Thou O my Jesus! condemnest obstinate sinners, but not those who repent and wish to love Thee. Behold me penitent at Thy feet; make me feel that Thou pardonest me. But this Thou hast declared by the mouth of Thy prophet. "Turn ye to me, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will turn to you."—Zac. i. 3. I give up all things; I renounce all the pleasures and goods of this world; I turn to Thee, and embrace Thee, O my beloved Redeemer! Ah! Receive me into Thy heart, and there inflame me with Thy holy love; but inflame me in such a manner, that I shall never again think of separating from Thee. O my Jesus! save me, and let my salvation consist in loving Thee always, and in singing Thy mercies forever. The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever. [676] Mary, my hope, my refuge, and my Mother, assist me and obtain for me holy perseverance. No one has been lost who has had recourse to thee. To thee I recommend myself: have pity on me.

THE PAINS OF HELL

"And these shall go into everlasting punishment."—Matt. xxv. 46.

FIRST POINT

THE PAIN OF SENSE

IN committing sin, the sinner does two evils. He abandons God, the Sovereign Good, and turns to creatures. For My people have done two evils. They have forsaken Me, the fountain of living water, and have digged to themselves cisterns—broken cisterns—that can hold no water.[677] Since then, by turning to creatures the sinner offends God, he will be justly tortured in hell by the same creatures by fire, and by devils: in this punishment consists the pain of sense. But because his greatest guilt and the malice of his sin consists in turning his back on God, his principal torments, his hell, will be the pain of loss, or that pain arising from having lost God.

Let us first consider the pain of sense. It is of faith that there is a hell. In the middle of the earth there is a prison reserved for the chastisement of rebels against God. What is this hell? It is what the glutton who was damned called a place of torments.[678] A place of torments, where all the senses and powers of the damned will have their proper torment and where, the more a person has offended God by any sense, the more he will be tortured in that sense. By what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented.[679] As much as she hath gloried herself and lived in delicacies, so much torments and sorrow give ye to her.—Apoc. xviii.7. The sight will be tormented with darkness. A land, says Job, that is dark, and covered with the mist of death.[680] How pitiable the condition of a man who is shut up in a dark cave for forty or fifty years, or during his whole life! Hell is a dungeon closed up on every side, into which a ray of the sun, or of any other light, shall never enter. He shall never see the light.[681] The fire of this world sends forth light; but the fire of hell is utterly dark. The voice of the Lord divided the fire.[682] In explaining these words, St Basil says, that the Lord will separate the light from the fire, so that this fire will burn, but will not illuminate. Albertus Magnus expounds them more briefly, and says that God "will divide the flame from the heat."[683] The very smoke that issues from that fire shall form a storm of darkness which, according to St Jude, will blind the damned. To whom the storm of darkness is reserved forever. [684] St Thomas teaches that the damned have only the light which serves to increase their torments. In that glimmering light they will see the deformity of their associates, and of the devils, who will assume horrible forms in order to increase the terrors of the damned.

The sense of smell will also be tormented. How painful to be confined in a close room along with a putrid corpse! Out of their carcasses, says the Prophet Isaias, shall rise a stink.[685] The damned must remain the midst of so many millions of the reprobate, who, though forever alive to pain, are called carcasses on account of the stench which they send forth. St Bonaventure says, that if the body of one of the damned were placed on this earth, it would, by its stench, be sufficient to cause the death of all men. Miserable fools! The greater the number of the damned in hell, the more insufferable will be their torments. "There," says St Thomas, "the society of the reprobate will cause, not a diminution, but an increase of misery."[686] Their sufferings are more intolerable on account of the stench, on account of the shrieks of the damned, and on account of the narrowness of the place. In hell, they will be one over the other, like sheep gathered together in the winter. They are, said David, laid in hell like sheep.[687] They will be even like grapes pressed under the wine-press of God's wrath. And he treadeth the wine-press of the fiercenes s of the wrath of God the Almighty.[688] From this will arise the pain of immobility. Let them become immovable as a stone.[689] Thus, in whatsoever position the damned will fall into hell after the last day, in that they must remain, without ever changing their posture, and without ever being able to move hand or foot, as long as God will be God.

The sense of hearing will be tormented by the unceasing howling and wailing of those miserable beings, who are sunk in an abyss of despair. The devils will torment the damned by continual noises. The sound of dread is always in his ears.[690] How painful to a person longing for sleep to hear the groans of a sick man, the barking of a dog, or the screams of an infant! But, oh! How miserable the condition of the damned, who must listen incessantly for all eternity to the clamour and cries of the companions of their torments! The damned will be tormented by a ravenous hunger. They shall suffer hunger like dogs.[691] But they never will have a morsel of bread. Their thirst will be so great that all the waters of the ocean will not be able to quench it; but they will never be allowed a single drop. The rich glutton asked for a drop of water; but he has not as yet had it, and he never, never will have it.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS.

Ah, my Lord! Behold at Thy feet one who has so much despised Thy grace and Thy chastisement! Miserable should I be, O my Jesus! if Thou hadst not taken pity on me. How many years should I be in that fetid furnace, in which so many of my companions are now burning! Ah, my Redeemer! Why does not this thought make me burn with Thy love? How can I ever again think of offending Thee? Ah, my Jesus! may I never more displease Thee. Strike me dead a thousand times rather than permit me ever again to insult Thee. Since Thou hast begun, complete the work. Thou hast taken me out of the abyss of so many sins, and hast so lovingly called me to love Thee. Ah! Grant that I may spend for Thee all the time which Thou now givest me. How ardently should the damned desire a day or an hour of the time granted to me! And shall I continue to spend it in offending Thee? No, my Jesus! through the merits of that blood, which has hitherto delivered me from hell, do not permit it. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! and because I love Thee I am sorry for having offended Thee. I wish never more to offend Thee, but to love Thee forever. Mary, my Queen and my Mother, pray to Jesus for me, and obtain for me the gift of perseverance and of his holy love.

SECOND POINT

THE FIRE OF HELL

The pain which most severely torments the senses of the damned arises from the fire of hell, which tortures the sense of touch. The vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms.[692] Hence, in passing sentence, the Lord makes special mention of it. Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire.[693] Even in this life, the pain of fire is the greatest of all torments; but according to St Augustine, our fire, compared with the fire of hell, is but painted fire.[694] St Vincent Ferrer says, that in comparison with the fire of hell our fire is cold. The reason is, that the fire of this earth has been created for our use; but God has made the fire of hell purposely to torment the damned. As Tertullian remarks: "Fire which is made for the use of man in this world, is very different from that which is used for the justice of God."[695] A fire is kindled in my rage.[696] Hence, the Prophet Isaias calls the fire of hell the spirit of heat. If the Lord shall wash away the filth of the daughters of Sion . . . by the spirit of burning.[697] The damned will be sent, not to the fire, but into the fire. "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire." Thus, like a piece of wood in the furnace, they will be surrounded by fire. They will have an abyss of fire below, an abyss of the fire above, and an abyss of fire on every side. If they touch, or see, or breathe, they touch and see, and breathe nothing but fire. They will live in fire, like a fish in water. But this fire will not only surround the damned, but will also enter into their very bowels to torment them. Their bodies will become all fire. Thus, this fire will burn the bowels, the heart, the brain, the blood within the veins, and even the marrow within the bones. Each of the damned will be in himself a furnace of fire. Thou shall make them as a furnace of fire.[698]

Some cannot bear to walk under a strong sun, or to remain in a close room before a large fire; they cannot endure a spark that flies from a candle; and still they fear not the devouring flames of hell. Which of you, says the Prophet Isaias, can dwell with devouring fire?[699] As a wild beast devours a lamb, so the fire of hell devours the damned; but it devours them without ever causing death. "Fools," says St Peter Damian, addressing the unchaste, "continue, continue to indulge your flesh; a day will come when your impurities, like pitch, will nourish and increase within your bowels the flame which will torment you in hell."[700] St Jerome says that this fire will bring with it all the pains and torments to which men are subject on this earth—pains in the sides, in the head, in the bowels, in the nerves. In this fire the damned will suffer even the pain of cold.[701] Let him, says Job, pass from the snow waters to excessive heat.[702] But we must always keep in mind, that all the torments of this earth are, as St Chrysostom says, but the shadow of the pains of hell.

The powers of the soul will also have their proper torment. The damned will be tormented in the memory by the remembrance of the time which was given to them in this life, that they might save their souls, and which they spent in procuring their own damnation; by the remembrance of the graces which they have received from God, and of which they have lost in losing heaven and God, and that this loss is forever irreparable. In the will, by seeing that they will be refused whatsoever they ask. The desire of the wicked shall perish[703]. The miserable being will never have anything which they desire, and will be forever afflicted with the eternal torments which they abhor. They would wish to be rid of these torments, and to enjoy peace; but in these torments they will forever remain, and peace they will never find.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Jesus! Thy blood and Thy death are my hope. Thou hast died to deliver me from eternal death. Ah, Lord! Who hast partaken more of Thy merits than I, who have so often deserved hell? Ah! Do not allow me to live any longer ungrateful to the great graces Thou hast bestowed upon me. Thou hast delivered me from the fire of hell, because Thou wishest me to burn, not in that tormenting fire, but with the sweet flames of Thy love. Assist me, then, that I may satisfy thy desire. Were I now in hell, I could never more love Thee. But since I am able to love Thee, I wish to love Thee. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! I love Thee, O my Redeemer who hast loved me so tenderly. How have I been able to live so long in forgetfulness of Thee? I thank Thee for not having been forgetful of me. Hadst Thou forgotten me, I should now either be in hell or without sorrow for my sins. This sorrow which I feel in my heart for having offended Thee, and my desire to love Thee ardently, are gifts of Thy grace, which still assist me. I thank Thee for them, O my Jesus! I hope for the future to give Thee the remainder of my life. I wish to think only of serving and pleasing Thee. Remind me always of the hell I have deserved and of the graces Thou hast bestowed upon me, and do not permit me ever again to turn my back upon Thee, and to condemn myself to that pit of torments. O Mother of God! Pray for me a sinner. Thy intercession has delivered me from hell. Deliver me also, O my Mother, by thy prayers, from sin, which alone can again condemn me to hell.

THIRD POINT

THE PAIN OF LOSS

But all these torments are nothing, compared with the pain of loss. Hell does not consist in the darkness, stench, shrieks, and fire; the pain which constitutes hell is, the pain of having lost God. "Let torments," says St Bruno, "be added to torments, and let them not be deprived of God."[704] And St John Chrysostom says that a thousand hells are not equal to this pain.[705] According to St Augustine, if the damned enjoyed the vision of God, "they should feel no pain, and hell should converted into a paradise."[706] To conceive some notion of this pain, consider that, should a person lose a jewel worth a hundred crowns, the loss would occasion great pain, but were the jewel worth two hundred crowns, his pain is doubled; and if it were worth four hundred crowns, the pain is still greater. In a word, the pain which he suffers increase in proportion to the value of which he has lost. What have the damned lost? They have lost God, who is an infinite good. Hence St Thomas says that the pain of the damned is, in a certain manner, infinite.[707]

This pain is dread only by the saints. St Ignatius of Loyola used to say: Lord, I am willing to bear every pain, but not the pain of being deprived of Thee. But, because they live in the midst of darkness, sinners who are content to live for months and years without God do not understand this pain. However, they will know at death the great good which they lose. At its departure from this world, the soul, as St Antonine says, instantly sees that it has been created for God.[708] Hence it will suddenly rush forward to embrace its Sovereign Good: but, if it be in sin, God will cast it off. If a dog sees a hare, what efforts does he not make to break his chains and seize his prey. At its separation from the body, the soul is naturally drawn to God, but sin drags it away and sends it to hell, at a distance from him. Your iniquities, says the Prophet Isaias, have divided between you and your God.[709] The entire, then, of the hell of the damned consists in that first word of the sentence of their condemnation—Depart from Me, you cursed. Go, Jesus Christ shall say: I do not wish you ever again to see my face. When Absalom heard that David condemned him never more to appear before him, he said: Tell my father either to permit me to see his face, or to put me to death—2 Kings, xiv. 24. To one of his grandees, whom he saw guilty of irreverence in the church, Philip II said: "Do not dare ever again to appear in my presence." So great was the pain which the nobleman felt, that, after having returned home, he died of grief. What will be the anguish of the reprobate at the hour of death, when God will say to him: Begone, I will never see you again! I will hide my face from thee; . . . all evils and afflictions shall find him.[710] On the day of judgement Jesus Christ will say to the reprobate: You are no longer mine; I am no longer yours. Call his name not, my people; for you are not my people, and I will not be yours.[711]

With what pain does a son at the death of a father, or a wife at the death of a husband say: My father, my wife, I shall never see you again! Ah! if we now heard the wailing of one of the damned, and asked him why he weeps so bitterly, his answer would be: I weep because I have lost God, and shall never see him more. Perhaps the miserable man can love God in hell, and can resign himself to his will? No, if he could do this, hell would not be hell. The unhappy being can never resign himself to the divine will? Neither can he love his God; he hates and will hate him forever, and his hell will consist in the conviction that God is an infinite good, and that he is compelled to hate him, while he sees that he is worthy of infinite love. When St Catherine asked a devil who he was, he said: "I am that wicked wretch that is deprived of the love God."[712] The damned will hate and curse God; and in cursing God, they will also curse the benefits he has conferred upon them; they will curse the benefits of creation, of redemption, of the sacraments, particularly the sacraments of baptism and penance, and above all, the most holy sacrament of the altar. They will hate all the angels and saints, and especially their angel-guardians and their holy advocates, and above all the divine Mother. But they will principally hate the Three Divine Persons, and among them they will hate in a special manner the Son of God, who once died for their salvation; they will curse his wounds, his bloods, his pains and his death.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my God! Thou then art my supreme and infinite Good; and I have so often voluntarily lost Thee! I knew that in committing sin I gave Thee great displeasure, and that I lost Thy grace; and with this knowledge, I have consented to sin! Ah! If I did not see Thee, O Son of God, nailed to the cross in order to die for me, I should not have courage to ask or hope for pardon from Thee. Eternal Father! Look not on me, but behold Thy beloved Son, who asks mercy for me; hear him, and pardon me. I ought at this moment to be in hell, without any hope of being ever more able to love Thee, or to recover Thy lost grace. My God! I am sorry above all things for the injury I have done Thee in renouncing Thy friendship, and despising Thy love for the miserable pleasures of this world. Oh! That I had died a thousand times, rather than have offered Thee so great an insult! How could I have been so blind and foolish! I thank Thee, O my Lord! for giving me time to repair the evil I have done. Since through Thy mercy, I am not in hell, and can love Thee, O my God! I wish to love Thee. I will wait no longer to convert myself entirely to Thee. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! I love Thee, my life, my treasure, my love, my all. Remind me always, O Lord! of the love which Thou hast borne to me, and of the hell which I have deserved, that this thought may continually excite me to make acts of love, and to say always, I love Thee, I love thee, I love Thee, O Mary, my Queen, my hope and my Mother, if I were in hell, I could never more love thee. I love thee, o my Mother, and in thee, after Jesus, I trust that I shall never again cease to love my God and thee. Assist me; pray to Jesus for me.

THE ETERNITY OF HELL

"And these shall go into everlasting punishment."—Matt. xxv. 46.

FIRST POINT

HELL IS ETERNAL

WERE hell not eternal, it would not be hell. Torments which continue but a short time, are not a severe punishment. The man who is afflicted with an abscess or cancer submits to the knife or the cautery. The pain is very sharp; but, because it is soon over, the torture is not very great. But, should the incision or cauterisation last for a week, or for an entire month, how frightful should be his agony! A slight pain in the eye, or in the teeth, when it lasts for a long time, becomes insupportable. Even a comedy, a musical entertainment, would it continue for an entire day, produces intolerable tediousness. And would it last for a month, or for a year, who could bear it? What then must hell be, where the damned are compelled, not to listen to the same comedy or the same music, nor to submit merely to pains in the eyes, or in the teeth, or to the torture of the knife, or of the red-hot iron but to suffer all pains and all torments? And for how long? For all eternity. They shall be tortured forever and ever.[713]

This belief in eternity is an article of faith; it is not an opinion, but a truth attested by God in so many places in Holy Scriptures. Depart from Me, you accursed, into everlasting fire. And these shall go into everlasting punishment.[714] Who shall suffer eternal punishment in destruction.[715] Everyone shall be salted with fire.[716] As salt prevents putrefaction, so the fire of hell, while it tortures the damned, performs the office of salt by preserving their life.

Now, how great would be the folly of the man who, for the sake of a day's amusement, would voluntarily condemn himself to be shut up in a dungeon for twenty or thirty years! If hell lasted but a hundred, or even but two or three years, it would be the extreme of folly in a Christian to condemn himself to fire for two or three years for the vile pleasure of a moment. But there is not the question of thirty, of a hundred, or of a hundred thousand years; but there is question of eternity; there is question of suffering forever the same torments—torments which will never end, and will never be mitigated in the slightest degree. The saints then had reason, as long as they were on this earth, and in danger of being lost, to weep and tremble. Blessed Isaias, even while he lived in the desert in fasting and penitential rigours wept and said: Ah! unhappy me, who am not as yet free from the danger of losing my soul.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my God! If Thou hadst sent me to hell, as I have often deserved, and hadst afterward drawn me from it, how deeply should I feel my obligations to Thee! What a holy life would I have begun! And now that Thou hast shown me greater mercy by preserving me from falling into that place of woe, what shall I do? Shall I again offend Thee and provoke Thy wrath, that Thou mayest sent me to burn in that prison of rebels against Thy majesty, where so many are buried in fire for fewer sins that I have committed? Ah, my Redeemer! I have hitherto done so; and instead of availing myself to the time which Thou gavest me to weep over my sins, I have spent it in provoking Thee still more. I thank Thy infinite goodness for having borne with me so long. If Thy goodness were not infinite, how couldst Thou have borne with me? I thank Thee for having waited for me till now with so much patience. I thank Thee in a most special manner for the light which Thou now givest me, by which Thou makest me see my folly, and the injury I have done Thee in insulting Thee so often by my sins. My Jesus! I detest them, and am sorry for them with my whole heart. Through the merits of Thy Passion, pardon me and assist me with Thy grace that I may never more offend Thee. I now have just reason to fear that, if I commit another moral sin, Thou wilt abandon me. My Lord! I entreat Thee to place this just fear before my eyes whenever the devil will tempt me to offend Thee again. My God! I love Thee; I do not wish ever more to lose Thee, assist me by Thy grace. O most holy Virgin! do thou also assist me. Obtain for me the grace always to have recourse to thee in my temptation, that I may never again lose my God. Mary, after Jesus, thou art my hope.

SECOND POINT

THE WEIGHT OF ETERNITY

He that enters hell will not depart from it for all eternity. This thought made David tremble and say: Let not the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.[717] As soon as the damned fell into that pit of torments, its mouth is closed, never to be opened. In hell there is a gate for admission, but none for egress. "There will be a descent," says Eusebius, "but there will be no ascent."[718] In explaining the words of the Psalmist, this author says, and let not the pit shut her mouth; because when it shall have received them, it will be closed above and opened downward![719] As long as the sinner remains on this earth, he may hope to reverse the sentence of his damnation; but as soon as death overtakes him in sin, all his hopes are at end forever. When the wicked man is dead, there shall be no hope any more.[720] Perhaps the damned may flatter themselves with a false hope, and thus find some relief in their despair. The man who is mortally wounded, confined to his bed, and given over by his physicians, may console himself with the hope of finding a physician or a remedy to heal his wounds. The man who is condemned to the galleys for life may also find comfort in the expectation of being one day delivered from his chains. And may not the damned at least say: Who knows but I shall one day escape from this prison? And thus delude himself with this false hope. No: in hell there is no hope, whether true or false; there is no perhaps. I will set before thy face.[721] The unhappy damned will always see the sentence of their reprobation written before their eyes. In it they will read, that they will weep forever in that pit of torments. And many shall awake: some unto life everlasting, and others unto reproach, to see it always.[722] Hence the damned not only suffer the torments of each moment, but in each moment they endure the pain of eternity, saying: What I now suffer, I must suffer forever. "They bear," says Tertullian, "the weigh t of eternity."[723]

Let us then pray to the Lord in the words of St Augustine: "Here burn, here cut, here spare not, that you may spare for eternity."[724] The chastisements of this life pass away. Thy arrows pass; but the pains of the next life last forever, the voice of Thy thunder in a wheel.[725] Let us dread these punishments. Let us dread that thunder of eternal damnation which will issue from the mouth of the Judge in passing sentence against the wicked. "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire." The Psalmist says: "The voice of thy thunder in a wheel." A wheel is a figure of eternity, which has no end. I have drawn my sword out of its sheath, not to be turned back.[726] The punishment of hell will be great; but what ought to terrify us more us, that it will be irrevocable.

But the unbeliever will say: Can it be just to punish a sin which lasts but a moment, with eternal torments? But how, I ask, can a sinner, for a momentary pleasure, dare to insult a God of infinite majesty? St Thomas says that, even in human judgements, the punishment of crime is measured, not from its duration, but from its malice.[727] Hell is but a small punishment for mortal sin; an offence against infinite majesty deserves infinite chastisement. "In every mortal sin," says St Bernardine of Sienna, "an infinite insult is offered to God; but an infinite injury merits infinite punishment."[728] But, because, says St Thomas, a creature is not capable of suffering pain infinite in point of intensity, God inflicts punishment infinite in extension or duration.[729]

Besides, since the damned are incapable of making satisfaction for their sins, their punishment should be necessarily eternal. In this life penitent sinners can atone for their iniquities only in as much as the merits of Jesus Christ are applied to them. But, from the application of these merits the reprobate are excluded. Hence, since they cannot appease the anger of God, and since their sin is eternal, their punishment also must be eternal. He shall not give to God his ransom . . . and he shall labour forever.[730] Hence Belluacensis says: "There sin can be forever punished, and can never be expiated;"[731] for, according to St Augustine, "there the sinner cannot repent."[732] Therefore the wrath of the Lord shall be always provoked against him. The people with whom the Lord is angry forever.[733] Moreover, the damned, though God should wish to pardon them, are unwilling to be pardoned; for their will is obstinate and confirmed in hatred against God. And St Jerome says that the reprobates "are insatiable in the desire of sinning."[734] Hence, because the damned refuse to be healed, their wounds are incurable. Why is my wound desperate, so as to refuse to be healed.[735]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Then, my Redeemer! If at this hour I were damned, as I have deserved, I should be obstinate in hatred against Thee, my God! who hast died for me. O God! What a hell should it be to hate Thee, who hast loved me so tenderly, who art infinite beauty, infinite goodness, and worthy of infinite love! Then if I were now in hell, I should be in such an unhappy state, that I would not even wish for the pardon which Thou now offerest to me. My Jesus, I thank Thee for the mercy Thou hast shown me; and since I now can obtain pardon, I wish to love Thee. Thou offerest me pardon, and I ask it from Thee, and hope for it through thy merits. I am sorry for all the offences I have committed against Thee. O infinite Goodness! Pardon me, then. I love Thee with my whole soul. Ah, Lord! What evil hast Thou done me that I should have to hate Thee forever as my enemy? And what friend have I ever had who has done and suffered so much for me as Thou, O my Jesus! hast done and suffered for me? Ah, do not permit me ever more to fall into enmity with Thee, and to lose Thy love. Take me out of life, sooner than permit this sovereign evil to befall me. O Mary! Take me under thy protection and do not permit me ever more to rebel against God and against thee.

THIRD POINT

ETERNITY IS UNCHANGEABLE

In this life death is greatly feared by sinners; but in hell it will be most ardently desired. Men shall seek death, and shall not find it; and they shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them.[736] Hence St Jerome has written: "O death, how sweet should you be to those to whom you have been so full of bitterness."[737] David says, that death will feast on the damned. Death shall feed upon them.[738] In explaining this passage, St Bernardine observes that as, in feeding, sheep eat the blades of grass, and leave the roots untouched; so death feeds on the damned; it kills them every moment, but leaves them life in order to continue to kill them by pains for all eternity. Thus, according to St Gregory, the damned die every moment without every dying. Delivered up to avenging flames, they will die always. A man who dies through pain in an object of pity to all who behold him. Perhaps the damned, too, experienced commiseration from others? None; they die every moment, and have not, and never will have, any one to take compassion on them. The Emperor Zeno, being one day shut up in a pit, continually cried out: For pity's sake, open this grave and release me. But no one heard him, and he was found dead, after having eaten the flesh off his arms. The damned cry out from the pit of hell, says St Cyril of Alexandria, but no one comes to deliver them—no one feels compassion for them.[739]

And for how long will this their misery last? Forever, forever. In the spiritual exercises of Fr Paul Segneri, written by Muratori, it is related that in Rome, a devil in the body of a man possessed, being asked how long he would remain in hell, began to beat his hand against a chair, and answered in a rage: Forever, forever! At hearing this great sermon of two words, forever, forever, many students of the Roman seminary, who were present, made a general confession, and changed their lives. Poor Judas! He has spent more than eighteen hundred years in hell, and his hell is still at its commencement. Poor Cain, he is in fire for more than five thousand eight hundred years, and his hell is at its beginning. Another devil was asked how long it was since he had been sent to hell. He answered, yesterday. "How," said the person who asked him, "could it be yesterday when you are damned for more than five thousand years? He replied: Oh! if you knew what is meant by eternity, you would easily conceive how a thousand years, compared with it, are but a moment. If an angel said to one of the damned: You will leave hell, but only after the lapse of as many ages as there are drops of water in the ocean, leaves on the trees, or grains of sand in the sea; he would feel greater joy than a beggar would at hearing of his elevation to a throne. Yes; all these ages will pass away, they will be multiplied an infinite number of times, and hell will be at its commencement. Each of the damned would make this compact with God: Lord, increase my pain as much as Thou wishest, let it last as long as Thou pleasest; but put an end to it, and I am content. But this end will never take place. In hell, the trumpet of divine justice will sound nothing else but these words—forever, forever, never, never.

The damned will ask the devils what is the hour of the night. Watchman, what of the night?[740] When will it end? When will these trumpets, these shrieks, this stench, these flames, these torments cease? Their answer is never, never. And how long will they last? Forever, forever. Ah Lord! give light to so many blind Christians, who, when entreated not to damn themselves say: If I go to hell, I must have patience. O God! They have not patience to bear the least cold, to remain in an overheated room, or to submit it to a buffet on the cheek. And how can they have patience to remain in a sea or fire, trampled by the devils and abandoned by God and by all, for all eternity!

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, Father of mercies! Thou dost not abandon him who seeks Thee. Thou hast not forsaken them that seek Thee, O Lord.[741] I have hitherto turned my back upon Thee so often, and Thou hast not abandoned me: do not abandon me now that I seek Thee. I repent, O Sovereign Good! of having made me so little account of Thy grace, which I have exchanged for nothing. Look at the wounds of Thy Son. Listen to his cries, which implore Thee to pardon me; and grant me pardon. O my Redeemer! Remind me always to the pains Thou hast suffered for me, of the love Thou hast borne me, and of my ingratitude, by which I have soften deserved hell, that I may live always bewail the injury I have done Thee, and I may live always burning with Thy love. Ah, my Jesus! how can I but burn with Thy love when I reflect that for so many years I ought to burn in hell, and continue to burn in it for all eternity; when I remember that Thou hast died in order to deliver me from it, and that Thou hast with so much mercy rescued me from that land of misery! Were I in hell, I should now hate Thee there, and should have to hate Thee forever: but now I love thee and will love Thee forever. Thou lovest me, and I also love Thee. Thou wilt love me forever unless forsake Thee. Ah, my Saviour! Save me from the misfortune of ever leaving Thee, and then so with me whatsoever Thou pleasest. I merit every punishment, and I accept every chastisement, that Thou mayest deliver me from the punishment of being deprived of Thy love. O Mary, my refuge, how often have I condemned myself to hell, and thou hast preserved me from it. Ah, deliver me now from sin, which alone can deprive me of the grace of God, and bring me to hell.

Consideration XXVIII

THE REMORSE OF THE DAMNED

"Their worm dieth not"—Mark. ix. 47.

FIRST POINT

THE LITTLE FOR WHICH THE DAMNED ARE LOST

ACCORDING to St Thomas, this worm which dieth not is to be understood of remorse of conscience, which will eternally torment the damned in hell. The remorse which will gnaw the hearts of the reprobate will be many; but the most excruciating will be first, the thought of the trifles for which they are damned; secondly, the thought of the little which they required to do in order to save their souls; and thirdly, the thought of the great good which they have lost. After Esau had eaten the pottage of lentils for which he had sold his birthright, the Scripture says that, through sorrow and remorse for the loss, he began to roar aloud.[742] Oh! how will the damned howl and roar at the thought of having, for a few momentary poisoned pleasures, lost an eternal kingdom of delights, and of having condemned themselves forever to a continual death! Hence they will weep far more bitterly than Jonathan did when he saw himself condemned to death by his father for having eaten a little honey, I did but taste a little honey, and behold I must die.[743] O God! What torture will each of the damned feel in thinking that he was the cause of his own damnation! At present our past life appears to us but a dream, a moment. But what will he who is in hell think of the fifty or sixty years which he spend on this earth, when he will be in the abyss of eternity, and after the lapse of a hundred and a thousand millions of years, will see that this hell only begins? But were these fifty or sixty years all years of pleasure? Perhaps a sinner living without God, always feel happy in his sin! How long do the pleasures of sin last? Only for a few moments. All the remaining hours of the man who lives at enmity with God are full of pain and bitterness. But what will these moments of pleasure appear to the unhappy damned? How will he view that last sin in particular, by which he brought himself to perdition? Then he will say: For a miserable brutal pleasure, which lasted but a moment, and which was scarcely indulged when it vanished like air, I must burn in this fire, in despair, and abandoned by all, as long as God will be God—for all eternity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Lord! enlighten me, that I may felt the injustice which I have done Thee, and the eternal chastisements I have deserved, by offending Thee. My God! I feel a great remorse for having offended Thee; but this pain consoles me. Hadst Thou sent me to hell, as I deserved, the thought of the trifle for which I was damned should be the hell of my hell. But now this remorse, I say, consoles me; because it encourages me to hope for pardon from Thee, who hast promised to pardon all who repent. Yes, my Lord! I repent of having offended Thee. I embrace this sweet pain of remorse. I even entreat Thee to increase it and to preserve it in my heart till death, that I may always weep bitterly over the offences I have offered to Thee. My Jesus! pardon me. O my Redeemer! who, to procure mercy for me, hadst not mercy on Thyself but condemneth Thyself to die through pain in order to deliver me from hell, have mercy on me. Grant that my remorse for having offended Thee may keep me always sorrowful, and at the same time, inflame my whole soul with love for Thee, who hast loved me so tenderly, who hast borne with me so patiently, and who now, instead of chastising me, enrichest me with Thy lights and graces. I thank Thee, O my Jesus! and I love Thee. I love Thee more than myself. I love Thee with my whole heart. Thou knowest not how to despise a soul that loves Thee. I love Thee. Do not banish me from Thy face. Receive me, then into Thy friendship and do not permit me ever more to lose Thee. Mary, my Mother! accept me for thy servant, and bind me to Jesus, thy Son. Ask him to pardon me, to give me his love and the grace of perseverance till death.

SECOND POINT

THE LITTLE THAT WAS REQUIRED FOR THEIR SALVATION

St Thomas says that the principal pain of the reprobate will consist in seeing that they are damned for nothing, and that, if they wished, they could with so much facility acquire for themselves the glory of Paradise.[744] The second remorse of conscience, then, will arise from the thought of the little that was necessary to be done for the attainment of salvation. A person who was damned appeared to St Humbert, and said to him that the most excruciating pain which he suffered in hell was caused the thought of the trifles for which he was lost, and of the little which he required to do in order to save his soul. The unhappy soul will then say: had I mortified myself by not looking at such an object; had I overcome human respect at such a time; had I avoided such an occasion of sin, such a companion, such a conversation, I should not now be damned. If I had gone to confession every week; if I have frequented the confraternity; if I had read every day a spiritual book; if I had recommended myself to Jesus Christ and to Mary, I should not have relapsed into sin. I have so often purposed to do these things, but have either neglected my resolutions, or after having begun to practise these exercises, I gave them up, and therefore I am lost.

The torture of this remorse will be increased by the good examples of virtuous friends and companions which the reprobate has witnessed; and still more by the gifts which God has given him for the salvation of his soul; gifts of nature, such as good health; gifts of fortune, which were so many talents which the Lord had given him, that he might make a good use of them, and become a saint; gifts of grace; so many lights, inspirations, calls and so many years given to him that he might repair the evil which he had done. But he will see that, in the miserable state to which he is reduced, there is no remedy. He will hear the angel-of the Lord proclaiming and protesting that time shall be no more. And the angels whom I saw standing . . . swore by Him that liveth forever and ever . . . that time shall be no longer.[745] Oh! what cruel swords will all these gifts and graces be to the heart of the unhappy reprobate, when he sees that the time in which he could repair his eternal ruin is already past! With tears and despair he and his companions will say: The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved.[746] He will say: if the fatigues to which I had submitted for my damnation had been borne for God, I should have become a great saint; and now what advantage do I derive from them but pain and remorse, which will torment me for eternity? Ah! The thought that it was in his power to be forever happy, and that he must be forever miserable, will torture the damned more than the fire and all the other torments of hell.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Jesus! how hast Thou been able to bear with me? I have so often turned my back upon Thee and Thou hast not ceased to seek after me. I have so often offended Thee, and Thou hast pardoned me. Ah! Impart to me a portion of that sorrow which Thou didst feel in the Garden of Gethsemane for my sins, and which made Thee there sweat blood. I am sorry, O my Redeemer! for having so badly repaid Thy love. O accursed pleasures! I detest and curse you. You have mad me lose the grace of my Lord. My Beloved Jesus! I now love The e above all things, and I renounce all unlawful gratifications, and purpose to die a thousand times, rather than ever more offend Thee. Ah! Through that affection with which Thou dost love me on the cross, and offered for me Thy divine life, give me light and strength to resist temptations, and to have recourse to Thy aid whenever I shall be tempted. O Mary, my hope! Thou art all-powerful with God; obtain for me holy perseverance, obtain for me the grace never more to be separated from his holy love.

THIRD POINT

THE GREAT GOOD THAT THE DAMNED HAVE LOST

The third remorse of the damned shall arise from seeing the great good which they have lost. St John Chrysostom says that the reprobate will be tormented more by the loss of paradise than by the pains of hell![747] A certain princess once said: If God gives ma a reign of forty years, I will renounce paradise. The unhappy princess reigned for forty years; but now that her soul has departed from this world, what does she say? Certainly she has changed her sentiments. Oh! how great at present must be her affliction and despair at the thought of having, for the enjoyment of an earthly reign of forty years, lost for eternity the kingdom of heaven!

But the torment which will most grievously torture the damned for eternity will arise from the conviction that they have lost heaven and God, their sovereign good, not by any unlucky accident, nor by the malevolence of others, but by their own fault. They will see that they have been created for paradise, and that God placed in their hands the choice of procuring for themselves eternal life or eternal death. Before man is life and death; . . . that which he shall choose shall be given him.[748] Thus they will see that they had it in their power, if they wished, to be eternally happy, and that they have voluntarily precipitated themselves into that pit of torments, from which they can never escape, and from which no one will ever deliver them. They will see among the elect many of their companions, who were placed in the same, or perhaps in greater, danger of sinning, and who saved their souls because they restrained their passions by recommending themselves to God, or, if they fell into sin, soon repented and gave themselves to God. But because they would not give up sin, they have in the end unhappily gone to hell—they have fallen into that sea of torments without any hope of remedy for all eternity.

Brother, if you too have been so foolish as, by your own free acts, to lose paradise and God for a miserable pleasure, endeavour as soon as possible to apply a remedy, now that you have time. Do not voluntarily continue in your foolishness. Tremble lest you should be to weep over your folly for all eternity. Who knows but this consideration which you now read is the last call which God will give you? Perhaps, if you do not now change your life, if you commit another mortal sin, the Lord will abandon you, and in punishment of that sin, send you to suffer forever among that crowds of fools who are now in hell, and confess their error (therefore we have erred), but confess it with despair, because they see that it is forever irreparable. When the devil tempts you again to sin, remember hell, have recourse to God and to the Most Holy Virgin. The thought of hell will preserve you from hell, because it will make you have recourse to God. Remember thy last end and thou shalt never sin.[749]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Sovereign Good! how often have I lost Thee for nothing! How often have I deserved to lose Thee forever! But I am consoled by the words of Thy prophet: Let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord.[750] I must not, then, despair of finding Thee again, O my God! if I sincerely seek Thee. Yes, my God! I now sigh for Thy grace more than for any other good. I am content to be deprived of all things, even of life, rather than see myself deprived of Thy love. I love Thee, O my Creator! Above all things; and because I love Thee, I am sorry for having offended Thee. O my God! Whom I have lost and despised, pardon me immediately, and enable me to find Thee again; for I wish never more to lose Thee. If Thou dost admit me again to Thy friendship, I will leave all things, and will seek to love Thee alone. I hope to do so through Thy mercy, Eternal Father! Hear me for the love of Jesus Christ; pardon me, and give me the grace never more to be separated from Thee. If I voluntarily lost Thee again, I ought to fear that Thou wilt abandon me. O Mary, O advocate of sinners! Obtain for me the grace to make peace with God and afterward keep me under thy protection that I may never more lose him.

HEAVEN

"Your sorrow shall be turned into joy"—John. xvi 20.

FIRST POINT

ENTRANCE OF A SOUL INTO PARADISE

LET us at present animate ourselves with the hope of heaven, to bear patiently the afflictions of this life, and to offer them to God in return for the sufferings which Jesus Christ endured for the love of us. All these afflictions, sorrows, persecutions, and tears, will one day have an end, and will, if we save our souls, become to us sources of joy and happiness in the kingdom of bliss. This is the ground to courage and hope which the Saviour holds out to us. Your sorrow shall be turned into joy. [751] Let us then this day make some reflections on the joys of heaven. But what shall we be able to say on these joys, when the most enlightened of the saints knew not how to give us an idea of that happiness which God has prepared for his faithful servants? David could only say that paradise is a good exceedingly to be desired. How lovely are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts. [752] But, my beloved St Paul, do you, at least, who had the happiness of being rapt up into heaven, declare to us some of the things you have seen. No, exclaims the Apostle, what I have seen it is impossible to describe. The delights of heaven are secret words, which it is not granted to man to utter. [753] They are so great that they only who enjoy them are able to comprehend them. All that I can say of them, says the Apostle, is, that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him. [754] No man living has ever seen, or heard or conceived the beauty, the harmony, the delights which God has prepared for those who love Him.

At present it is impossible for us to comprehend the happiness of heaven, because we have no idea but of earthly enjoyments. Were a horse capable of reasoning, he would, if he expected a rich feast from his master, imagine it to consist in excellent hay and oats; for these are the only species of food of which he has any idea. It is thus we form our notions of the happiness of heaven. It is beautiful in the summer to behold at night the starry heaven; it is delightful in the spring to stand on the shore when the sea is unruffled, and to see in its bosom the rocks covered with seaweed, and the fishes gliding through the waters; it is also delightful to be a garden full of fruits and flowers, ornamented with flowing fountains, and enlivened by the flutter and singing of birds; in such a scene one is tempted to exclaim: Oh! what a paradise! what a paradise! But far different are the delights of heaven. To form some imperfect idea of them, let us reflect that in heaven is an all-powerful God, who has pledged himself to make the soul that loves him happy. Do you wish, says St Bernard, to know what is in heaven? "There is nothing there that gives displeasure; there is everything that delights."[755]

O God! What will be the sentiments of the soul on its entrance into that happy kingdom? Let us represent to our minds a young maiden, who, after consecrating herself to the love of Jesus Christ, dies and quits this world. The soul of the young maiden is presented for judgement: the Judge embraces her and pronounces the sentence of her salvation. Her angel-guardian meets and congratulates her; she thanks him for his assistance, and the angel then says: "Rejoice, O happy soul! Thy salvation is now secure, come and behold the face of thy Lord." Behold, the soul now passes beyond the clouds, the spheres, the stars, and enters into heaven. O God! What will be her feelings on first setting her foot in this happy country, and beholding, for the first time, this city of delights! The angels and the saints will come to meet her, and will receive her with a joyous welcome. What shall be her consolation in rejoining there her relatives or friends, who have been already admitted into heaven, and in meeting her holy advocates!

The soul will wish to bend her knees to venerate these saints, but they will say: See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant.[756] She will thence be carried to kiss the feet of Mary, the Queen of heaven. What tenderness will not the soul experience in first beholding this divine Mother, who gave her so much assistance in the work of her salvation; for then the soul will see all the graces she obtained through the intercession of Mary, who will embrace her with love and tenderness. This Queen of heaven will then conduct the soul to Jesus, who will receive her as his spouse, and will say: Come from Libanus, my spouse . . . thou shalt be crowned.[757] My spouse, rejoice: there is now an end to tears, to sufferings, and to fears: receive the eternal crown I have purchased for you by my blood. Jesus himself will then present her to receive the benediction of his divine Father, who shall embrace and bless her, saying: Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord;[758] and shall bestow upon her the same happiness which he himself enjoys.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Behold, O my God! At Thy feet an ungrateful sinner, whom Thou hast created for heaven, but who has so often, for the sake of a wretched pleasure, renounced Thee to Thy face, and has consented to be condemned to hell. But I hope Thou hast already pardoned me all the injuries I have done Thee, for which I am always sorry, and will be sorry as long as I live. Of these injuries I desire to receive from Thee new pardon. But, O God! Although my sins have been already forgiven, it will still always true that I have dared to afflict Thee, my Redeemer, who hast given Thy life to bring me Thy kingdom. But may Thy mercy be forever praised and blessed, O my Jesus! for having borne me with so much patience, and for having bestowed upon me multiplied graces, instead of chastising me as I deserved. I see, my dear Saviour! That Thou ardently desirest my salvation, and that Thou wishest to bring me to Thy kingdom, that I may love Thee forever; but it is Thy wish that I should first love Thee here on earth. Yes; I wish to love Thee. Though there were no heaven, I would wish to love Thee while I live, with my whole soul and with all my strength. It is enough for me to know that Thou, my God, desirest to be loved by me. My Jesus! assist me by Thy grace; do not abandon me. My soul is immortal: I must then either love Thee or hate Thee for all eternity. Ah! It is my wish to love Thee for eternity, and I wish to love Thee without reserve here, that I may love Thee without reserve hereafter. Dispose of me as Thou pleasest, chastise me as Thou wishest; do no deprive me of Thy love, and then do with me what Thou wishes. My Jesus! Thy merits are my hope. O Mary! I place great confidence in thy intercession. Thou didst deliver me from hell when I was in sin; now that I wish to give myself to God, obtain for me the grace to save my soul, and to become a saint.

SECOND POINT

HAPPINESS OF HEAVEN

When the soul has once entered into the happy kingdom of God, there will be nothing to molest it. [759] God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow shall be any more; for the former things are passed away. And He that sat on the throne said: Behold I make all things new.[760] In heaven there is no infirmity, no poverty, no distress; there are no longer the vicissitudes of days and nights, nor of cold and heat; but a perpetual day always serene, an eternal spring always delightful. There are no persecutions; no envy. In that kingdom of love, all love one another tenderly; and each rejoices in the good of the other as if it were his own. There are no fears; because the soul, being confirmed in grace, can no longer sin nor lose her God. Behold I make all things new. Everything is new; everything gives consolation and content.[761] The sight will be filled with delight in beholding this city of perfect beauty. How delightful the view of a city in which the streets are of crystal, the palaces of silver, the ceilings of gold, and all adorned with festoons of flowers! Oh! how much more beautiful the city of paradise! How splendid the appearance of these citizens, who are all, clothed in royal robes; for, as St Augustine says, they are all kings. How delightful must it be to behold Mary, who will appear more beautiful than all paradise! But what must it be to see the Lamb of God, the Heavenly Spouse, Jesus! St Teresa had one transient glimpse of one of the hands of Jesus Christ, and was struck senseless by its beauty. The smell will be regaled with odours, but with the odours of paradise. The ear will be delighted with celestial harmony. St Francis once heard from an angel a single stroke on a violin, and almost died through joy. What then must it be to hear the whole choir of saints and angels chanting the glories of God! They shall praise Thee forever and ever.[762] What must it be to hear Mary praising God! St Francis de Sales says that, as the singing of the nightingale surpasses that of all other birds, so the voice of Mary is far superior to that of all the other saints. In a word, in heaven are found all the delights which can be desired.

But the joys we have been hitherto considering are the least of the blessings of heaven. The good which constitutes heaven is God himself, the Sovereign Good. The reward which God promises us is not merely the beauty, the harmony, and the other joys of this blessed city; the chief reward is God himself—that is, to see and love God face to face. I am Thy reward exceeding great.[763] St Augustine says that, if God showed his face to the damned, "hell would be instantly turned into a paradise of delights."[764] And he adds that, were a departed soul allowed the choice of seeing God and enduring the torments of hell, or of being delivered from them and deprived of the sight of God, "it would prefer to see the Lord, and to suffer these torments."

During the present life, we cannot comprehend the delight of seeing and loving God face to face; but we may form some notion of it by considering that divine love is so enchanting, that, even in this life, it has sometimes raised up from the earth, not only the souls, but even the bodies of the saints. St Philip Neri was once lifted up into the air along with a bench which he had grasped. St Peter Alcantara was also elevated from the earth, and a tree which he held was torn up from the roots. St Vincent, while he was tormented, spoke, says St Augustine, in such a manner, that one person appeared to suffer and another to speak.[765] St Lawrence, while he was on the red-hot gridiron, upbraided the tyrant, saying: "Turn and eat."[766] "Yes," says St Augustine, "for St Lawrence, inflamed with the fire of divine love, was insensible to the burning heat of the fire."[767] Besides, how great the sweetness which a sinner experiences on this earth even in weeping over his sins! Hence, St Bernard used to say: "If it is so sweet to weep for Thee, O my God! What must it be to rejoice in Thee?"[768] What sweetness does not a soul experience when, by a ray of light, God unfolds to it in prayer his goodness, the mercies he has shown it, and the love which Jesus Christ has borne, and still bears, to it! In such moments, the soul melts and faints away through love. Yet in this life we do not God as he is: we see him only in the dark. We now see through a glass in a dark manner: but then face to face.[769] At present there is a veil before our eyes, and God is seen only with the eyes of faith; but that will be our joy when the veil is removed, and we see God face to face? We shall then see the infinite beauty of God; his infinite greatness, his justice, his perfection, his amiableness and his infinite love for us.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Sovereign Good! I am that wretch who has turned his back upon Thee and renounced Thy love. I therefore am, undeserving of seeing or of loving Thee. But, to show mercy to me, Thou hast not shown mercy to Thyself, but hast condemned Thyself to a painful and ignominious death, on an infamous gibbet. Thy death, therefore, makes me hope that I shall one day see and enjoy Thee face to face, and that I shall then love Thee with all my strength. But now that I am in danger of losing Thee forever, now that I am conscious of having lost Thee by my sins, what shall I do during the remainder of my life? Shall I continue to offend Thee? No, my Jesus! I detest with a sovereign hatred the offences I have offended Thee. I feel a sovereign sorrow for having insulted Thee, and I love Thee with my whole heart. Wilt Thou cast off a soul that repents and loves Thee? No: I know, O my Redeemer! that Thou hast said that Thou wilt not reject any one that comes to Thee with a penitent heart. Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.[770] My Jesus! I renounce all things, and turn to Thee. I embrace Thee, and untie Thee to my heart: do Thou also embrace me and unite me to Thy heart. I dare to speak in this manner, because I speak and conversed with infinite Goodness. I speak with a God who was content to die for the love of me. My dear Saviour, grant me perseverance in Thy love. My dear Mother Mary! Through the love which thou didst bear to Jesus Christ, obtain for me this perseverance. Such is my hope, such is my desire.

THIRD POINT

HEAVEN IS ETERNAL

In this life, the greatest pain which afflicts souls that are in desolation and love God, arises from the fear of not loving him, and of not being loved by him. Man knoweth not whether he be worthy of love or hatred.[771] But, in heaven, the soul is certain that it loves God, and that he loves it. It sees that it is happily lost in the love of its Lord, and that he embraces it as a beloved child, and that this love will not be dissolved for all eternity. These blessed flames will be augmented by the increased knowledge which the soul will then have of the greatness of the love of God, in becoming man and dying for us; of his love in instituting the Most Holy Sacrament, in which a God becomes the food of a worm. Then also will the soul clearly see all the graces which God has bestowed upon it in delivering it from so many temptations and so many dangers of perdition; it will then understand that the tribulations, infirmities, persecutions, and losses, which it called misfortunes and divine chastisement, were all love, all means intended by intended by divine Providence to conduct it to heaven. It will see particularly the patience of God in bearing with it after so many sins, and the mercies he had shown it in giving it so many lights and invitations to his love. From that blessed mountain it will behold so many souls in hell, condemned for fewer sins than it had committed, and will see that it is saved, that it is in the possession of God, and secure against all danger of ever losing that Sovereign Good for all eternity.

The blessed then will forever enjoy that felicity which, during each moment of eternity, will be always as new as at the first moment of its enjoyment. The soul will always desire and always possess that joy. It shall be always satisfied, and always thirsty: forever thirsty and always satisfied with delights: because the desire of heaven begets no pain, and its possession produces no tediousness. In a word, as the damned are vessels full of wrath, so the blessed are vessels filled with happiness, so that they have nothing more to desire. St Teresa says that even in this life, when God introduces a soul into the cellar of wine—that is, of his love, it becomes happily inebriated, so that it loses all affections for earthly things. But in entering into paradise, how much more perfectly, as David says, will the elect be inebriated with the plenty of God's house.[772] In seeing God face to face, and in embracing its Sovereign Good, the soul will be so inebriated with love that it will happily lose itself in God—that is, it will entirely forget itself, and will think only of loving, of praising and of blessing the infinite Good which it possesses.

When, therefore, the crosses of this life afflict us, let us animate ourselves with the hope of heaven to bear them patiently. St Mary of Egypt, being asked at the end of her life by the Abbot Zozimus, how she had been able to live for so many years in such a desert, replied: With the hope of heaven. When the dignity of Cardinal was offered to St Philip Neri, he threw up the cap in the air, exclaiming, Paradise! Paradise! At the mention of paradise, Br Giles of the Order of St Francis, was raised up from the ground through joy. Let us, likewise, when we are afflicted by the miseries of this life, raise up our eyes to heaven, and console ourselves, saying with a sigh, Heaven! Heaven! Let us reflect that if we be faithful to God, all these sorrows, miseries and fears will one day have an end, and we shall be admitted into that blessed country, where we shall enjoy complete happiness as long as God will be God. Behold, the saints are expecting us, Mary is expecting us, and Jesus stands with a crown in his hand, to make us kings in that eternal kingdom.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My dear Jesus! Thou hast taught me this prayer—Thy kingdom come. I therefore now pray that Thy kingdom may come into my heart, so that Thou mayest possess it entirely and that my soul may possess Thee, its Sovereign Good. O my Jesus! Thou hast spared nothing in order to save me and to acquire my love; save me then, and let my salvation consist in loving Thee always in this life and in the next. I have so often turned by back upon Thee and yet Thou assurest me that Thou wilt not disdain to embrace me for all eternity in heaven, with as much love as if I had never offended Thee. And knowing this, can I ever love anything else but Thee, who wishest to bestow heaven upon me after I have so often deserved hell? Ah, my Lord! Would that I had never offended The! Oh! were I born again I would always love Thee. But what is done is done. I can now do no more than give Thee the remainder of my life. Yes, I give it entirely to Thee. I consecrate myself entirely to Thy love. Depart from my heart, all earthly affections; give place to my God, who wishes to possess it entirely. Yes; take possession of my whole being, my Redeemer, my Love, and my God! From this day forward I will think only of pleasing Thee. Assist me by Thy grace. I hope in Thy merits. Augment in me continually Thy love, and the desire of pleasing Thee. Heaven! Heaven! When, O Lord! Shall the day come when I shall see Thee face to face, and embrace Thee, without fear of ever more losing Thee? Ah, my God! Keep Thy hand upon me that I may never more offended Thee. O Mary! When shall I see myself at thy feet in heaven? Assist me, my Mother; do not permit me to be lost, and to go forever to a distance from thee and thy Son.

PRAYER

"Ask, and it shall be given you; for every one that asketh, receiveth."—Luke, xi 9, 10.

FIRST POINT

EFFICACY OF PRAYER

NOT only in this, but in a thousand places in the Old and New Testament, God promises to hear all who pray to him. Cry to me, and I will hear thee.[773] "Call upon me, and I will deliver you from all dangers."[774] If you ask anything in My name, that I will do.[775] Whatsoever you shall ask through my merits I will grant. You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you.[776] Ask as much as you wish: all that you ask will be given you. There are many other similar passages. Hence Theodoret has said that prayer is one, but can obtain all things. St Bernard says that when we pray, the Lord will give either the grace we ask, or one that is more useful to us.[777] The prophet animates us to pray by assuring us that God is all mercy to those who invoke his aid. Thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild, and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee.[778] The words of St James are still more encouraging. If any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth abundantly to all men, and upbraideth not.[779] This apostle tells us that when we pray to the Lord, he opens his hands, and gives us more than we ask. He giveth to all men abundantly and upbraideth not. He does not reproach us with the offences that we have offered to him; but, when we pray to him, he appears to forget all the injuries that we have done him.

St John Climacus used to say that prayer in a certain manner forces God to grant us whatsoever we ask of him. "Prayer piously offers violence to God."[780] But it is, as St Tertullian says, a violence which is dear to him, and which he desires from us.[781] Yes; for, as St Augustine says, God has a greater desire to give us his graces, than we have to receive them.[782] The reason is, because God is of his own nature infinite goodness. Hence he feels an infinite desire to impart his goods to us. Hence St Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that God feels as it were under an obligation to the soul that prays to him; because by prayer it opens to him the way by which he can satisfy his desire of dispensing his graces to us. David says that goodness of God, in instantly hearing all who pray to him, showed him that he was his true God. In what day soever I shall call upon Thee, behold I know Thou art my God.[783] Some, observes St Bernard, complain that God is wanting to them; but the Lord far more justly complains that many are wanting to him by neglecting to ask his graces. Of this precisely the Redeemer appears to have complained one day to his disciples, Hitherto you have not asked anything in My name; ask and you shall receive, that your joy may be full.[784] As if he said: Do not complain of me if you do not enjoy complete happiness; complain of yourselves for not having asked my graces: ask me for them henceforth, and you shall be satisfied.

Hence in their conferences, the ancient monks came to the conclusion, that there is no exercise more conducive to salvation than to pray always and say: Lord, assist me; incline unto my aid, O God."[785] The Venerable Paul Segneri used to say of himself, that in his meditations he was at first accustomed to spend his time in pious affections; but, having afterward learned the great efficacy of prayer, he endeavoured generally to employ himself in petitions to God. Let us always do the same. We have a God who loves us to excess, and who is solicitous for our salvation, and therefore he is always ready to hear all who ask his graces. The princes of the earth, says St Chrysostom, give audience only to a few; but God gives audience to all who wish for it.[786]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Eternal God! I adore Thee, and I thank Thee for all the benefits Thou hast bestowed upon me—for having created me, for having redeemed me through Jesus Christ, for having made me a Christian, for having waited for me when I was in sin, and for having so often pardoned me. Ah, my God! I should never have offended Thee, if in my temptations I had recourse to Thee; I thank Thee for the light by which Thou now makest me understand that my salvation consists in praying to Thee, and in asking graces of Thee. Behold, I entreat Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, to give me a great sorrow for my sins, holy perseverance in Thy grace, a good death, heaven, but above all, the great gift of Thy love, and perfect resignation to Thy most holy will. I well know that I do not deserve these graces but Thou hast promised them to all who ask them of Thee through the merits of Jesus Christ; through these merits I hope and ask for them. O Mary! Thy prayers are always heard; pray for me.

SECOND POINT

NECESSITY OF PRAYER

Let us also reflect on the necessity of prayer. St Chrysostom says that, as the body without the soul is dead, so the soul is dead without prayer. He also teaches that, as water is necessary to prevent the decay of plants, so prayer is necessary to preserve us from perdition.[787] God wills that all men be saved.[788]—and is unwilling that any be lost. The Lord . . . dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any one should perish, but that all should return to penance.[789] But he also wishes that we ask him for the graces necessary for salvation. For, on the one hand, it is impossible for us to observe the divine commands, and save our souls, without the actual assistance of God; and on the other, ordinarily speaking, God will not give us his graces unless we ask them from him. Hence, the holy Council of Trent has declared that God has not command impossibilities; because he either gives us the proximate and actual grace to fulfil his precepts, or he gives us the grace to ask him for this actual aid.[790] St Augustine teaches, that God gives without prayer the first graces, such as vocation to the faith and to repentance; but all other graces, and particularly the gift of perseverance, He gives only to those who ask them.[791]

Hence, theologians, after St Basil, St Augustine, St John Chrysostom, Clement of Alexandria and others, teach, that for adults prayer is necessary as a means of salvation; so that, without it, it is impossible to be saved. And the most learned Lessjus says that this doctrine must be held as of faith.[792]

The Scriptures are clear on this point. We ought always to pray.[793] Pray, lest ye enter into temptation.[794] Ask and you shall receive.[795] Pray without ceasing.[796] The words, we ought, pray, ask, according to St Thomas (3 part, qu. 39, art. 5) and the generality of theologians, imply a strict precept, which binds under grievous sin particularly in three cases. First, when a person is in the state of sin; secondly, when he is in danger of death; and thirdly, when he is in great danger of falling into sin. Theologians teach that, ordinarily, he who neglects prayer for a month, or at most, for two months, is guilty of a mortal sin (Less., loco citato). The reason is, because prayer is a means without which we cannot obtain the helps necessary for salvation.

Ask, and you shall receive. He who asks, receives; then, says St Teresa, he who does not ask, does not receive. And before her, St James said the same thing. You have not, because you ask not.[797] Prayer is particularly necessary to obtain the virtue of continence. And, said the wise man, as I knew that I could not otherwise be continent, except God gave it . . . I went to the Lord, and besought Him.[798] Let us conclude this point. He who prays, is certainly saved; he who does not pray, is certainly lost. All the elect are saved by prayer; all the damned are lost by neglect of prayer, and their greatest despair is, and will be forever, caused by the conviction, that they had it in their power to save their souls so easily by prayer, and that now the time of salvation is no more.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Redeemer! how have I been able hitherto to live in such forgetfulness of Thee? Thou wert prepared to grant me all the graces that I should ask of Thee; Thou only didst wait for me to ask them. But I have thought only of indulging my senses, and have been indifferent about the privation and loss of Thy love and of Thy graces. Lord! Forget all my ingratitude, and have mercy on me. Pardon me all the displeasures I have given Thee, and grant me perseverance. O God of my soul! Give me the grace always to ask Thy aid not to offend Thee. Do not permit me to be, as I have hitherto been, negligent in the performance of this duty. Grant me light and strength always to recommend myself to Thee, and particularly when my enemies tempt me to offend Thee again. Grant, O my God! this grace through the merits of Jesus Christ, and through the love which Thou bearest to him. O Lord! I have offended Thee enough. I wish to love Thee during the remainder of my life. Give me Thy love; and may this love remind me to ask Thy aid whenever I am in danger of losing Thee by sin. Mary, my hope after Jesus! through thy intercession I hope for the grace to recommend myself in all my temptations to thee and to thy Son. Hear me, O my Queen, through the love which thou bearest to Jesus Christ.

THIRD POINT

CONDITIONS OF PRAYER

Lastly, let us consider the conditions of prayer. Many pray, and do not obtain the object of their prayers, because they do not pray as they ought. You ask, says St James, and receive not, because you ask amiss.[799] To pray well, it is necessary, in the first place, to pray with humility. God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[800] God rejects the petitions of the proud, but does not allow the humble to depart without hearing all their prayers. The prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds. . . . and he will not depart till the Most High behold.[801] This holds, even though they have been hitherto sinners. A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou will not despise.[802] Secondly, it is necessary to pray with confidence. No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded.[803] Jesus Christ has taught us to call God, in our petitions for his graces, by no other name than that of Father, in order to make us pray with the same confidence, who prays with confidence, obtains every grace. All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[804] And who, says St Augustine, can fear that the promises of God, who is truth itself, will be violated?[805] God, says the Scripture, is not like men, who promise, but do not perform, either because they intend to deceive, or because they change their purpose. God is not as a man, that he should lie, nor as the son of man, that He should be changed. Hath He told them, and will He not do?[806] And why, adds the same St Augustine, should the Lord so earnestly exhort us to ask his graces, if he did not wish to bestow them upon us? By his promises he has bound himself to grant us the graces we ask from him. "By promising," says St Augustine, "he has made himself a debtor."[807]

But some will say: I am a sinner, and therefore I do not deserve to be heard. In answer, St Thomas says that the efficacy of prayer to obtain graces depends, not on our merits, but on the divine mercy.[808] Everyone, says Jesus Christ, that asketh receiveth;[809] that is, says the author of the Imperfect Work, "every one, whether he be a just man or a sinner."[810] But the Redeemer himself takes away all fear, saying: Amen, amen, I say to you: If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it to you.[811] As if he said: Sinners, if you are without merits, I have merits before my Father. Ask, then, in my name, and I promise that you will receive whatsoever you ask. But it is necessary to know that this promise does not extend to temporal favours, such as health, goods of fortune, and the like; for God often justly refuses these graces, because he sees that they would be injurious to our salvation. "The physician," says St Augustine, "knows better than the patient what is useful to him."[812] The holy Doctor adds, that God refuses to some through mercy, what he gives to others through wrath.[813] Hence we should ask temporal blessings only on condition that they will be profitable to the soul. But spiritual graces, such as pardon of sins, perseverance, divine love, and the like, should be asked absolutely and with a firm confidence of obtaining them. If, says Jesus Christ, you being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father from heaven give the good Spirit to them that ask Him![814]

Above all, perseverance in prayer is necessary. In this commentary on the eleventh chapter of St Luke, Cornelius a Lapide says, that the Lord "wishes us to persevere in prayer even to importunity."[815] This may be inferred from the following passages of Scripture: We ought always to pray.[816] Watch ye, therefore, praying at all times. Pray without ceasing.[817] It may be also inferred from our Lord's repeated exhortations to prayer, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you.[818] It might be sufficient to have said, ask; but no; the Lord wishes us to understand that we ought to imitate beggars, who do not cease to ask, to entreat, and to knock at the gate, until they receive an alms. But final perseverance, in particular, is a grace which is not obtained without continual prayer. We cannot merit this grace of perseverance; but according to St Augustine, it may be merited in a certain manner. "This gift," says the holy Doctor, "can be suppliantly merited; that is, it may be obtained by supplication."[819] Let us, then, if we wish to be saved, pray always and never cease to pray. And let all confessors and preachers, if they desire the salvation of souls, never cease to exhort their penitents or hearers to prayer. And, in conformity with the advice of St Bernard, let us always have recourse to the intercession of Mary. Let us ask grace, and ask it through Mary, for what she asks, she obtains, and her prayer cannot be fruitless.[820]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My God! I hope that Thou hast already pardoned me; but my enemies will not cease to fight against me till death. Unless Thou dost assist me, I shall lose Thee again. Ah! Through the merits of Jesus Christ, I ask holy perseverance. Do not permit me to be separated from Thee. And I ask the same grace for all who are at present in the state of grace. I hope, with certainty in Thy promise, that Thou wilt give me perseverance if I will continue to ask it from Thee. But I fear that in my temptations, I shall neglect to have recourse to Thee and that thus I shall relapse into sun. I therefore ask of Thee the grace never more to neglect prayer. Grant that in the occasions in which I shall be in danger of relapsing, I may recommend myself to Thee, and may invoke the aid of the most holy names of Jesus and Mary. My God! This I purpose and hope to do with the assistance of Thy grace. Hear me for the sake of Jesus Christ. O Mary, my Mother! Obtain for me the grace that in all dangers of losing God, I may have recourse to thee and to thy Son.

PERSEVERANCE

"He that shall persevere to the end, he shall be saved."—Matt. xxiv.13.

FIRST POINT

NECESSITY OF PERSEVERANCE—MEANS OF DEFENCE AGAINST THE DEVIL

ST JEROME says that many begin well but few perseverance.[821] Saul, Judas, Tertullian, began well, but ended badly, because they did not persevere in grace. The Lord, says St Jerome, requires not only the beginning of a good life, but also the end:[822] it is the end that will be rewarded. St Bonaventure says that the crown is given to perseverance.[823] Hence St Laurence Justinian calls perseverance the "gate of heaven."[824] No one can enter paradise unless he finds the gate of heaven. My brother, at present you have renounced sin, and justly hope that you have been pardoned. You are then the friend of God: but remember that you are not yet saved. And when will you be saved? When you will have persevered to the end. He that shall persevere to the end, he shall be saved.[825] Have you begun a good life? Thank the Lord for it; but St Bernard warns you that to him who begins, a reward is only promised and is given only to him who perseveres.[826] It is not enough to run for the prize, you must run till you win it. So run, says St Paul, that you may obtain.[827]

You have already put your hand to the plough, and you have begun to live well; but now you must tremble and fear more than ever. With fear and trembling work out your salvation.[828] And why? Because if—which God forbid—you look back and return to a life of sin, God will declare you unfit for paradise. No man pulling his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.[829] At present through the grace of God, you avoid evil occasions, you frequent the sacraments, and make meditation every day. Happy you if you continue to do so, and if, when he comes to judge you, Jesus Christ will find you doing these things. Blessed is that servant whom, when his lord shall come, he shall find so doing.[830] But do not imagine that, now that you have begun to serve God, there is as it were an end, or a lack of temptation: listen to the advice of the Holy Ghost. Son, when thou comest to the service of God. . . . prepare thy soul for temptation.[831] Remember that now more than ever you must prepare yourself for conflicts, because your enemies, the world, the devil, and the flesh, will arm themselves now more than ever to fight against you in order to deprive you of all that you have acquired. Denis the Carthusian says, that the more a soul gives itself to God, the more strenuously hell labours to destroy it.[832] And this is sufficiently expressed in the Gospel of St Like, where Jesus Christ says: When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through places without water, seeking rest, and not finding it, he saith: I will return into my house whence I came out. And when he is come, he findeth it swept and garnished. Then he goeth and taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and entering in, they dwell there. And the last state of that man is worse that the first.[833] When banished from a soul, the devil finds no repose, and does everything in his power to return: he even calls companions to his aid; and if he succeeds in re-entering, the second fall of that soul will be far more ruinous than the first.

Consider, then, what arms you must use in order to defend yourselves against these enemies, and to preserve your soul in the grace of God. To escape defeat, and to conquer the devil, there is no other defence than prayer. St Paul says that we have to contend, not with men of flesh and blood like ourselves, but with the princes of hell. Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers.[834] By these words the Apostle wished to admonish us that we have not strength to resist such powerful enemies, and that we stand in need of aid from God. With his aid we shall be able to do all things. I can do all things in Him that strengtheneth me.[835] Such is the language of St Paul, such, too, should be our language. But this divine aid is given only to those who pray for it. Ask and you shall receive. Let us, then not trust in our purposes; if we trust in them, we shall be lost. Whenever the devil tempts us, let us place our entire confidence in the divine assistance, and let us recommended ourselves to Jesus Christ and to the Most Holy Mary. We ought to do this particularly as often as we are tempted against chastity; for this is the most terrible of all temptations, and is the one which the devil gains most victories. We have not strength to preserve chastity; this strength must come from God. And, said Solomon, as I know that I could not otherwise be continent except God gave it. . . . I went to the Lord, and besought Him.[836] In such temptations, then, we must instantly have recourse to Jesus Christ and to his holy Mother, frequently invoking the most names of Jesus and Mary. He who des this, will conquer; he who neglects it, will be lost.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my God! "cast me not away from Thy face." I know that Thou wilt never abandon me, unless I first abandon Thee. Experience of my own weakness makes me tremble lest I should again forsake Thee. Lord! It is from Thee I must receive the strength necessary to conquer hell, which labours to make me again its slave. This strength I ask of Thee for the sake of Jesus Christ. O my Saviour! Establish between Thee and me a perpetual peace which will never be broken for all eternity. For this purpose I ask Thy love. "He who loves not is dead." O God of my soul, it is by Thee I must be saved from this unhappy death. I was lost; Thou knowest it. It is Thy goodness alone that has brought me into the state in which I am at present, in which I hope I am Thy friend. Ah, my Jesus! through the painful death which Thou didst suffer for my salvation, do not permit me ever more to lose Thee voluntarily. I love Thee above all things. I hope to see myself always bound with this holy love, and to die in the bonds of love, and to live for eternity in the chains of Thy love. O Mary! Thou art called the mother of perseverance; through thee this great gift is dispensed. Through thy intercession I ask and hope to obtain it.

SECOND POINT

WE MUST CONQUER THE WORLD

Let us now see how we must conquer the world. The devil is a great enemy of our salvation, but the world is worse. If the devil did not make use of the world and of wicked men, by whom we mean the world, he would not obtain the victories which he gains. But says Jesus Christ, beware of men.[837] Men are often worse than the devils; for these are put to flight when we pray and invoke the most holy names of Jesus and Mary. But when a person gives a becoming answer to the wicked companions, who tempt him to sin, they redouble their efforts, they treat him with ridicule, upbraiding him with vulgarity and want of education; and when they can say nothing else, they call him a hypocrite, who only pretends to sanctity. To escape such derision and reproach, certain weak souls miserably associate with these ministers of Lucifer, and return to the vomit. My brother, be persuaded that, if you wish to lead a holy life, you must expect the ridicule and contempt of the wicked. The wicked, says the Holy Ghost, loath them that are in the right way.[838] He who loves in sin cannot bear the sight of those who live according to the Gospel. And why? Because their life is a continual reproach to him; and therefore to avoid the pain of remorse caused by the good example of others, he would wish that all should imitate his own wickedness. There is no remedy. The Apostle tells us that he who serves God must be persecuted by the world. All that will live godly as Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.[839] All the saints have been persecuted. Who was more holy than Jesus Christ? The world persecuted him so as to cause him to bleed to death on a cross.

There is no help for this; for the maxims of the world are diametrically opposed to the maxims of Jesus Christ. What the world esteems, Jesus Christ has called folly. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.[840] And the world regards as folly when Jesus Christ has strongly recommended —such as crosses, pains and contempts. For the word of the cross, to them indeed that perish, is foolishness.[841] But if the wicked revile and reproach us, let us console ourselves with the reflection that God blesses and praises us. They will curse, and Thou wilt bless.[842] Is it not enough for us to be praised by God, by Mary, by the angels, the saints and all good men? Let us, then, leave sinners to say what they please and let us continue to please God, who is grateful and faithful to all who serve him. The greater the opposition and difficulty we meet in doing good, the more we shall please God and treasure up merits for ourselves. Let us imagine that we are alone with God in this world. When the wicked treat us with derision, let us recommend them to the Lord, let us thank him for giving us light, which he does not give to these miserable men, and let us continue our journey. Let us not be ashamed to appear like Christians; for, if we are ashamed of Jesus Christ, he protests that he will be ashamed of us on the day of judgement. For he that shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, of him the Son of man shall be ashamed, when He shall come in His majesty.[843]

If we wish to save our souls, we must resolve to suffer and to do violence to ourselves. How narrow is the gate and strait is the way that leadeth to life. The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away.[844] He who does not violence to himself, will not be saved. There is no remedy. If we wish to do good, we must act in opposition to our rebellious nature. In the beginning, it is particularly necessary to do violence to ourselves in order to root out bad habits, and to acquire habits of virtue. When good habits are once acquired, the observance of the divine law becomes easy, and even sweet. Our Lord said to St Bridget, that when in the practice of virtue a person suffers the first punctures of the thorns with patience and courage, these thorns afterward become roses. Be attentive, them dearly beloved Christian. Jesus Christ now says to you, what he said to the paralytic: Behold, thou are made whole, sin no more, lest some worse thing happen to thee.[845] Remember, says St Bernard, that if you have the misfortune of relapsing into sin, your relapse will be more disastrous than all your falls.[846] Woe, says the Lord, to them who begin to walk of God, and afterward forsake it. Woe to you, apostate children.[847] Such sinners are punished as rebels against God's light. They have been rebellious to the light.[848] The chastisement of these rebels, who have been favoured by God with a great light and have been afterward unfaithful to him, is, to remain in blindness, and thus die in their sins. But if the just man turn himself away from his justice . . . shall he live? All his justices which he hath done shall not be remembered; in the prevarication by which he hath prevaricated and in his sin which he hath committed in them he shall die.[849]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my God! Such chastisement I have often deserved, because I have, through the light which Thou gavest me, renounced sin, and have miserably returned to it. I infinitely thank Thy mercy for not having abandoned me in my blindness by leaving me entirely destitute of light, as I deserved. Great then, O my Jesus! are my obligations to Thee, and great should be my ingratitude, were I again to turn my back upon thee. No, my Redeemer, the mercies of the Lord I will sing forever. I hope that during the remainder of my life, and for all eternity, I will always sing and praise Thy mercies by loving Thee always, and never more seeing myself bereft of Thy graces. The great ingratitude with which I have hitherto treated Thee, and which I now hate and curse above every evil, will serve to make me weep bitterly over the injuries I have done Thee, and to inflame me still more with the love of Thee, who, after I had given Thee so many grievous offences, have bestowed upon me so many great graces. Yes, I love Thee, O my God! worthy of infinite love. Henceforth Thou shalt be my only love, my only good. O eternal Father! Through the merits of Jesus Christ I ask of Thee final perseverance in Thy grace and in Thy love. I know that Thou wilt grant it to me whenever I ask it. But who assures me that I shall be careful to ask this perseverance from Thee? Hence O my God, I ask perseverance, and the grace always to ask it of Thee. O Mary, my advocate, my refuge, and my hope! Obtain for me by thy intercession the gifts of constancy in always asking of God the grace of final perseverance. Through the love which thou bearest Jesus Christ, I ask thee to obtain for me the gift.

THIRD POINT

WE MUST STRUGGLE AGAINST THE FLESH—RECAPITULATION

Let us come to the third enemy—that is, the flesh, which is the worst of all; and let us see how we must defend ourselves against its attacks. The first means is prayer; but this we have already considered. The second is, to avoid the occasion of sin; and let us now ponder well upon this means of overcoming the flesh. St Bernardine says that the greatest of all counsels, and the one which is, as it were, the foundation of religion, is to fly from sinful occasions.[850] Being compelled by exorcisms, the devil once confessed that of all sermons, that which displeased him most was the sermon on avoiding the occasions of sin; and justly; for the devil laughs at all the resolutions and promises of penitent sinners who remain in the occasion of sin. The occasion of sins of the flesh, in particular, is like a veil placed before the eyes, which prevents the soul from seeing either its resolutions, or the lights received from God, or the truths of eternity: in a word, it makes it forget everything, and almost blinds it. The neglect of avoiding the occasions of sin was the cause of the fall of our first parents. God had forbidden them even to touch the forbidden fruit. God commanded us, said Eve, that we should not eat, and that we should not touch it.[851] But through want of caution she saw, took and ate it. She first began to look at the apple, she afterward took it in her hand, and then ate it. He who voluntarily exposes himself to danger, will perish in it.[852] St Peter tells us that the devil goeth about seeking whom he may devour.[853] And what, says St Cyprian, does he do in order to enter again into the soul from which he has been expelled?[854] He seeks an occasion of sin. If the soul permits him to bring it again into the occasion of sin, he will enter again, and shall devour it. The Abbot Guerric says that Lazarus came forth from the grave bound hand and foot,[855] and after rising in this state, he died again. Miserable, this author means to say, is that man who rises from sin bound by the occasion of sin; though he should rise, he surely will die again. He, then, who wishes to be saved must forsake not only all sin, but the occasions of sin—that is, the companions, the house, the connections which lead to sin.

But you will say: I have changed my life, and now I have no bad motive, nor even a temptation, in the society of such a person. I answer: it is related that in Mauritania there are bears that go in search of the apes. As soon as they see a bear, the apes save themselves by climbing up the trees; but what does the bear do? He stretches himself, as if dead, under the tree; and when the apes descend, he springs up, seizes and devours them. It is thus the devil acts: he makes the temptations appear dead: and when the soul exposes himself to the occasion of sin, he excites the temptation, which devours it. Oh! how many miserable souls, that practised mental prayer, frequented Communions, and might be called saints, have, by putting themselves into dangerous occasions, become the prey of hell? It is related in ecclesiastical history, that a holy matron, who devoted herself to the pious work of burying the martyrs, found one of them not dead. She brought him to her house; he recovered. What happened? By the proximate occasion, these two saints, as they might be called, first lost the grace of God and afterward lost the faith.

The Lord commanded Isaias to proclaim that all flesh is grass.[856] Is it possible, says St John Chrysostom, for hay not to burn when it is thrown into the fire.[857] And St Cyprian says that it is impossible to stand in the midst of flames, and not be burned.[858] According to the prophet Isaias, our strength is like that of tow cast into the fire. And your strength shall be as the ashes of tow.[859] And Solomon says that it would be folly to expect to walk on red-hot coals, without being burned. Can a man walk upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?[860] Thus it is likewise folly to expose ourselves to the occasion of sin, and to expect not to fall. It is necessary then to fly from sin as from the face of a serpent. Flee from sins as from the face of serpent.[861] We ought, says Gualfrido, not only to avoid the bite or contact of a serpent, but should also abstain from approaching it.[862] But you will say: My interest requires that I should frequent such a house, or that I should keep up a certain friendship. But if you see that such a house is for you a way to hell, there is no remedy; you must forsake it if you wish to save your soul. Her house is the way to hell.[863] The Lord tells you that if your right eye is a cause of damnation to you; you must pluck it out and cast it from you.[864] Mark the words; you must cast it, not beside you, but to a distance from you—that is, you must take away every occasion of sin. St Francis of Assisi says, that the devil tempts spiritual souls, who have given themselves to God, in a way different from that in which he tempts the wicked. In the beginning he does not seek to bind them with a chain; he is content to hold them by a single hair: he then binds them with a slender thread; afterward with a cord; then with a chain; and thus drags them to sin. And therefore he who wishes to be free from the danger of perdition must, in the beginning, break all these hairs, he must avoid all occasions of sins, he must give up these salutations, presents, notes and the like. And for those who have contracted a habit of committing sins against purity, it will not be enough to avoid proximate occasions: unless they fly even from remote occasions, they will relapse.

He who sincerely wishes to be saved, must, by often repeating with the saints, Let all be lost, provided God is not lost, labour continually to strengthen and renew his resolution of never again renouncing the friendship of God. But it is not enough to resolve never more to lose God, it is moreover necessary to adopt the means by which you may be preserved from the danger of losing him. The first means is, to avoid the occasions of sin; of this we have already spoken. The second is, to frequent the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist. In the house which is often swept more this is no uncleanness. By the sacrament of penance the soul is purified; by it, it obtains not only the remission of sins, but also helps to resist temptations. The Communion is called the bread of heaven; because as the body cannot live without earthly food, so the soul cannot live without this celestial bread. Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you.[865] But on the other had, to those who frequently eat this bead, is promised eternal life. If any man eats of this bread, he shall live forever.[866] Hence the Council of Trent calls the Communion a medicine which delivers us from venial, and preserves us from mortal sins.[867] The third means is meditation, or mental prayer. Remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin.[868] He who keeps before his eyes the eternal truths—death, judgement, eternity—will not fall into sin. God enlightened us in meditation. Come ye to Him, and be enlightened.[869] In meditation God speaks to us, and makes known to us what we are to avoid, and what we are to do. I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart.[870] Meditation is the blessed furnace in which divine love is lighted up. In my meditation a fire shall flame out.[871] To preserve the soul in the grace of God, it is, as has been already said, absolutely necessary always to pray and to ask for the graces we stand in need of. They, who do not make mental prayer, will scarcely pray for God's graces; and by neglecting to pray for them, they will certainly be lost.

It is necessary then to adopt the means of salvation, and to lead a life of order and regularity. It is necessary, after rising in the morning, to make the Christian acts of thanksgiving, love, oblation, and a purpose of avoiding sin, along with a prayer to Jesus and Mary that they may preserve you from sin during the day; you should afterward make your meditation and hear Mass. During the day you ought to make a spiritual reading, visit the Blessed Sacrament and an image of the divine Mother. In the evening, say the rosary, and make an examination of conscience. Go to Communion several times in the week, according as your director may advise: you should ordinarily go to confession to the same confessor. It would also be very profitable to make the spiritual exercises in some religious house. It is likewise necessary to honour the Most Holy Mary by some special devotion—such as by fasting on Saturdays. She is called the Mother of perseverance, and she promises to obtain it for all who serve her. They that work by me shall not sin.[872] Above all, it is necessary to ask of God holy perseverance, and especially in the time of temptation, invoking then more frequently the names of Jesus and Mary as long as the temptation continues. If you act in this manner, you will certainly be saved; if not, you will certainly be lost.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My dear Redeemer! I thank Thee for the lights which Thou now givest me, and for the means of salvation which Thou makest known tome. I promise to endeavour to persevere in the practice of them. I see that Thou wishest for my salvation; and I wish to be saved principally to please Thy heart, which so ardently desires my salvation. O my God! I will no longer resist the love which Thou entertainest for me. This love has made Thee bear me with so much patience when I offended Thee. Thou callest me to Thy house, and I desire only to love Thee. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! I love Thee, O infinite Good! Ah! I entreat Thee, through the merits of Jesus Christ, not to permit me to be ever again ungrateful to Thee; either make me cease to be ungrateful to Thee, or make me cease to live. Lord! Thou hast already begun the work; bring it to perfection, Confirm, O God! That which Thou hast wrought in me.[873] Give me light, give me strength, give me love. O Mary! Who art the treasurer of graces, assist me, accept me for thy servant, and pray to Jesus for me. Through the merits of Jesus Christ first, and then through thy prayers, I hope for salvation.

Consideration XXXII

CONFIDENCE IN THE PATRONAGE OF MARY

"He that shall find me, shall find life, and shall have salvation from the Lord."—Prov. viii.35.

FIRST POINT

POWER OF MARY

OH! how great will be our thankfulness to the mercy of God, for having given us for our advocate, Mary, who by her prayers, can obtain for us all the graces we stand in need of. "Truly wonderful," exclaims St Bonaventure, "is the bounty of our God, who has given thee, O Lady, to his guilty subjects as their advocate, so that thou art able to obtain for them by thy assistance whatever thou wilt." Sinners, brethren, if we find ourselves debtors to the divine justice, and condemned to hell by our sins, let us not despair; let us have recourse to this divine mother; let us put ourselves under her protection, and she will save us. But we must have a sincere purpose of amending our lives. If we have such a purpose, and place confidence in Mary, we shall be saved. And why? Because Mary is a powerful advocate, a merciful advocate, an advocate that desires to save all.[874]

In the first place, let us consider that Mary is a powerful advocate, who can obtain from the Judge all graces for her servants. This is a singular privilege given to her by the Judge himself, who is her Son. "It is a great privilege, that Mary is most powerful with her Son."[875] John Gerson says that the Blessed Virgin asks nothing from God with an absolute will, which she does not obtain; and that, like a queen, she sends the angels to enlighten, to purify, and to perfect her servants. Hence to inspire confidence in this great advocate, the Church makes us invoke her under the title of Powerful Virgin. Powerful Virgin, pray for us.[876] And why is the patronage of Mary so powerful? Because she is the Mother of God. "The prayer of the divine Mother," says St Antoninus, "partakes of the nature of a command, and therefore it is impossible for her not to be heard."[877] The prayers of Mary are the prayers of a mother, and are therefore regarded by Jesus Christ, in a certain manner, as commands; hence it is impossible that her petitions should be rejected. St George, Archbishop of Nicomedia, says that the Redeemer, as if to discharge the obligation which he owes to his mother for having given to him his human nature, hears all her prayers. Hence, St Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, has written: "The Son is pleased that his Mother should pray to him, because he wishes to grant her whatsoever she asks, in order to repay her for the favour received from her in giving him flesh."[878] Hence the martyr St Methodius exclaimed: "Rejoice, rejoice, O Mary! Thou hast for a debtor thy Son. We are all debtors to him: but he is a debtor to thee alone."[879]

Hence Cosmas of Jerusalem says that the intercession of Mary is omnipotent.[880] Yes, her prayers are omnipotent, because as Richard of St Laurence says, it is but just that the Mother should partake of the power of the Son. The Son, then, who is omnipotent, has made the Mother omnipotent.[881] The Son is omnipotent by nature; the Mother is omnipotent by grace—that is, she obtains by her prayers whatsoever she asks, as is happily expressed in the celebrated verse: "What God doeth by right, thou, O Virgin, dost by prayer."[882] This was revealed to St Bridget, who one day heard Jesus Christ addressing his mother in the following words: "Ask from me what you wish; for your petition cannot be fruitless."[883] My mother, ask as much as you please; for I shall hear all your prayers. He then subjoins the reason, "Because you refused me nothing on earth, I will refuse nothing to you in heaven."[884] You refused me nothing when I lived on earth; it is just that I should refuse nothing to you now that you are with me in heaven.

In fine, there is no sinner, however abandoned, whom Mary cannot save by her intercession. "You have," says St George of Nicomedia, "insuperable strength, lest the multitude of our sins should overcome your clemency. Nothing resists your power; for the Creator regards your glory as his own"—Orat. De. Exit. B.V. O Mother of God, nothing can resist thy power, since thy Creator regards thy glory as his own."[885] "Nothing, then," says St Peter Damian, "is impossible to thee, who can raise even those who are in despair to a hope of salvation."[886]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

My dear Queen and Mother, Mary, I will address thee in the words of St Germanus: "Thou art omnipotent in saving sinners; thy prayers are all-powerful with God, because thou art the mother of true life."—Serm. iii. in Dom. B.V. Then, O my mistress if I have recourse to thee, all my sins cannot make me despair of salvation. Thou obtainest by thy prayers whatever thou wishest. If thou prayest for me I shall certainly be saved. I will then say to thee with St Bernard: Pray for me, who am so miserable, O great Mother of God, for thy Son hears thee, and grants whatsoever thou askest.[887] I am indeed a sinner; but I wish to amend my life, and I glory in being specially devoted to thee. I am, it is true, unworthy of thy protection; but I know that thou hast never abandoned any one who has placed his trust in thee. Thou art able and willing to save me, and I trust in thee. When I was in the state of perdition, and forgetful of thee, thou didst think of me, and didst obtain for me the grace to enter into myself. How much more ought I to trust in thy mercy now that I am dedicated to thy service, and that I recommend myself with confidence to thy prayers! O Mary! Pray for me, and obtain for me the grace to be a saint. Obtain for me holy perseverance; obtain for me a great love of thy Son, and of thee, O my amiable mother! I love thee, O my Queen! And hope to love thee always. Do thou also love me, and obtain from me the grace that I may be transformed from a sinner into a saint.

SECOND POINT

MERCY OF MARY

Let us consider, in the second place, that Mary is an advocate as merciful as she is powerful, and that she knows not how to refuse her protection to any soul that has recourse to her. The eyes of the Lord, says David are upon the just; and this mother of mercy, says Richard of St Laurence, keeps her eyes upon the just and upon sinners, that she may preserve them from falling into sin, or that, should they fall, she may arise them up.[888] St Bonaventure used to say that, in looking at Mary, he seemed to behold mercy itself.[889] Hence St Bernard exhorts us to recommend ourselves with great confidence in all our necessities to this powerful advocate, who is all sweetness and benignity to those who invoke her intercession.[890] Hence Mary is called an olive-tree. As a fair olive-tree in the plains.[891] As from the olive-tree nothing comes forth but oil, the symbol of mercy; so from the hands of Mary nothing flows but the graces and mercies which she dispenses to all who take shelter under her protection. Hence Denis the Carthusian has justly called her the "advocate of all sinners who have recourse to her."[892] O God! How great will be the remorse of the damned Christian in thinking that, during life, he could have saved his soul with so much facility by invoking the intercession of this mother of mercy; that he had not done so; and that there will be no more time to do it! The Blessed Virgin said one day to St Bridget: I am called, and I really am, the Mother of mercy; for such God has made me.[893] "I am called by all the Mother of mercy, and truly his mercy has made me merciful."—Rev. lib. i. cap. vi. And who, but God in his mercy, because he desires our salvation, has given us this advocate to defend us? "Therefore," adds Mary, "miserable will he be, who, while it is in his power, has not recourse to me, who am merciful."[894] Miserable is the man, and miserable for eternity, who, though he could, during life, have recommended himself to me, who am so benign and merciful to all, has neglected to have recourse to me, and is lost.

Perhaps, says St Bonaventure, we are afraid that in asking Mary's intercession she will refuse it to us? No, says the saint: "Mary does not refuse, and never has refused pity and aid to any sinner who has invoked her intercession."[895] She has not done so, and she cannot do so; because God has made her the queen and the mother of mercy; and as queen of mercy she is bound to attend to the care of the miserable. "Thou," says St Bernard, "art the queen of mercy; and who but the miserable are the subjects of mercy?"[896] Hence the saint through humility adds: Since then, O Mother of God! Thou art the queen of mercy, thou must have a special care of me, who am the most miserable of sinners.[897] As mother of mercy it is her duty to deliver from death her sick children, to whom her mercy makes her a mother. Hence, St Basil calls her a public hospital.[898] Public hospitals are erected for the poor; and they who are in the greatest poverty have the best claims to be admitted into them. Hence, according to St Basil, Mary ought to receive with the greatest tenderness and care the greatest sinners who have recourse to her.

But let us not doubt of the mercy of Mary. One day, St Bridget heard the Saviour saying to his mother: "Thou wouldst show compassion to the devil, should he ask it with humility."[899] The haughty Lucifer will never humble himself to ask her prayers; but if he humbled himself to this divine mother, and invoked her help, she, by her intercession would deliver him from hell. By those words, Jesus Christ wished to give us to understand what Mary herself afterward said to the same St Bridget—that when a sinner has recourse to her, however enormous his guilt may be, she regards not the sins with which he is charged, but the intention with which he comes. If he comes with a sincere desire to amend, she receives him and heals all his wounds.[900] Hence St Bonaventure says: "Poor sinners! do not despair; raise your eyes to Mary, and trust in the mercy of this good mother."[901] Let us then, says St Bernard, ask the grace we have lost, and let us ask it through Mary.[902] The grace which we have lost, she ahs found, says Richard of St Laurence;[903] we therefore ought to go to her in order to recover it. When the Archangel Gabriel announced to the Most Holy Virgin the divine maternity, he said to her: Fear not, Mary, thou hast found grace.[904] But, since Mary was never deprived of grace, but was, on the contrary, always full of grace, how could he say that she had found it! In answer to this question, Cardinal Hugo says, that Mary found grace, not for herself, because she had always possessed it, but for us, who have lost it. Hence the same author says, that we ought to go to her and say: O Lady, property ought to be restored to him who has lost it; the grace which thou hast found is not thine, for thou hast always possessed it; it is ours, we have lost it through our own fault; thou shouldst then restore it to us.[905] "Let sinners, then, who have lost grace by their sins, run—let them run to the Virgin, and say with confidence: Restore to us our property, which thou hast found."[906]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Behold, O great Mother of God! At thy feet a miserable sinner, who has not once, but several times, voluntarily lost the divine grace, which thy Son had purchased for him by his death. O mother of mercy! I come to thee with a soul covered with wounds and sores; be not angry with me on that account, but have the greater pity on me, and assist me. I do not ask of thee earthly goods; I ask thee to obtain for me the grace of God and the love of thy Son. My mother, pray for me and never cease to pray for me. It is through the merits of Jesus Christ and thy intercession that I am to be saved. Thy office is to intercede for sinners: I will then say, with St Thomas of Villanova: "O our advocate, fulfil thy office!" recommend me to God and defend me. No cause, however desperate, is lost, when defended by thee. Thou, after Jesus, art the hope of sinners; thou art my hope. O Mary! I will not cease to serve thee, to love thee, and to have recourse to thee always. Do not then ever cease to pray for me, particularly when thou seest me in danger of again losing the grace of God. O Mary, O great mother of God, have pity on me.

THIRD POINT

CHARITY OF MARY

Let us consider, in the third place, that Mary is so merciful an advocate that she not only assists all who have recourse to her, but also goes in search of the miserable, in order to defend and save them. Behold how she invites us all, and encourages us to hope for every good, if we have recourse to her. In me is all hope of life and virtue. Come over to me all.[907] In explaining this passage, the devout Pelbart says: "She invites all, the just and sinners."[908] The devil, according to St Peter, goes about continually seeking whom he may devour.[909] But this divine mother, says Bernard da Bustis, goes about seeking whom she may save.[910] Mary is called the mother of mercy; because like a mother, she cannot see her children in danger of being lost without giving them assistance. Mary pities all our miseries and constantly seeks our salvation. And, says St Germanus, who, after Jesus, has greater care of our salvation, than thou, O mother of mercy?[911] St Bonaventure says that Mary is so solicitous about the relief of the miserable, that she appears to desire nothing with greater ardour than to comfort them.[912]

She certainly assist us as often as we have recourse to her; no one has ever been rejected by her, says the Idiot.[913] But this, adds Richard of St Victor, is not enough for her; she anticipates our supplications, and obtains aid for us before we ask her prayers.[914] Moreover, the same author says, that Mary is so full of mercy, that, as soon as she sees misery, she instantly obtains relief, and cannot behold any one in distress without coming to his assistance.[915] It was thus she acted when she lived on this earth, as we learn from what happened at the marriage of Cana in Galilee; where, when, the wine failed, she did not wait to be asked, but taking pity on the affliction and shame of the spouses, asked her Son to console them, saying: They have no wine.[916] Thus she induced him to change, by miracle, water into wine. But, says St Bonaventure, if Mary's compassion for the afflicted was so great while she was in this world, her pity for us is certainly much greater now that she is in heaven, where she has a better knowledge of our miseries, and greater compassion for us.[917] Novarino adds: If Mary, unasked, shows such readiness to afford relief, how much more careful will she be to console those who ask her prayers![918]

Ah! Let us never cease to have recourse in all our necessities to the divine mother, who is always ready to obtain relief for all who pray to her. "You will find her ever ready to assist,"[919] says Richard of St Laurence. And Bernadine da Bustis adds that she desires more ardently to obtain graces for us, than we do to receive them.[920]Hence he says that, whenever we have recourse to her, we shall always find her hands full of graces and mercies.[921] According to St Bonaventure, Mary's desire for our welfare and salvation is so great that she feels offended not only with those who do her a positive injury; but also with those who neglect to ask favours from her.[922] And, on the other hand, the saint affirms that they who invoke Mary's intercession (that is, with a determination to amend their lives) are saved. Hence he calls her the salvation of those who invoke her.[923] Let us, then, always have recourse to the divine mother, and always says to her with the holy Doctor: "In thee, O Lady, have I hoped; may I not be confounded forever."[924] No, O Lady, O Mother of God, O Mary! I shall not be lost after having placed my hopes in thee after Jesus.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O Mary! Behold at thy feet a miserable slave of hell, who implores thy mercy. I, indeed, deserve no good; but thou art the mother of mercy, and mercy is exercised in favour of those who are unworthy of it. The whole world calls thee the refuge and the hope of sinners; then thou art my refuge and my hope. I am a lost sheep; but to save the lost sheep, the Eternal Word came down from heaven, and became thy Son; he wishes that I have recourse to thee, and that thou assist me by thy prayers. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, sinners. O great Mother of God, thou prayest for all; pray to thy Son also for me: tell him that I am thy client, and that thou art my protectress: tell him that in thee, after him, I have placed all my hopes: tell to him; tell him to grant me in his mercy holy perseverance: tell him to grant me the grace to love him with my whole heart. In fine, tell him to save me. He does whatsoever thou askest. O Mary, my hope! In thee I trust: have pity on me.

Consideration XXXIII

THE LOVE OF GOD

"Let us therefore love God, because God hath first loved us"—I. John, iv.19.

FIRST POINT

LOVE AND GOODNESS SHOWS BY GOD TO MAN

CONSIDER, in the first place, that God deserves your love, because he has loved you before you loved him, and because he has been the first of all to love you. I have loved thee with an everlasting love.[925] Your parents have been the first to love you on this earth; but they have loved you only after they have known you. Before your father or your mother came into this world, God loved you: even before the world was created, he loved you. And how long before the creation of the world did God love you? Perhaps a thousand years, or a thousand ages? It is useless to count years of ages; God has loved you from eternity. I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore have I drawn thee, taking pity on thee.[926] In a word, as long as he has been God, he has loved you; as long as he has loved himself, he has loved you. Hence the holy virgin St Agnes had reason to say: "I am prevented by another lover."[927] When the world and creatures sought her love, she answered: No, I cannot love you. My God has been the first to love me; it is but just, then, that I should consecrate all my love to him alone.

Thus, my brother, God has loved you from eternity and through pure love has taken you from among so many men whom he could create; he has given you existence, and has placed you in the world. For the love of you, God has created so many other beautiful creatures, that they might serve you and remind you of the love which he has borne to you and of the love which you owe to him. "Heaven and earth," says St Augustine, "tell me to love Thee."[928] When the saint looked at the sun, the moon, the stars, the mountains, the rivers, they appeared to him to speak, and say: "Augustine, love your God; for he has created us for you, that you might love him." The Abbot de Rancé, founder of La Trappe, when he saw a hill, a fountain or a flower, would say that all these creatures upbraided him with ingratitude to God. In holding a flower or a fruit in her hand, St Mary Magdalene de Pazzi felt her heart wounded as it were by a dart of divine love, and would say within herself: "Then, my God has from eternity though of creating this flower or fruit, that I might love him."

Consider, moreover, the special love God has shown to you in allowing you to be born in a Christian country, and in the bosom of the true Church. How many are born among idolaters, Jews, Mohammedans, or heretics, and are all lost! The number of those who have the happiness of being born in country where the true faith prevails is small, compared with the rest of mankind; and he has chosen you to be one of that small number. Oh, what an infinite gift is the gift of faith! How many millions are deprived of the sacraments, of sermon, of the examples of good companions and of all the other helps to salvation which are found in the true Church! And God is resolved to give all these great helps to you without any merit on your part, and even with a foreknowledge of your demerits; for when he thought of creating you, and bestowing these graces upon you, he foresaw the insults with you would offer to him.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O Sovereign Lord of heaven and earth, infinite good, infinite majesty! Who hast loved men so tenderly, how does it happen that Thou art so much despised by them? But among these me, Thou, O my God! Hast loved me in a particular manner, and hast bestowed on me special graces, which Thou hast not given to so many others. And I have despised Thee more than others. I prostrate myself at Thy feet: O Jesus, my Saviour! "cast me not away from The face."[929] I would deserve to be cast off on account of my frequent ingratitude to Thee. But Thou hast said that Thou wilt not reject a penitent soul that returns to Thee. Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.[930] My Jesus, I am sorry for having offended Thee. Hitherto I have not known Thee. I now acknowledge Thee for my Lord and Redeemer, who hast died in order to save me and to be loved by me. When, O my Jesus! shall I cease to be ungrateful to Thee? When shall I begin truly to love Thee with a true love? Behold, I this day resolved to love Thee with my whole heart, and to love nothing but Thee. O infinite Goodness! I adore Thee for all those who do not adore Thee, and I love Thee for all who do not love Thee. I believe in Thee, I hope in Thee, I love Thee, and offer my whole being to Thee. Assist me by Thy grace; Thou knowest my weakness. But if Thou didst bestow so many graces upon me I neither loved nor desired to love Thee, how much greater graces should I hope for from Thy mercy now that I love Thee and desire only to love Thee! My Lord, give me Thy love, but a fervent love which will make me forget all creatures: a strong love, which will make me conquer all difficulties in order to please Thee; a perpetual love, which will never be dissolved between me and Thee. I hope for all graces through Thy merits, O my Jesus! and I hope for them through thy intercession, O my mother, Mary.

SECOND POINT

GOD HAS GIVEN HIMSELF TO US

But God has not only given us so many beautiful creatures—he was not content until he even gave us himself. He loved us, and delivered himself up for us.[931] Accursed sin had robbed us of the divine grace, and made us the slaves of hell; but, to the astonishment of heaven and of all nature, the Son of God came one earth to become man in order to redeem us from eternal death, and to purchase for us the grace and the eternal glory which we had lost. How great would be our wonder if we saw a monarch become a worm for the love of worms! But our astonishment would be infinitely greater at the sight of a God made man for the love of men. He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, . . . and in habit found as man.[932] A God clothed in flesh! And the word was made flesh.[933] But the astonishment increase when we see all that this Son of God has done and suffered for the love of us. To redeem us it would have been sufficient for him to shed a single drop of his blood, or a single tear, or to offer a single prayer; for a prayer offered by a divine person would be of infinite value, and therefore sufficient for the salvation of the whole world, and of an infinite number of worlds. But, says St Chrysostom, what was sufficient for redemption was not sufficient for the immense love which this God bore to us.[934] He not only wished to save us, but, because he loved us ardently, he wished to be loved ardently by us; and therefore he resolved to lead a life full of sorrows and humiliations, and to suffer a death the most painful of all deaths, in order to make us understand the infinite love which he entertained for us. He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross.[935] O excess of divine love, which all men and all angels will never be able to comprehend! I say, excess; for Moses and Elias, speaking of the Passion of Jesus Christ, called it an excess.[936] St Bonaventure called the Passion of Christ an "excess of sorrow and of love."[937] If our Redeemer had not been God, but a friend or a relative, what greater proof of love could he have given, than to die for us? Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends.[938] If Jesus Christ had to save his own Father, he could not have done more for the love of him! If, my brother, you had been God and the creator of Jesus Christ, what more could he have done for you than sacrifice his life in the midst of a sea of torments and sorrows, for the love of you? If the most contemptible man on earth had done for you what Jesus Christ has done for you, could you live without loving him?

But what do you say? Do you believe in the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ? You believe these mysteries; and do you not love him? Or can you think of loving anything but Jesus Christ! He, says St Augustine, has come on earth to suffer and to die for you in order to make known to you the immense love which he bears you.[939] Before the Incarnation, man might doubt whether God loved him tenderly; but how, after the Incarnation and death of Jesus Christ, can he any longer doubt that God loves him with the most tender love? And what greater tenderness of affection could he show you, than to sacrifice his divine life for the love of you? Our ears are accustomed to hear of creation, of redemption, of a God in a manger, of a God on a cross. O holy faith, enlighten us!

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O my Jesus! I see that Thou couldst have done nothing more in order to compel me to love Thee; and I also see that by my ingratitude I have laboured to force Thee to abandon me. Blessed forever be Thy patience, which has borne with me so long. I would deserve a hell made on purpose for myself, but Thy death gives me confidence. Ah! make me understand well the claims which Thou, O infinite Good! hast to my love, and the obligations by which I am bound to love Thee. I knew, O my Jesus! that Thou didst die for me; how then, O God! Have I been able to live for so many years in forgetfulness of Thee? Oh that the past years of my life commenced again! I would wish, O my Lord! to give them all to Thee. But years do not return. Ah! grant that I may be least spend all the remaining days of my life in loving and pleasing Thee. My dear Redeemer! I love Thee with my whole heart; but increase this love within me. Remind me always of all that Thou hast done for me; and do not permit me to be any longer ungrateful to Thee. No; I will no longer resist the lights Thou hast given me. Thou didst wish to be loved by me and I desire to love Thee. And whom will I love, if I do not love a God of infinite beauty and infinite goodness? A God who has died for me? A God who has borne goodness? A God who has died for me? A God who has borne with me with so much patience and who, instead of chastising me as I deserved, has changed chastisements into graces and favours? Yes; I love Thee, O God! Worthy of infinite love and I sigh and seek to love wholly employed in loving Thee, and forgetful of everything but Thee. O infinite charity of my Lord! Assist a soul that ardently desires to be entirely Thine O great mother of God, Mary, do thou too assist me by thy intercession; beg of Jesus to make me belong entirely to him.

THIRD POINT

LOVE THAT JESUS CHRIST HAS SHOWN IN HIS PASSION

Our astonishment increase when we consider the ardour with which Jesus Christ desired to suffer and die for the love of us. I have a baptism, says Jesus Christ, wherewith I am to be baptised; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished.[940] I am to be baptised with the baptism of my own blood: and I feel myself dying through a desire that my Passion and death may soon come, that thus man may soon know the love which I bear to him. It was this desire that made him say on the night before his Passion: With desire have I desired to eat this pasch with you before I suffer. [941] Then, says St Basil of Seleucia, it appears that our God cannot be satisfied with loving men.[942]

Ah, my Jesus! men do not love Thee because they do not think of the love which Thou hast had for them. O God! how is it possible for a soul to live without loving God, if it considers that he died for its sake, and that he died with so great a desire of showing his love for it? The charity of Christ presseth us.[943] St Paul says that it is not so much what Jesus Christ has done and suffered for our salvation, as the love which he has displayed in suffering for us that obliges, and as it were, forces us to love him. Contemplating the love which Jesus Christ exhibits in his Passion, St Laurence Justinian exclaimed: "We behold the All-wise infatuated through excess of love."[944] We have seen a God as it were foolish, through the excess of his love for us. And who could ever believe, had not faith assured us of it, that the Creator would die for his own creatures? In an ecstasy, St Mary Magdalen de Pazzi, carrying a crucifix in heads, exclaimed: "Yes, my Jesus, Thou art foolish through love." This the Gentiles also said when they heard the apostles preaching the death of Jesus Christ; they, as St Paul attests, regarded it as a folly which could not be believed. We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness.[945] And how, said they, could a God that is most happy in himself, and stands not in need of any one, descend on earth, to become man, and die for the love of men, who are his creatures? This would be the same as to believe that a God had become foolish for the sake of men. But, it is of faith that Jesus Christ, the true Son of God, has delivered himself to death for the love of us. Christ hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.[946]

And why has he done so? He has done so that we might no longer live to the world, but only to that Lord who has died for us. Christ died for all, that they also who live may not live to themselves, but unto Him who died for them.[947] He has done it that, by the love which he has shown us, he might win all the affections of our hearts. For to this end Christ died and rose again, that He might be the Lord both of the dead and of the living.[948] Hence the saints contemplating the death of Jesus Christ, thought it very little to give their life and all things for the love of so loving a God. How many noblemen, how many princes, have left relatives, riches, country, and even kingdoms, to shut themselves up in a cloister, in order to live only to the love of Jesus Christ! How many martyrs have sacrificed their life! How many tender virgins, renouncing the nuptials of the great, have gone with joy to death, in order thus to make some return for the affection of a God who had died for their sake! And, my brother, what have you hitherto done for the sake of Jesus Christ? As he has died for the saints—for St Laurence, for St Lucy, for St Agnes, so he has also died for you. What do you intend to do during the remaining days of life, which God gives you that you may love him? From this day forward, look frequently at the crucifix, and, in looking at it, call to mind the love which Jesus Christ has borne you, and say within yourself: Thou hast then, my God, died for me? Do this at least, I say, and do it often; if you do, you cannot but feel yourself sweetly constrained to love a God who has loved you so tenderly.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my dear Redeemer! it is true that I have not loved Thee because I have not reflected on the love which Thou hast borne me! Ah, my Jesus! I have been very ungrateful to Thee! Thou hast given Thy life for me by submitting to the most painful of all deaths; and have I been so ungrateful as not even to think of Thy sufferings? Pardon me; I promise, O my crucified Love! that from this day forward Thou shalt be the only object of my thoughts and of all my affections! Ah! when the devil or the world presents me a forbidden apple, remind me, O my beloved Saviour! of the pains which Thou hast endured for my sake, that I may love Thee, and may never more offend Thee! Ah! if one of my servants had done for me what Thou hast done, I could not bring myself to despise him. And I have dared to turn my back so often on Thee, who hast died for me. O beautiful flames, which have obliged a God to give his life for me, inflame, fill my whole heart, and destroy all affections to create things. Ah, my beloved Redeemer! how is it possible for me to contemplate Thee, either in the manger, in Bethlehem, on the cross on Calvary, or in the sacrament on our altars, and not be enamoured of Thee? My Jesus! I love Thee with my whole soul. During the remaining years of my life Thou shalt be my only good, my only love. I have unhappily lived long enough forgetful of Thy Passion and of Thy love. I give Thee all things, and if I do not give myself to Thee as I ought, take me and reign in my whole heart. Thy kingdom come. May my heart be the servant only of Thy love. May I speak of nothing else, may I treat of nothing else, may I think of nothing else, may I sigh and desire only to love and please Thee. Assist me by Thy grace, that I may be faithful to Thee. In thy merits I trust, O my Jesus! O mother of fair love! make me ardently love thy Son, who is so amiable and who has loved me so tenderly.

Consideration XXXIV

HOLY COMMUNION

"Take ye, and eat: this is my body."—Matt. xxvi. 26.

FIRST POINT

THE EUCHARIST IS A PRECIOUS GIFT

LET us consider the great gift which Jesus Christ has bestowed on us in the institution of the Most Holy Sacrament; the great love he has shown to us in this gift; and his great desire that we should receive this gift. Let us, in the first place, consider the great gift which Jesus Christ has bestowed upon us in giving us himself entirely for our food in the Holy Communion. St Augustine says that Jesus Christ, though an omnipotent God, has nothing more to give us.[949] And what greater treasure, adds St Bernardine of Sienna, can a soul receive or desire, than the sacred body of Jesus Christ?[950] The prophet Isaias exclaims: Make His works known among the people.[951] O men! Proclaim aloud the loving inventions of our good God. And if our Redeemer had not bestowed this gift upon us, who among us could have asked it? Who could have dared to say to him: Lord, if Thou wishes to make us understand Thy love, remain under the species of bread, and permit us to make Thee our food? Even to think of it would be considered folly. "Does it not," says St Augustine, "appear foolishness to say, eat my flesh—drink my blood?"[952] When Jesus Christ made known to his disciples this great gift of the Most Holy Sacrament which he wished to leave us, they could not bring themselves to believe it; and, therefore, they departed from him, saying: How can this man give us his flesh to eat?. . . . This saying is hard, and who can hear it?[953] But, what men could never imagine, the great love of Jesus Christ has invented and executed.

St Bernardine says that the Lord has left us this sacrament as a memorial of the love he has shown us in his Passion.[954] And this accords with what Jesus Christ himself has said: Do this for a commemoration of Me.[955] The love of our Saviour, adds St Bernardine, was not content with sacrificing his life for our salvation: before his death this love constrained him to bequeath to us the greatest gift which he had ever bestowed upon us, by giving us himself for our food.[956] The Abbot Guerric says that, in this sacrament, Jesus made the last effort of love.[957] This was better expressed by the Council of Trent, which declared that, in the Eucharist, Jesus poured out all the riches of his love for men.[958]

How great, says St Francis de Sales, the tenderness of love which a prince would shoe to a beggar by sending him a part of what he had on his own plate! How much greater would it be if he sent him the entire of his own dinner! But what would it be, if he sent him, for his food, a part of his own arm! In Holy Communions, Jesus gives us not only a portion of his own dinner, not only a part, but the entire of his body. Take ye, and eat: this is My body.[959] And with his body he gives us his soul and his divinity. In a word, St Chrysostom says that, in giving you himself in Holy Communion, he gives you all that he has, and reserves nothing for himself.[960] And the angelic Doctor says that, "in the Eucharist, God has given us all the he is and has."[961] Behold! exclaims St Bonaventure, that God whom the world cannot contain makes himself our prisoner in the Most Holy Sacrament.[962] And since the Lord gives himself entirely to us in the Eucharist, how can we fear that he will refuse us any grace which we ask of him? How, says St Paul, hath He not also, with Him, given us all things.[963]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O my Jesus! what has induced Thee to give Thyself entirely to us for our food? After this gift, what more remains for Thee to give us in order to oblige us to love Thee? Ah, Lord! give us light, make us understand the excess of Thy love in becoming food in order to unite Thyself to poor sinners! But, if Thou givest Thyself entirely to us, it is just that we too give our whole being to Thee. O my Redeemer! how have I been able to offend Thee, who hast loved me so tenderly, and who hast done so much to gain my love? Thou hast become man for my sake, Thou hast died for me, Thou hast become my food; tell me, what more couldst Thou have done? I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! I love Thee, O infinite Love! Lord, come often to my soul; inflame my whole heart with Thy holy love; grant that I may forget all things in order to think only of Thee, and to love nothing but Thee. Most Holy Mary, pray for me, and by thy intercession, make me worthy to receive thy Son frequently in the Holy Sacrament.

SECOND POINT

THE EUCHARIST IS A GIFT OF LOVE

Let us consider, in the second place, the great love which Jesus Christ has shown us in giving us himself in the Holy Eucharist. The Most Holy Sacrament is a gift which has proceeded from pure love. For our salvation it was necessary, according to the decree of God, that the Redeemer should die, and, by the sacrifice of his life, satisfy the divine justice for our sins; but what necessity was there that Jesus Christ, after having died for our redemption, should leave himself to us for our food? But this his love wished to do. He, says St Laurence Justinian, instituted the Eucharist for no other purpose than to show his great charity, for no other purpose than to make us understand the immense love which he bears us.[964] This is precisely what St John has written: Jesus, knowing that His hour was come that He should pass out of this world to the Father: having loved His own, He loved them to the end.[965] Knowing that the time of his departure from this earth had arrived, he wished to give us the greatest proof of his love, by bequeathing to us this gift of the Most Holy Sacrament. This is the precise meaning of the words, He loved them to the end; that is, according to Theophilactus and St Chrysostom, "he loved them with an extreme love."[966]

And mark what the apostle has observed—that the time at which Jesus Christ wished to bequeath this gift was the time of his death. The Lord Jesus, the same night on which He was betrayed, took bread, and, giving thanks, broke and said, "Take ye, and eat: this is My Body."[967] At the very time that men prepared for him scourges, thorns and a cross to crucify him, the loving Saviour wished to leave us this the last proof of his love. And why at death, and not before that time, did he institute this sacrament? Because, says St Bernardine, the marks of love given by friends at death make a greater impression on the memory, and are preserved with greater affection.[968] Jesus Christ, says the saint, had already given himself to us in many ways: he had given himself to us for a companion, a master, a father; for our light and our victim. The last degree of love remained; and this was, to give himself to us for our food in order to untie himself entirely to us, as food is united with him who eats it.[969] This he has done by giving himself to us in the Most Holy Sacrament. Thus, our Redeemer was not content with uniting himself only to our human nature: he wished by this sacrament to find a means of also uniting himself to each of us in particular.

St Francis de Sales says "that in no other action can the Saviour be considered more tender or more loving than in the institution of the Holy Eucharist; in which he, as it were, annihilates himself, and becomes food, in order to penetrate our souls, and to unite himself to the hearts of his faithful servants." Thus, says St Chrysostom, with that Lord on whom the angels dare not fix their eyes we are united, and are made one holy and one flesh.[970] What shepherd, adds the saint, has ever fed his sheep with his own blood? Even mothers intrust their children to the care of nurses. But Jesus, in the sacrament, nourishes us with his own blood, and unites us to himself.[971] And why become our food? Because, says the saint, he loved us ardently, and by making himself our food, he wished to unite himself entirely to us, and to make himself one thing with us.[972] Then Jesus Christ wished to perform the greatest of his miracles (He hath made a remembrance of His wonderful works; He hath given food to them that fear Him[973]) in order to satisfy his desire of remaining with us, and of uniting in one, our heart and his own most holy heart. "O wonderful is Thy love, O Lord Jesus!" exclaims St Laurence Justinian, "who wished to incorporate us in such a manner with Thyself, that we should have one heart and one soul inseparably united to Thee."[974]

That great servant of God, Fr De la Colombière, used to say: If anything could shake my faith in the mystery of the Eucharist, I would not doubt of the power, but rather of the love, which God displays in this sacrament. If you ask me how bread becomes the body of Jesus—how Jesus is found in many places, I answer that God can do all things. But if you ask me how it is that God loves men so as to make himself their food, I can only say that I do not understand it, and that the love of Jesus cannot be comprehended. But, O Lord! to reduce Thyself to the condition of food, appears to be an excess of love not suited to Thy majesty. But St Bernard's answer is, that love makes lovers forget their own dignity.[975] St Chrysostom also answers that love seeks not what is convenient when there is question of making itself known to the beloved; it goes not where it ought, but where it is carried by the ardour of its desire.[976] Justly, then, has the angelic Doctor called this sacrament "a sacrament of love—a pledge of love."[977] And St Bernard calls it love of loves. St Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to call Holy Thursday, the day on which this sacrament was instituted, the day of love.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O infinite love of Jesus, worthy of infinite love? Ah! My Jesus, when shall I love Thee as Thou hast loved me? Thou couldst do nothing more to make me love Thee; and I have forsaken Thee, O infinite Good! for the sake of vile and miserable goods! Ah! enlighten me, O my God! Discover to me always more and more the greatness of Thy goodness that my whole soul may be enamoured of Thee, and that I may labour to please Thee. I love Thee, O my Jesus! my love, my all; and I wish to unite myself frequently to Thee in this sacrament, in order to detach myself from all things, and to love Thee alone, who art my life. Through the merits of Thy Passion, assist me, O my Redeemer! O Mother of Jesus and my Mother, do thou, too, assist me, beg of him to inflame my whole heart with his holy love.

THIRD POINT

HOW MUCH JESUS CHRIST DESIRES TO UNITE HIMSELF TO US

Let us, in the third place, consider the great ardour with which Jesus Christ desires that we should receive him in Holy Communion. Jesus knowing that His hour was come.[978] But how could Jesus call the night on which his bitter Passion should commence, His hour? He calls it His hour, because on that night he was to institute this divine sacrament in order to unite himself entirely to his beloved souls. This desire made him say: With desire I have desired to eat this pasch with you.[979] Words by which the Redeemer wished to show us the great ardour with which he desired to unite himself to each of us in this sacrament. With desire I have desired. Word which, according to St Laurence Justinian, proceeded from his immense love for us. This is the language of the most burning love.[980] The Redeemer wished to give himself to us under the appearance of bread, that all might be able to receive him. Had he given himself to us under the appearance of costly food, the poor would not be able to receive him, and had he instituted the Holy Sacrament under the appearance of any other cheap food, this perhaps would not be found in all parts of the world. Jesus wished to leave himself under the species of bread, because it costs but little, and is found in every country; so that all persons in all places may find him and receive him.

Through his great desire that we should receive him, the Redeemer not only presses us to receive him by so many invitations: Come, eat My bread and drink the wine which I have mingled for you.[981] Eat, O friends and drink and be inebriated, My dearly beloved,[982] but he also commands us to receive him. Take ye and eat: this is My body.[983] Moreover, he endeavours to allure us to the holy table by promises to eternal life. He that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood, hath life everlasting. He that eateth this bread shall live forever.[984] He also threatens to exclude from paradise all who neglect to receive him in the holy sacrament. Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, you shall not have life in you.[985] These invitations, promises, and threats all proceed from the ardent desire of Jesus Christ to unite himself to us in this sacrament. And this desire springs from the great love which he bears us; for, as St Francis de Sales says, the end of love is nothing else than to be united with the object of love. And because in this sacrament Jesus unites himself entirely to the soul—He that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood, abideth in Me and I in him.[986] Therefore he desires so ardently that we should receive him. Our Lord said one day to St Mechtilde: "The bee does not cast itself on the flower from which it sucks the honey, with as much ardour as I come to the soul that desires to receive them."

Oh! If the faithful understood the great blessing which Holy Communion brings to the soul! Jesus is the Lord of all riches; for his Father has made him master of all things. Knowing that the Father had given Him all things into His hands.[987] Hence, when Jesus Christ comes to a soul in Holy Communion, he brings with him immense treasures of graces. Now all good things, says Solomon speaking of the eternal wisdom, came to me together with her.[988]

St Denis says that the Most Holy Sacrament has the greatest efficacy in sanctifying the soul.[989] And St Vincent Ferrer asserts that the soul derives greater profit from one Communion, than from fasting for week on bread and water. The Communion, as the Council of Trent teaches, is that great remedy which delivers us from venial, and preserves us from mortal sins.[990] Hence St Ignatius, martyr, has called the Most Holy Sacrament the medicine of immortality.[991] Innocent III has said that, by his Passion, Jesus Christ has delivered us from the punishment of sin; but, by the Eucharist, he preserves us from the commission of sin.[992]

Moreover, this sacrament kindles the fire of divine love. He brought me into the cellar of wine; he set in order charity in me. Stay me up with flowers, compass me about with apples; because I languish with love.[993] St Gregory of Nyssa says that Holy Communion is this cellar of wine, in which the soul is so inebriated with divine love, that she forgets the earth and all creatures; it is thus the soul languishes with holy charity. The Venerable Far Francis Olimpio, of the Order of Theatines, used to say that there is nothing that so powerfully inflames the soul with divine love, as Holy Communion. God is love and a fire of love. God is charity.[994] My God is a consuming fire. And this fire of love the Eternal Word came to light upon the earth. I am come to cast fire on the earth; and what will I but hat if be kindled?[995] Oh! what burning flames of holy love does Jesus kindle in the souls who receive him in this sacrament with a desire of being inflamed with his love. St Catherine of Sienna saw, one day, in the hands of a priest, Jesus, in the Holy Sacrament, like a furnace of love; and wondered that the hearts of all men were not set on fire and reduced to ashes by the flames which issued from the Holy Eucharist. St Rose of Lima used to say that, in receiving Jesus Christ, she felt that as if she received the sun. Hence she sent forth from her countenance rays which dazzled the sight, and the heat emitted from her mouth after Communion was so intense, that the person who reached her a drink felt her hand scorched as if she approached a furnace. In visiting the Most Holy Sacrament, St Wenceslaus, king and martyr, was inflamed, even externally, with such a degree of heat that the servant who accompanied him, when obliged to walk on the snow, trod in the footsteps of the saint, and thus felt no cold. "The Eucharist," says St Chrysostom, "is a fire which inflames us, that, like lions breathing fire, we may retire from the altar being made terrible to the devil."[996] The Holy Sacrament is a fire which inflames the soul to such a degree that we ought to depart from the altar breathing such flames of love that the devil will no longer dare to tempt us.

But some will say: I do not communicate often because I am cold in divine love. But, says Gerson, he who acts in this manner is like the man who refuses to approach the fire because he feels cold. The greater, then, our tepidity, the more frequently we ought to receive the Most Holy Sacrament, provided we have a desire to love God. "If," says St Francis de Sales (in his Devout Life, chap. xxi), "you are asked why you communicate so frequently, say that two sorts of persons ought to communicate often—the perfect and the imperfect: the perfect to preserve perfection, and the imperfection to acquire perfection." St Bonaventure says: "Though you feel tepid, approach, trusting in the mercy of God. The more a person feels sick, the more he stands in need of a physician."[997] And Jesus Christ says to St Mechtilde: "When you are to communicate, desire to have all the love which any soul has ever had for me, and I will accept your love in proportion to the ardour with which you wish for it.[998]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O enamoured of souls, O my Jesus! It is not in Thy power to give us proofs of love in order to show us that Thou lovest us. And what more couldst Thou invent to induce us to love Thee? Ah! Grant O infinite Goodness! That I may love Thee tenderly and with all my strength! And who is there that has greater claims on the affections of my heart, than Thou, my Redeemer, who, after having given Thy life for my salvation, hast given me Thyself entirely in this sacrament? Ah! Lord, that I always remembered Thy love in order to forget all things and to love Thee alone without interruption and without reserve! I love Thee, O my Jesus above all things and I wish to love Thee alone. Banish from my heart, I entreat Thee, all affections which are not for Thee. I thank thee for giving me time to love Thee and to weep over the offences I have offered to Thee. My Jesus, I desire that Thou mayest be the only object of my affections. Assist e, save me, and let my salvation consist in loving Thee with my whole heart, and in loving Thee always in this life and in the next. Mary, my Mother, obtain for me the grace to love Jesus Christ; pray to him for me.

DWELLING OF JESUS ON OUR ALTARS

"Come to me all ye that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you."—Matt. xi. 28.

FIRST POINT

JESUS MAKES HIMSELF ACCESSIBLE TO EVERY ONE

HAVING to depart from this world after he had complete d the work of redemption, our loving Saviour did not wish to leave us alone in this valley of tears. "No tongue," says St Peter of Alcantara, "can express the greatness of the love which Jesus Christ bears to our souls. Hence that his absence from us might not be an occasion of forgetting him, this spouse, before his departure from this world, left, as a memorial of his love, this Most Holy Sacrament, in which he himself has remained. He did not wish that between him and his servants there should be any other pledge than himself, to keep alive the remembrance of him." This effort of love on the part of Jesus Christ merits great love from us; and according to the revelation said to have been made to his servant, Sr Margaret Mary Alacoque, he wished that in these latter times a festival should be instituted in honour of his Most Sacred Heart, in order that, by our devotions and affections, we might make some return for his loving dwelling on our altars, and thus compensate the insults which he has received in this sacrament of love, and which he receives every day from heretics and bad Catholics.

Jesus has left himself in the Most Holy Sacrament, first, that all may be able to find him; secondly, to give audience to all; thirdly, to give his graces to all. He, is the first place, remains on so many altars, that all who wish may be able to find him. On the night on which the Redeemer took leave of his disciples to go to his death, they shed tears of sorrow at the thought of being separated from their dear Master; but Jesus consoled them, saying (and the same he then said also to us): My children, I am going to die for you, in order to show you the love which I bear you. But at my death I will not leave you alone; as long as you are on earth, I will remain with you in the Most Holy Sacrament. I leave you my body, my soul, my divinity: I leave myself entirely to you. As long as you remain on earth, I will not depart from you. Behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world.[999] The Saviour, says St Peter of Alcantara, did not wish to leave his spouse alone at such a distance, and therefore he has left this sacrament, in which he himself, the best of all companions, has remained with her. The Gentiles have invented so many gods; but they could never imagine a god more loving than our God, who remains nigh to us, and assist us with so much love. Neither is there any other nation so great, that hath God so nigh them, as our God is present to all our petitions.[1000] The holy Church applies this passage of Deuteronomy to the festival of the Most Holy Sacrament.—Resp. ii. Noct. iii.

Behold, then, Jesus Christ remains in our tabernacles as if confined in so many prisons of love. His priests remove him from the tabernacle to expose him on the altar, or to give Communion, and afterward put him back to be again shut up; and Jesus is content to remain there day and night. But why, my Redeemer, dost thou remain in so many churches, even during the night, when the faithful lock the doors, and leave Thee alone? It would be enough for Thee to remain during the day. No, he wished to remain also during the night, though left alone, that, in the morning, all who seek may instantly find him. The sacred spouse went in search of her beloved, saying to everyone she met: Have you seen him whom my soul loveth?[1001] And, not finding him, she raised her voice and exclaimed: My spouse, tell me where thou art. Show me. . . . Where thou feedest, where thou liest in the mid-day.[1002] The spouse did not find him, because then the Most Holy Sacrament was not instituted; but, at present, if a soul wishes to find Jesus Christ, it has only to go to a church in which the Holy Eucharist is preserved, and there it will find its beloved expecting it. There is not a town nor a convent in which the Holy Sacrament is not kept; and in all these places the King of Heaven is content to remain shut up in a case of wood or of stone, often almost without a lamp bringing before him, and without any one to keep him company. But, "O Lord!" says St Bernard, "this is not suited to Thy Majesty." "No matter," Jesus replies; if it becomes not my Majesty, it well becomes my love."

What tender devotion do pilgrims feel in visiting the holy house of Loretto—the Holy Land—the stable at Bethlehem—the hill of Calvary—or the holy sepulchre, in which Jesus Christ was born, or lived, or died, or was buried! But how much greater tenderness should we feel in a church, in presence of Jesus himself in the Blessed Sacrament? The venerable Fr John D'Avila used to say that he knew no sanctuary capable of inspiring greater devotion or consolation than a church in which Jesus remains in the Holy Eucharist. Fr Balthazar Alvarez would weep in seeing the palaces of princes filled with countries, and the churches, in which Jesus Christ dwells, solitary and abandoned. O God! if the Lord remained only in one church—for example, in St Peter's in Rome—and only on one day in the year, oh! how many pilgrims, how many nobles, how many princes would endeavours to have the happiness of being there on that day, to pay court and homage to the King of Heaven descended again upon the earth! Oh, what a splendid tabernacle of gold, adorned with gems, would be prepared for the occasion! Oh, with what an abundance of lights would the dwelling of Jesus Christ on the earth be celebrated on that day! But, says the Redeemer, I do not wish to remain only in a single church, or but for a single day; nor require either such church, or but for a single day: nor require with such riches, or such a profusion of lights. I wish to remain continually every day, and in all places in which my servants are found; that all may easily find me at all times and at any hour they wish.

Ah! If Jesus Christ had not invented this excess of love, who could have ever thought of it? Should a Christian after the ascension of the Redeemer into heaven, say to him, Lord, if Thou wishest to show us Thy affection, remain with us on our altars under the appearance of bread, that we may be able to find Thee whenever we wish: would not such a demand be regarded as the extreme of temerity? But, what no man could ever even imagine, our Saviour has invented and accomplished. But, alas! Where is our gratitude for so great a favour? If a prince came from a distance to a village for the purpose of being visited by a peasant, how great would be the ingratitude of the peasant if he refused to visit his sovereign or if he paid him only a passing visit?

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O Jesus, my Redeemer, O love of my soul! How much has it cost Thee to remain with us in the sacrament? To be able to remain on our altars. Thou hadst first to suffer death; afterward, in order to aid us by Thy presence, Thou hadst to submit to so many grievous insults in this sacrament. And, after all this we are so slothful and negligent in visiting Thee, though we know that Thou so ardently desirest our visits for the purpose of enriching us with Thy graces when Thou seest us in Thy presence, Lord, pardon me; for I too have been one of these ungrateful souls. From this day forward, O my Jesus! I wish to visit Thee often, and to remain as long as I can in Thy presence, to thank Thee, to love Thee, and to ask Thy graces; for it is for this purpose that Thou remainest on earth shut up in our tabernacles, and made our prisoner of love. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! I love Thee, O God of love! I love Thee, O sovereign Good! amiable above every good. Grant that I may forget myself and all things, in order to remember only Thy love and to spend the remainder of my life wholly occupied in pleasing Thee. Grant that from this day forward I may relish no pleasure more than that of remaining at Thy feet. Inflame my whole soul with Thy holy love. Mary, my mother, obtain for me a great love for the Most Holy Sacrament: and whenever Thou seest that I am negligent, remind me of the promise I now make of going every day to visit the Holy Sacrament.

SECOND POINT

JESUS GIVES AUDIENCE TO ALL AT ALL TIMES

In the second place, Jesus Christ, in the Blessed Sacrament, gives audience to all. St Teresa used to say that all cannot speak with the sovereign. The poor can scarcely hope to address him, and make known to him their necessities, even through a third person. But to speak to the King of Heaven, the intervention of a third person is not necessary: all, the poor as well as the nobles of the earth, may speak to him face to face in the Holy Sacrament. Hence Jesus is called the flower of the fields. I am the flower of the field and the lily of the valleys.[1003] The flowers of gardens are inclosed and reserved; but the flowers of the fields are exposed to all. "I am the flower of the field," says Cardinal Hugo, in his comment on this passage, "because I exhibit myself to be found by all. With Jesus then, in the Holy Sacrament, all may speak every hour in the day. Speaking of the birth of the Redeemer in the stable of Bethlehem, St Peter Chrysologus says that princes do not always give audience; that when a person goes to address the king, the guards send him away, saying that the hour or day for giving audience is not yet arrived, and telling him to come at another time. But the Redeemer wished to be born in an open cave, without a door and without guards, in order to give audience to all, at all doors: there is not attendant to say, "It is not the hour."[1004] The same happens in the Holy Sacrament. The churches are always open: all can go to converse with the King of Heaven whenever they wish. Jesus desires that we speak to him with unbounded confidence: it is for this purpose that he remains under the species of bread. If Jesus appeared on our altars, as he will on the day of judgement, on a throne of glory, who among would dare to approach him? But, says St Teresa because the Lord desires that we speak to him and ask his graces with confidence and without fear, he has therefore clothed his majesty with the appearance of bread. He desires, as Thomas à Kempis says, that we converse with him as one friend does with another.[1005]

When a soul remains at the foot of the altar, Jesus appears to address it in the words of the Canticles: Arise, make haste, my love, my beautiful one, and come.[1006] Arise, arise, O my soul, and fear not. Make haste, approach to me. My love, you are no longer my enemy; for you love me, and you repent of having offended me. My beautiful one, you are no longer deformed in my eyes: my grace has made you beautiful. And come, tell me what you want: I remain here on purpose to hear your prayers. What joy should you feel, dear reader, if a king called you into his cabinet and said to you: what do you wish for? What do you stand in need of? I love you, and I desire to promote your welfare. This, Jesus Christ, the King of Heaven, says to all who visit him: Come to me, all you that labour and are burthened, and I will refresh you.[1007] Come, all you that are poor, infirm, or afflicted; I am able and willing to enrich you, to heal you, to console you. For this purpose I remain on your altars. Thou shalt call and he shall say: here I am.[1008]

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Since then, my beloved Jesus, thou remainest on our altars to hear the supplications of the miserable who, have recourse to Thee, hear the prayer which I, a miserable sinner, present to Thee. O Lamb of God! sacrificed and lifeless on the cross. I am a soul redeemed by Thy blood; pardon me all the offences I have offered to Thee, and assist me by Thy grace, that I may never lose Thee again. Impart to me, O my Jesus! a portion of the sorrow which Thou didst feel in the garden of Gethsemane for my sins. O my God! That I have never offended Thee! My dear Lord, had I died in sin, I could never more love Thee; but thou hast waited for me that I might love Thee. I thank Thee for the time which Thou givest me; and since I can now love Thee, I wish to love Thee. Give me the grace of Thy holy love, but of a love which will make me forget all things, to think only of pleasing Thy most loving heart. Ah, my Jesus! Thou hast spent Thy whole life for me; grant that I may spent at least the remainder of my life for Thee. Draw me entirely to Thy love; make me all Thine before I die. I hope for all graces through the merits of Thy Passion. I also hope in thy intercession, O Mary! Thou knowest that I love thee; have pity on me.

THIRD POINT

JESUS ONLY WISHES TO BESTOW HIS GRACES

Jesus, in the Holy Sacrament, gives audience to all in order to bestow his graces to all. St Augustine says that the Lord has a greater desire of communicating his graces to us than we have of receiving them.[1009] The reason is, that God is infinite goodness and goodness is naturally diffusive; therefore, it desires to impart its goods to all. God complains when souls do not come to ask his graces. Am I, he says, become a wilderness to Israel, or a lateward springing land? Why, then have my people said, We are revolted; we will come to thee no more? [1010] Why, says the Lord, will you come to me no more? Have you, when you asked my graces, found me like a barren or lateward springing land? St John saw the Lord with his breast full of milk—that is, of mercy—and girded with a band of gold—that is, with the love with which he desires to dispense his graces to us. I saw one like the Son of man. . . . girt about the paps with a golden girdle.[1011] Jesus Christ is always ready to bestow his favours upon us; but the disciple says that, in the Holy Sacrament, he dispenses his graces in greater abundance. And, according to Blessed Henry Suso, it is in the Holy Eucharist that Jesus most willing hears our prayers.

As a mother whose breast are full of milk goes in search of infants to give them suck in order to be relieved of the burden, so our Lord from this sacrament of love cries out, and says to all: You shall be carried at the breasts. . . . As one whom the mother caresses, so will I comfort you. [1012] Fr Balthassar saw Jesus in the Most Holy Sacrament, having his hands full of graces, to dispense them to men, but found no one to ask them.

Oh! happy the soul that remains at the foot of the altar to ask graces of Jesus Christ! The Countess of Feria, afterward a religious of the Order of St Clare, remained as long as she could before the Blessed Sacrament, and was therefore called the spouse of the sacrament. She continually received treasures of graces at the foot of the altar. Being asked one day how she was employed during so many hours before the tabernacle, she answered: "I would remain there for all eternity. I am asked what I do before the Blessed Sacrament. And what do I not do? What does a beggar do in the presence of a rich man? What does a sick man do before his physician? What do I do? I thank my Saviour, I love him, I ask his graces." Oh! how precious these last words are to make us draw fruit from our visits to the Holy Sacrament!

Jesus Christ complained to the servant of God, Sr Margaret Mary Alacoque, of the ingratitude of men to him in this sacrament of love. To make her understand the love with which he dwells on our altars, he showed her his heart in a throne of flames, surrounded with thorns and surmounted by a cross, and said to her: "Behold that heart, which has loved men so tenderly, which has reserved nothing, and which has been even consumed to show its love for them. But, in return, the greater part of them treats me with ingratitude by their irreverence and by their contempt of my love in this sacrament. And what is most painful to me is, that they are hearts consecrated to me" Christians do not visit Jesus Christ because they do not love him. They spent entire hours in the society of friends; and they feel tediousness in conversing half an hour with Jesus Christ. Some will say: Why does not Jesus Christ give me his love? I answer: If you do not banish the world from your heart, how can divine love enter it? Ah! If you could say with sincerity, what St Philip Neri said at the sight of the Holy Sacrament—Behold my love! Behold my love!—you should not feel tediousness in spending hours and entire days before the Blessed Sacrament.

To souls enamoured of God, hours spent before Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament appear moments. St Francis Xavier laboured the whole day for the salvation of souls; and what was his repose at night? It consisted in remaining before the Holy Sacrament. St John Francis Regis, that great missionary of France, after having spent the entire day in preaching and hearing confessions, went at night to the church. And having some times found it shut, he remained outside the door, exposed to the cold and wind, to pay homage, at least at a distance, to his beloved Lord. St Aloysius Gonzaga wished to remain always before the Holy Sacrament: but was forbidden to do sp by his Superiors. In passing by the altar, he felt himself drawn by Jesus to remain, but was compelled by obedience to depart. Hence he would lovingly say to his Saviour: "Withdrew from me, O Lord! withdrew."[1013] Lord, do not draw me; allow me to depart; obedience obliges me to go away. If, my brother, you do not feel this love for Jesus, endeavour at least to visit him every day: he will certainly inflame your heart. Do you feel cold? Approach the fire, says St Catherine of Sienna. Ah! Happy you, if Jesus, by his grace, inflame you with his love. Then you will certainly no longer love; on the contrary, you will despise all the goods of this world. "When," says St Francis de Sales, "a house is on fire, all that is within is thrown out through the windows."

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my Jesus! make Thyself known, make Thyself loved. Thou art so amiable, Thou canst do nothing more to induce men to love Thee; how then does it happen that so few among them love Thee? Alas! I have been among these ungrateful wretches. I have been sufficiently grateful to creatures, who have bestowed no gift or favour upon me. To Thee only, who hast given me Thyself, have I been ungrateful, so as often to offend Thee grievously, and insult Thee by my sins. But I see that, instead of abandoning me, Thou continuest to seek after me, and to ask my love. I feel that Thou continuest to propose to me this loving precept—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy god with thy whole heart." Since, then Thou didst wish to be loved even by me after my ingratitude, I desire to love Thee. Thou wishest for my love and at present through Thy grace, I desire only to love Thee. I love Thee, my love, my all. Through the blood which Thou hast shed for me, help me to love Thee. My beloved Redeemer! I place all my hopes in this blood and also in the intercession of Thy most holy Mother, whom Thou wishest to assist me by her prayers in the work of my salvation. O Mary, my Mother! Pray to Jesus for me. Thou inflamest all thy lovers with the divine love; I love thee ardently; procure it also for me.

Consideration XXXVI

THE CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

"And life in his good will."—Ps. xxix. 6.

FIRST POINT

EXCELLENCE OF THIS VIRTUE

ALL our salvation and perfection consists in loving God. He that loveth not, abideth in death. Charity, which is the bond of perfection.[1014] But the perfection of love consists in conformity to the divine will; for, as St Denis the Areopagite says, to the principal effect of love is, to unite the will of lovers, so that they may have but one heart and one will. Hence our actions, our works of penance our Communions and alms-deeds, please God only inasmuch as they are conformable to the divine will; for if they are not conformable to the will of God, they are not good works, but are defective, and deserving of chastisement.

Our Saviour came down from heaven principally to teach us by example to conform ourselves to the will of God. Behold what he said, as the apostle writes, at his entrance into this world. Sacrifice and oblation Thou wouldst not; but a body Thou hast fitted to me . . . Then, said I, behold I come. . . . that I should do Thy will, O my God.[1015] Thou, O my Father! Hast refused the victims offered by men; Thou wishes that, by my death, I should sacrifice this body which Thou hast given me; behold me ready to do Thy will. This he frequently declared, saying that he came on earth only to do the will of his Father. I came down from heaven, not to do My will, but the will of Him that sent Me.[1016] And by going to die through obedience to the will of his Father, he wished to make known to us his great love for his Father. That the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father hath given Me commandment, so do I. Arise; let us go hence.[1017] Hence he has said that he acknowledges for his disciples only those who fulfil the divine will. Whosoever shall do the will of My Father that is in heaven, he is my brother and sister, and mother. [1018] The accomplishment of the divine will has been the only object and desire of the saints in all their works. Blessed Henry Suso used to say: "I would rather be the vilest worm one earth in conformity to the will of God, than be a seraph with my own will." St Teresa says: "All that he who practises prayers should seek is, to conform his will to the divine will; and let him be assured," adds the saint, "that in this consists the highest perfection. He who practises it best, will receive the greatest gifts from God, and will make the greatest progress in spiritual life." The blessed in heaven love God perfectly, because they are in all things conformed to the divine will. Hence Jesus Christ has taught us to do the will of God on earth as the saints do it in heaven. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.[1019] He who does the will of God, will, as David says, become a man according to God's own heart. I have found a man according to My own heart, who shall do all My wills.[1020] And why? Because David was always prepared to do whatever God wished. My heart is ready, O my God, my heart is ready.[1021] He asked nothing else from the Lord, than to teach him to do his will.

Oh! how great is the value of an act of perfect resignation to the will of God: it is sufficient to make a saint! While St Paul was persecuting the Church, Jesus appeared to him, enlightened, and converted him. Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[1022] And behold, Jesus Christ instantly declared him a vessel of election, and apostle of the Gentiles. This man is to Me a vessel of election to carry My name before the Gentiles.[1023] He who fasts, gives alms or mortifies himself for God's sake, gives a part of himself to God; but the man who gives his will to God, gives himself entirely to him. All that God asks of us is, our heart—that is, our will. My son, give Me thy heart. In a word, the accomplishment of the divine will must be the object of all our desires, of our devotions, meditations, Communions, etc. The object of all our prayers must be to obtain from God the grace to do his will. And for this purpose we must implore the intercession of our holy advocates, and particularly of the Blessed Virgin Mary, that they may procure for us light and strength to conform ourselves to the will of God in all things, but particularly in embracing what is opposed to self-love. The venerable John Avila used to say: "A single 'Blessed be God' in adversity is better than six thousand acts of thanksgiving in prosperity.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my God! All my past ruin has arisen from a want of conformity to Thy will. O God of my soul! I detest and curse a thousand times the days and moments in which I have, in order to do my own will, contradicted Thy holy will. I now give my whole will to Thee. Accept it, O my Lord! and bind it so firmly to Thy love, that it may never more be able to rebel against Thee. I love Thee, O infinite Goodness! And through the love which I bear Thee, I offer myself entirely to Thee. Dispose of me and of all I possess, as Thou pleasest; I resign myself entirely to Thy holy will. Preserve me from the misfortune of doing anything against Thy holy will, and then treat me as Thou wishest. Eternal Father, hear me for the love of Jesus Christ. My Jesus, hear me through the merits of Thy Passion. Most Holy Mary, assist me; obtain for me the grace to fulfil the divine will, in the accomplishment of which my salvation entirely consists: obtain this grace for me and I ask nothing more.

SECOND POINT

IN WHAT WE SHOULD CONFORM TO GOD'S WILL

It is necessary to conform ourselves to the will of God, not only in crosses and adversity which come directly from God, such as infirmities, desolation of spirit, loss of property or relatives; but also in those which come indirectly from him.—that is, through men—such as defamation, contempt, injuries, and all other persecutions. And let us remember that when others injure us in our property or honour, God does not will their sin, but he wills our poverty and our humiliations. It is certain that whatsoever happens take place by the divine will. I am the Lord: I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil.[1024] And Ecclesiasticus says: Good things and evil, life and death, poverty and riches, are from God.[1025] In a word, all things, blessings as well as misfortunes, come from God.

The crosses that happen to us are called evils, because we call them so, and because we make them evils; if we accepted them as we ought, with resignation, from the hands of God, they should prove to us, not evils, but blessings. The jewels which give the greatest splendour to the crown of the saints are the tribulations which they have borne for God, as coming from his hands. What did holy Job say when he was told that the Sabeans had taken away his property? The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. [1026] He did not say: The Lord gave me these goods, and the Sabeans have taken them away; but the Lord has given them, and the Lord has taken them away. And therefore he blessed the Lord, knowing that all had happened by his will. And as it hath pleased the Lord, so it is done; blessed be the name of the Lord.[1027] When the holy martyrs Epictetus and Athone were tormented with iron hooks and burning torches, they only said: "Lord, Thy will be done in us." And their dying words were: "O eternal God, be blessed for giving us the grace to accomplish in ourselves Thy holy will." Cesarius relates (lib. x. cap. Vi) that a certain monk wrought many miracles, though his life was not more austere than that of the other monks. Being astonished at his miracles, the abbot asked him one day what devotions he practised. In answer he said that he was more imperfect than his companions, but that he was always careful to conform himself in all things to the divine will. "And," said the Superior, "did you feel no displeasure at the injury which an enemy did to our farm some days ago?" "No, Father," replied the monk; "I on the contrary, thanked the Lord because I know that he does and permits all things for our welfare." From this, the abbot perceived the sanctity of this good religious.

We ought to do the same when any cross of adversity happens to us. Let us accept them all from the divine hands, not only with patience, but also with joy, in imitation of the apostles, who rejoiced when they were maltreated for the sake of Jesus Christ. They went from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus. [1028] And what greater happiness than to bear crosses, and to know that, in embracing them, we please God? If we wish to enjoy continual peace, let us endeavour, from this day forward, to embrace the divine will, always saying in all that happens to us: Yea, Father, for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight. [1029] Lord, this has pleased Thee, let it be done. To this end we ought to direct all our meditations, Communions, visits and prayers, always imploring the Lord to make us conform to hi will. And let us always offer ourselves to him, saying: "Behold me, O my God! Do with me what thou pleasest." St Teresa offered herself to God at least fifty times in the day, that he might dispose of her as he wished.

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

Ah, my divine King, my beloved Redeemer! come and reign henceforth in my soul with undivided sway. Take my whole will, that is may desire and wish nothing but what Thou wishest. My Jesus, I have hitherto offended Thee so grievously by resisting Thy holy will. This gives me greater pain than if I had suffered every other evil. I repent of it, and am sorry for it with my whole heart. I deserve chastisement; I do not refuse it; I accept it. Preserve me only from the chastisement of being deprived of Thy love, my dear Redeemer; I love Thee, my God, and because I love Thee, I wish to do whatever Thou wishes. O will of God! Thou art my love. O blood of my Jesus, Thou art my hope. In Thee I hope to be, from this day forward, always united to the divine will. It shall be my guide, my desire, my love and my peace. In it I wish to live and repose. In peace in the self-same I will sleep and I will rest.[1030] I shall always say, in whatever shall befall me; My God, this Thou hast willed, thus I will; my God, I wish only that Thou wishest, may Thy will be always accomplished in me. Thy will be done. My Jesus, through Thy merits, grant me the grace always to repeat this beautiful dictate of love: Thy will be done! Thy will be done! O Mary, happy thou, who didst always fulfil, in all things, the divine will. Obtain for me the grace that henceforth I, too, may always fulfil it. My queen, through thy great love for Jesus Christ, obtain for me this grace. Through thy prayers I hope for it.

THIRD POINT

HAPPINESS DERIVED FROM CONFORMITY TO GOD'S WILL

He who is united with the divine will, enjoys, even in this life, a perpetual peace. Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad.[1031] Yes, for a man cannot enjoy greater happiness than that which arises from the accomplishment of all his wishes. He who wills only what God wills, possesses all that he desires; for whatever happens to him, happens by the will of God. If, says, Salvian, the soul that is resigned be humbled, it desires humiliations, if it is poor, it delights in poverty; in a word, it wishes whatever happens ,and thus leads a happy life.[1032] Let cold, heat, wind or rain come and he that is united with the will of God says: I wish for this cold, this heat, this wind, and this rain, because God wills them. If loss of property, persecution, or sickness befall him he says: I wish to be miserable, to be persecuted, to be sick, because such is the will of God. He who reposes in the divine will, and is resigned to whatever the Lord does, is like a man who stands above the clouds, and without injury or perturbation, beholds the tempest raging below. This is the peace which, according to the Apostle, surpasseth all understanding,[1033] which exceeds all the delights of the world; a perpetual peace, subject to no vicissitudes. A fool is changed like the moon. . . . A holy man continueth in wisdom like the sun.[1034] Fools—that is, sinners—are changed like the moon, which increases today, grows less and on to-morrow. To-day they are seen to laugh, and to-morrow to weep; today all joy and meekness, tomorrow, all sadness and fury, in a word, they change with prosperity and adversity. But the just man is like the sun, always the same, and uniformly tranquil in whatever happens; for his peace consists in conforming himself to the divine will. And on earth peace to man of goodwill.[1035] At the bare mention of the will of God, St Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to feel much consolation that she would fall into an ecstasy of love. When the will is united with the will of God, crosses may produce some pain in the inferior part, but in the superior part peace will always reign. Your joy no man shall take from you.[1036] But how great the folly of those who oppose the will of God! What God wills will certainly happen; for who resisteth his will?[1037] They, therefore, must bear the cross, but without fruit and without peace. Who hath resisted him, and hath had peace?[1038]

And what else but our welfare does God will? This is the will of your God, your sanctification.[1039] He wishes to see us saints, that we may be content in this life, and happy in the next. Let us remember that the crosses which come to us from God work together unto good.[1040] Even chastisements are inflicted on us in this life, not for ruin, but that we may amend, and again eternal beatitude. Let us believe that these scourges of the Lord. . . . have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction.[1041] God loves us so ardently, that he not only desires, but is solicitous for, the salvation of each of us. The Lord is careful for me.[1042] And what will he deny us after having given us his Son? He that spared not even His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how hath He not also with Him given us all things.[1043] Let us then always abandon ourselves into the hands of that God who is always solicitous for our welfare as long as we remain in this world. Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you.[1044] Think of me, said our Lord to St Catharine of Sienna, and I will always think of you. Let us often say with the spouse of the Canticles: My beloved to me, and I to him.[1045] My beloved thinks of my welfare, and I will think only of pleasing him, and of uniting myself to his holy will. We ought, says the holy Abbot Nilus, to pray, not that God would do what we wish, but that we may do what he wills.

He who always acts in this manner will lead a happy life, and will die a happy death. He who dies with entire resignation to the divine will, gives to others a moral certainty of his salvation. But he who is not united with the divine will during life, will not be united with it at death, and will not be saved. Let us, then, endeavour to make ourselves familiar with some sayings of the Scripture, by which we shall always keep ourselves united with the will of God. Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[1046] Lord, tell me what Thou wishest me to do; I am ready and willing to do it. Behold the handmaid of the Lord.[1047] Behold! My soul is Thy servant; command, and Thou shalt be obeyed. I am Thine; save me.[1048] Save me, O Lord! and then do what Thou pleasest with me; save Thine, I am no longer mine. When any serious cross or adversity happens to us, let us say: Yes, Father, for so it hath seemed good in Thy sight.[1049] My God, this has pleased Thee; let it be done. Above all, let the third petition of the Lord's prayer be dear to us: Thy will be done earth as it is in heaven. Let us say it often, with fervour and let us repeat it several times. Happy we, if we live and die saying: Thy will be done! Thy will be done!

AFFECTIONS AND PRAYERS

O Jesus, my Redeemer! Thou hast sacrificed Thy life on the cross in order to become the cause of my salvation; have mercy on me, then, and save me; do not permit a soul that Thou hast redeemed by so many pains, and with so much love, to hate Thee for eternity in hell. Thou canst do nothing more to oblige me to love Thee. This Thou gavest me to understand, when, before Thou didst expire on Calvary, Thou didst utter these loving words: It is consummated. But how have I repaid Thy love? For the past, I can truly say that I have done all I could to displease Thee, and to oblige Thee to hate me. I thank thee for having borne me with so much patience, and for now giving me time to repair my ingratitude, and to love Thee before I die. Yes, I wish to love Thee, and I wish to love Thee ardently, my Saviour, my God, my love, and my all; I wish to do whatever is pleasing to Thee; I give Thee my whole will, my whole liberty, and all that I possess. From this hour I sacrifice my life to Thee, accepting the death which Thou wilt send me, along with all the pains and circumstances that will accompany it. From this moment I unite this sacrifice of mine to the great sacrifice of Thy life, which Thou, my Jesus, didst offer for me on the cross. I wish to die in order to do Thy will. Ah! Through the merits of Thy Passion, give me gave to be, during life, resigned to the arrangements of Thy Providence. And when death comes, grant that I may embrace with an entire conformity, Thy holy will. I wish to die, O my Jesus! in order to please Thee. I wish to die saying: Thy will be done. Mary, my Mother, it was thus thou didst die: ah! Obtain for me the grace that I too, may die in this manner.

Live, Jesus, our love, and Mary, our hope.

HYMN

The Soul Enamoured of the Beauty of God

Let those who will for other beauties pine,
God, God alone my love shall ever be;
My God, my life! O loveliness divine!
Whom can I wish to love, and love not Thee?
Where could I find a nobler, lovelier heart,
A heart more worthy object of my love?
Such loveliness, that but to see a part
Can ravish with delight the saints above.
Ah! foolish souls, that throw away your hearts
On love of beauties earthly, false, and vain!
Ah! see you not that all true peace departs,
And leaves within but emptiness and pain?
Love God, love Him, the beauty infinite,—Love God alone, who loveth you so much;
Ah, happy you, if loving Him aright
You know the secret way His heart to touch.
Ye who love God! souls beautiful and chaste!
Do I not speak the truth? Bear witness, say
What peace, what joy He gives your hearts to taste
While yet poor exiles here on earth you stay.
Thrice happy now! Ah! then what will you say
When once you reach in Heaven the home of bliss?
What, when you see unveiled in cloudless day
Your God, the God of beauty, as He is?
Alas! could I but live my life again,
In loving Him should be my sole content:
At least, whate'er of life may yet remain
Shall all in loving God alone be spent.
Shall it not be, O loveliness divine?
Then if Thou will it so, give me Thy love;
I seek in vain to give Thee love of mine,
Unless Thy hand first help me from above.
But more Thou lovest me than I love Thee,
I seek Thy love, but more Thou seekest mine;
Then Thou belongest even now to me,
And I shall all and evermore be Thine.

Maxims of Eternity

Or Meditations for Every Day in the Week[1050]

MEDITATION FOR SUNDAY

THE END OF MAN

I

Consider, O my soul! that the being which you enjoy was given to you by God: he created you to his own image, without any merit on your part; he adopted you for his child by baptism; he loved you more than the most affectionate parent could have loved you; he has made you all you are, that you might know him, love him, and serve him in this life, and thereby arrive at the eternal possession of him in heaven. Hence you did not come into this world for the sake of enjoyment, to grow rich and powerful, to eat, drink, and sleep like irrational animals, but solely to love your God and to work out your eternal salvation. And is this the object that I have hitherto had in view? Oh! how unfortunate have I been, in having thought of everything else rather than of my last end. O God! I beg of Thee, in the name and for the love of Jesus, to grant that I may begin a new life of perfect holiness and conformity to Thy divine will.

II

Consider what deep remorse and bitter regret you will feel at the hour of death, if, during life, you have not devoted yourself to the service of God. How great will be your disappointment when, at the close of your days, you will perceive that nothing remains at that sorrowful moment of all your goods, of all your pleasures, and of all your earthly glory, but a shadow that flies before you, and a bitter remembrance which pursues you! What will be your consternation when you will discover that, for the sake of miserable vanities, you have lost your God, your soul, and your salvation, without the possibility of being able to repair your misfortune? O despair!

O cruel torment! you will then see the value of the time that you are losing; but it will be too late. Gladly would you then purchase time at the price of all you have; but you will not be able to do so. Oh! how full of bitterness and sorrow will that day be for every soul that has not loved and served the Lord!

III

Consider the general disregard of men for their last end. Their ordinary thoughts are upon the accumulation of wealth, the gratification of their senses, parties of pleasure, amusement, and festivity. They think nothing of God or of his service; they do nothing for the salvation of their souls: they regard the affair of salvation as a trifle not worthy of notice. Thus, O deplorable misfortune! the greater part of Christians, by indulging in foolish pleasures and criminal gratifications, precipitate themselves into hell. O man! you take much pains to damn yourself, and will you do nothing for your salvation? Listen to the dying sentiments of a Secretary of State of one of the kings of England: “How great,” said he, “is my misfortune: I have used many sheets of paper in writing letters for my sovereign, and, alas! I have not used one to help me in the recollection of my sins, that I might make a good confession!” Listen to the death-bed sentiments of a king of Spain: “Oh that I had spent my life in a desert, occupied in serving God, and had never been a king!” But to what do these sighs and lamentations then serve, but to augment the horrors of despair? Learn, then, this day, at the expense of others, to devote yourself to the salvation of your soul: remember well that all your actions, all your words, and all your thoughts, that are not directed to God, are entirely lost. Oh! it is time then to amend your life. Do not wait, therefore, to be convinced of this till you arrive at the gates of eternity, and the jaws of hell: it will be then too late. O my God! pardon me all the errors of my life: I love Thee above all things. I am sorry, from the bottom of my heart, for all my sins. O Mary! my hope, intercede with Jesus in my behalf.

MEDITATION FOR MONDAY

I

Consider, O man! how important it is to you to save your soul. Your dearest interests are there concerned, because, if you attain salvation, you will be eternally happy in the enjoyment of every good both of soul and body; but, in losing it, you lose your soul and body; heaven and God: you will be eternally miserable, eternally damned. Your only important, your only necessary affair, therefore, is to serve your God and to save your soul. Do not, then, O Christian! think of serving your passions now, and of giving yourself to God hereafter. Oh, how many has this false and deceitful hope precipitated into hell! Thousands of sinners have flattered themselves with the hope of future repentance; but the day in which they hoped never arrived, and they are now suffering without resource the torments of the damned. And who amongst them all ever thought of falling into that place of woe? Which of them had not the intention of saving his soul? But God curses him that sins in the hope of pardon.[1051] You say perhaps, within yourself, I will commit this sin and then repent: but are you sure that time will be allowed you for repentance? You may die the moment you have sinned. By sinning you lose the grace of God; and what if you never more recover it? God shows mercy to those who fear him, but not to those who contemn and despise him.[1052] Think not, therefore, that it will cost you no more to repent of and confess three sins than to repent of and confess one sin. No: in this thought you are deceived; God might pardon you a first or a second sin, but not a third. He has patience with the sinner for a time, but not forever.[1053] When the measure of iniquity is filled up, his mercy ceases, and he punishes the impenitent sinner either by death, or by abandoning him to a reprobate sense, in which state he goes on from sin to sin without remorse, and at length is precipitated into hell. O Christian! attend seriously to this. It is time you should put an end to your disorders and return to God; you should fear lest this will be the last warning that he will ever send you. You have offended him long enough, and he has borne with you long enough in your sins: tremble, then, lest he should forsake you after the next mortal sin. Oh! how many souls has this striking thought of eternity caused to retire from the disorders and dangers of the world, to live in cloisters, solitudes, and deserts! Unfortunate sinner that I have been! what is the fruit of all my crimes?—a conscience gnawed with despair, a troubled heart a soul overwhelmed with grief, hell deserved, and God lost! Ah! my God, my heavenly Father! Bind me to Thy love.

II

Consider, O man! that this affair of eternity is above all others the most neglected. Mankind has time to think of everything but God and salvation. If a man of the world is advised to frequent the sacraments, or to spend a quarter of an hour daily in meditation, he will immediately say: I have a family to provide for, I have my business to attend to, Ihave sufficient to keep me employed. Good God! and have you not a soul to save? Will your riches and your family be able to assist you at the hour of your death, or deliver you from hell if you are condemned? No, no: flatter not yourself that you are able to reconcile God and the world, heaven and sin together. Salvation is not to be attained by a life of indolence and ease. It is necessary to use violence and to make great efforts in order to obtain the crown of immortality. How many Christians have flattered themselves with the idea of serving God and saving their souls hereafter who are at this moment, and will forever be, in the flames of hell! How great is the folly of men in attending to what will so shortly terminate, and thinking so little of that state which will never end! Ah, Christian! put your affairs in order; reflect that your all is at stake; remember that in a very short time your body will be deposited in the earth, and your soul will go to dwell in the house of eternity. How dreadful, then, will be your misfortune if you are condemned to an eternity of woe! Reflect well on this; for then you can have no remedy.

III

Consider and say within yourself: I have a soul, and if I lose it all is lost; I have a soul, and if in losing it I were to gain the whole world, what would it profit me? I have a soul, but if I lose it, although I were to arrive at the highest pinnacle of glory, of what advantage will it be to me? If I hoard up riches, if I get forward in the world, but in the end lose my soul, what will be my consolation? Where are now the dignities, pleasures and vanities of those great ones of the world whose bodies are moldering in the dust and whose souls are a prey to the flames of hell? Since, then, I have a soul, and only one, to save, and if I lose it once it is lost forever, I ought to endevour to save it. This is an affair of the highest importance to me, eternal happiness and eternal misery are at stake. O my God! I am forced to acknowledge with shame and confusion that I have hitherto blindly wandered astray from Thee: I have scarcely ever thought seriously of saving my soul. O my Father! save me, through Jesus Christ. I am willing to part with everything here, provided I do not lose Thee. O Mary, my surest hope! save me by thy powerful intercession.

MEDITATION FOR TUESDAY

MORTAL SIN

I

Consider, O my soul! that having been created to love God, you have rebelled against him, and thereby been guilty of the basest ingratitude. You have treated him like an enemy; you have despised his grace and friendship. You were aware how much sin offends him, and still you have committed it. Yes, you have turned your back on God; you have insulted him; you have in a manner raised your hand to strike him; you have saddened his Holy Spirit. The man who sins says to God, if not in words, at least in effect: Begone from me: I will not serve Thee, I will not acknowledge Thee for my God: the God whom I adore is this pleasure, this interest, this revenge. Such has been the language of your heart every time that you have preferred any creature to God. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi could not conceive how a Christian could knowingly commit a mortal sin. O you who are reading these lines, what are your sentiments? how many mortal sins have you committed? O my God! pardon me, have mercy on me: I detest all my sins; I love Thee, and grieve sincerely for the insults that I have offered to Thee, who are deserving of infinite love.

II

Consider that God thus spoke to your heart at the moment you were offending him: My son, I am your God, who created you and redeemed you with the price of my blood. I forbid you, then, to commit that sin under pain of incurring my eternal displeasure. But in yielding to the temptation you have replied: Lord, I will not obey Thee; I am resolved to gratify my passions; I value not Thy friendship. Thou hast said, I will not serve.[1054] Ah! my God: and this I have done many, perhaps thousands of times. How couldst Thou bear with my insults? Why did I not die rather than live to offend Thee? But, O infinite goodness! I will do so no more; henceforth I will love Thee with all my heart. Give me perseverance; give me Thy holy love.

III

Consider, O my soul! that, when sins reach a certain number, they cause God to abandon the sinner. The Lord patiently expecteth that when the day of judgment shall come, he may punish them in the fullness of sins.[1055] If, therefore, you are again tempted to return to your sins, say no more within yourself, I will commit this one, and will then repent. For what if the Lord should instantly strike you dead? or what if he should forsake you forever? What has been the fate of thousands who have thus lost the grace of God? They flattered themselves with the hope of pardon; but death surprised them, and hell enveloped them in its flames. Tremble, then, lest your fate be the same. Those who abuse the goodness of God in order to offend him are undeserving of his mercy. After the multitude of crimes that he has pardoned you, you have too much reason to fear that, if you relapse into mortal sin, he will pardon you no more. Thank him, then, a thousand times for having borne patiently with you until now, and form the resolution rather to die than to offend him anymore. Say frequently to him: My God! I have already offended Thee enough: the remainder of my life shall be spent in loving Thee and in bewailing my past ingratitude. O my Jesus! I wish to love Thee; grant me the grace to do so. O Blessed Virgin, my Mother! assist me by thy prayers. Amen.

MEDITATION FOR WEDNESDAY

DEATH

I

Consider that this life must soon terminate. The sentence is already passed: You must die. Death is certain, but the moment of it is uncertain: we know not when it will come. But to how many casualties and accidents is human life constantly exposed? The bleeding of an artery, a stroke of apoplexy, the bite of a venomous animal, an inundation, an earthquake, a thunderbolt, and numberless other causes that we can neither foresee nor prevent, may deprive you instantly of life. Death may surprise you when you least expect it. How many have gone to bed at night in apparent good health, and in the morning have been found dead? And may not the same happen to you? Numberless others, who have, been visited by sudden death, never expected to die in that manner; and, if they were then found in mortal sin, what is now their fate, and what will it be through all eternity? But, at all events, it is certain that either the night will come, when you will no more see the day, or the day will come, when you will no more see the night. "I shall come," says Jesus Christ, "like a thief in the night, when I am the least expected."—Matt. xxiv. 44 Your good master warns you of this beforehand, because he wishes your salvation. O sinner! correspond, then, With this mercy, profit by this admonition, hold yourself always in readiness for death. When that moment comes there will be no time for preparation. Consider well that you must certainly die. The scene of this world must soon terminate for you, though you know not when. Who can tell whether it will be within a year, within a month, within a week, or even whether you will be alive tomorrow? O my Jesus! give me light, and pardon me.

II

Consider that, at the hour of your death, you will be extended on a bed, with your relatives and friends weeping over you, a priest to assist you, a lighted taper by your side, within one step of the terrible passage into eternity. Your head will be oppressed with pain, your eyes will become dim, your tongue parched with heat, your blood cooling in your veins, and your heart in agony: you will see the world passing from before you. No sooner will your soul become separated from your body than you will be stripped of all things, and cast into the earth to rot. There you will become the food of worms, which will gnaw and devour your flesh, and in a short time nothing will remain of your body but a few withered bones and a little dust. Open a grave, and take a view of the state of that rich and avaricious man! of that vain woman! Ah! such is the termination of human life; such is the end of mortal man, and such will soon be yours. But penetrate with the eyes of faith into the other world, and see the condition in which your soul will be placed. It will instantly be surrounded by the monsters of hell, representing before you all the sins that you have committed from your very childhood. At present the devil hides from you the malice of your crimes: he persuades you that there is little evil in this act of vanity, this indulgence, this resentment, this dangerous company;—but in death he will display before your eyes the enormity of your sins, to make you despair. Then you will discover in the light of God himself the evil which you have committed in offending his infinite goodness. Ah! hasten then, whilst time remains, to make reparation for what is past: at the hour of death it will be too late.

III

Consider that death is a moment on which eternity depends. Take the view of a man who is on the point of expiring, and reflect that he is just going to enter into one, or other of the two eternities; his fate is pending but for a moment: when that is expired, he is either saved or condemned forever. O this last breath! O this moment on which depends an eternity!—an eternity either of torment or of glory; an eternity either always happy or always miserable; an eternity either of all that is good or of all that is evil; an eternity either of heaven or of hell. If you are then saved, you will be secure from all evils, and at the summit of happiness and content; if you are condemned, you will live in punishment and despair as long as God will be God. In death you will understand the meaning of heaven, hell, sin, an offended God, the contempt of divine laws, sins concealed in confession, ill-gotten goods unrestored, injuries not pardoned. "Unhappy me!" will the dying man say, "in a few moments I must appear in the presence of God. What will my sentence be? Whither shall I go? To heaven or to hell? Shall I be happy with the saints or burn with the damned? Shall I be a child of God or a slave of the devil? Alas! but a minute more and I shall know; and the destiny which I shall then receive will last for all eternity." Then will you detest a thousand times the day on which you had the misfortune to sin. But it will be too late; your sorrow will be fruitless, because it will proceed from the fear and not from the love of God. Ah, my God! from this hour I will turn to Thee: I will not delay my repentance until death. I now love Thee, I embrace Thee, and I wish to die in Thy embraces. O Mary! my true Mother, let me die under thy protection: help me at that critical and decisive moment.

MEDITATION FOR THURSDAY

JUDGMENT

I

Consider that the soul will no sooner have departed from the body than it will appear before the tribunal of God to be judged. This judge is the Almighty, whose wrath is provoked by your sins. Your accuser will be your mortal enemy, the devil; the matter of your trial will be your sins; your sentence will be without appeal; and if found guilty, your punishment will be hell. You will not have the power of calling your parents, friends, and companions to your aid: all must be concluded between God and your soul. You will then see the deformity of your crimes, and will not be able, as at present, to excuse them. You will be examined upon all your sins of thought, of words, of actions, of omissions, of scandal; you will be weighed in the terrible scales of divine justice, and, if found wanting in a single point, you are lost. My Jesus and my Judge, pardon me before Thou dost judge me.

II

Consider that, at the end of the world, our bodies will rise again to participate in the reward or punishment of the soul according to our works, when all the nations of the earth will be assembled in the valley of Josaphat to be judged. If you are condemned, you will resume your body as an eternal prison for your unfortunate soul. At this sorrowful reunion the soul will curse the body and the body the soul, so that, although at present they mutually consent to pursue unlawful pleasures, after death, they will become each other's tormentor. On the other hand, if you are saved, your body will arise beautiful, impassible, and glorious, and thus, both in body and soul, you will be judged worthy of eternal happiness. Thus will close the scene of this world: thus will terminate all the greatness, all the pleasures, and all the pomps of the earth. Yes, all will be at an end; nothing will remain but two eternities, one of glory, the other of pain; one of joy, the other of torments: the just will dwell in heaven, the wicked in hell. Woe, then, to him that has loved the world! woe to him that for the vain and fleeting pleasures of the earth has lost his soul, his body, heaven, and God!

III

Consider the eternal sentence which Jesus Christ will pass upon the reprobate and the elect. This sovereign Judge turning towards the reprobate, will say: "Behold, ye ungrateful wretches, the event of your crimes! My hour is come—the hour of truth, of justice, of vengeance, and of wrath. Criminal souls, you have chosen my curse; let it fall upon you: be ye cursed for all eternity. Depart from me, despoiled of every good and laden with all evil into eternal fire."[1056] Then turning towards the elect Jess will thus address them: "Come, ye blessed children of my heavenly Father, come and take possession of the kingdom of heaven which is prepared for you. Come, no longer to carry your cross after me, but to wear a crown. Come to inherit my riches, and to be the companions of my glory. Come from the land of exile to your true country; come from sufferings to glory, from tears to joy." O my Jesus! I hope to be one of those whom Thou wilt then bless. I love Thee above all things. Bless me at this moment. O my Mother Mary, do thou also bless me.

MEDITATION FOR FRIDAY

HELL

I

Consider that hell is a dreadful prison filled with fire. In this fire the reprobate are enveloped, having an abyss of fire above them, and around them and below them, in their eyes, their mouths, and throughout every part of their frame. There each sense suffers a torment peculiar to itself. The eyes are tormented with darkness and smoke, and at the same time by the sight of devils and damned souls; the ears hear nothing but continual howlings, lamentations and blasphemies; the smell is tormented by the stench of half-putrefied bodies; the taste by a burning thirst and cruel hunger, without the possibility of being alleviated by a drop of water or a morsel of bread. Hence proceed from those miserable captives, tears, groans, lamentations, howlings and despair; but all in vain: they will never obtain the smallest consolation under their torments, or the least mitigation of their pains. O hell, hell! shall we wait until we are buried in your flames to believe you and to fear you? And yet this is the conduct of thoughtless and unrepenting sinners. O you who are reading this, what is your state? Were you to die this moment, whither would you go? Ah! you could not endure the pain of a spark of fire falling upon your hand, and have you the assurance to expose yourself to the hazard of burning in a pool of fire, in desolation and despair for all eternity?

II

Consider the punishments that will be inflicted in hell on all the powers of the soul. The memory will be forever tormented with the recollection of sin, and with remorse of conscience; this gnawing worm will continually remind you that you have damned yourself for some miserable pleasure or interest. O God! what will the soul think of past pleasures, after hundreds, thousands, and millions of years spent in hell? This gnawing worm will call to its recollection the time which God had given it for repentance, the means of salvation wherewith he had furnished it, the good example which he had set before it, and the resolutions which it had formed, but would never execute. The soul will, moreover, see that its present state is irremediable. O God, O God! how terrible is hell. The will, also, will be eternally contradicted; it will never obtain what it wishes, and will always meet with what it would gladly avoid. The understanding will discover the greatness of the good which it has lost in losing heaven and God. O God! O God! pardon me, for the love of Jesus Christ.

III

Sinner, you, who at present make small account of losing God, will discover your misfortune, when you will see the elect triumph and exult with joy on their entrance into heaven, and yourself banished, like an unclean animal, from that blessed country, deprived forever of seeing the face of an infinitely amiable God, and separated from the company of Mary, of the angels and saints. Then, in fury and despair, you will exclaim: “O paradise of delights: O God of infinite goodness! thou art not and never will be mine.” Repent, then; change your life; do not wait till the time of repentance is at an end. Give yourself to God; begin truly to love him. Beg of Jesus and Mary to have pity on you.

MEDITATION FOR SATURDAY

THE ETERNITY OF THE PAINS OF HELL

I

Consider that the torments of hell will never terminate. The damned suffer in every way, and they suffer eternally. A hundred years of suffering will pass away, a thousand will pass away, and hell will still be only at its beginning. A hundred thousand and a thousand million years and ages will pass, and hell will still begin anew. Were an angel to be sent to one of the damned, informing him that, after as many millions of ages have expired as there are drops of water in the sea, leaves upon the trees, and grains of sand on the seashore or upon the earth, he should be delivered from hell, this news would fill him with inconceivable joy. For although he would be compelled to suffer for an innumerable multitude of ages, still he would be able to say: The time will come when my sufferings will end. But alas! as many ages will really expire, and hell will be only at its beginning. Nay, this number of ages may be multiplied as many times as there are grains of sand on the earth, drops of water in the ocean, and leaves on the trees, and, at the close of this immense period, hell will begin again. There is not a wretch in that abode of torments, that would not willingly make this proposition to the Almighty. "Increase, O Lord, as much as Thou pleasest, my torments, prolong the duration of them to any extent Thou pleasest, provided they may terminate." But no: this termination will never be granted. It would be an alleviation, if the unfortunate sufferer could flatter himself with the hope that perhaps the Lord would one day have compassion on him and deliver him from hell. But alas! he will always keep the sentence of his eternal reprobation before his eyes, and will see that all these pains, this fire, this despair, these lamentations, will never cease, will never end. O hell! O eternity! how can men believe in you and yet continue in sin?

II

Christian soul! pay attention to these truths: remember that hell is for you, if you live in sin. This horrible furnace is already enkindled under your feet, and numbers throughout the world are falling into it, whilst you are reading this. Reflect, that if the same misfortune ever befalls you, it will be irreparable; if ever, then, you did deserve hell, thank God with all your heart for his mercy in having spared you. Weep over your sins; employ every possible means of securing your salvation; frequently approach the sacraments; read daily some pious book, entertain a sincere devotion to the Blessed Virgin, recite every day the Rosary, and fast every Saturday in her honour; be firm and resolute in resisting the beginning of temptation, invoking frequently the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary; flee from all occasions of sin, in sort use your utmost endeavours to avoid eternal misery, remembering that there cannot be too great security where eternity is at stake. Consider what numbers of men have hidden themselves in deserts, and shut themselves up in caverns, in order the more effectually secure their eternal welfare. And what are you doing? Oh ! give yourself sincerely to God, and say to him from your heart: Lord, behold I am now Thy servant: ready and willing to do whatever Thou commandest me. Mary, assist me.

HYMN

The Soul Sighing for Heaven.

Oh! I am dying of desire,
Sweet Lord, to see Thy face;
To linger here on earth I tire,
O God of loveliness!
A pang so bitter rends my heart,
I can no more endure the smart;
Ah! do not, Lord, my grief despise.
I live indeed apart from Thee,
But hope and cry unceasingly,
O Paradise! O Paradise!
An empty joy, which ends in pain,
Is all this world bestows;
Deceitful pomp and pageant vain,
Which death anon will close.
He to whom all save God is nought
Best knows the anguish of the thought
I yet might lose my prize;
On Thee I fix my longing gaze,
To Thee alone my sighs I raise,
O Paradise! O Paradise!
In vain Thou wouldst ensnare my heart
With wealth and empty joys;
Go, world, thy gifts to those impart
Who madly love such toys.
Vain pomps, or pleasures stained with sin;
Ah! do not hope my hopes to win,
For other goods my spirit sighs;—To reign in heaven I aspire;
This is my hope, this my desire,
O Paradise! O Paradise!

O beauteous home! where love's reward
Love will itself bestow;
Where my so sweet and loving Lord
Himself unveiled will show.
When shall I see that blest abode,
And there behold and love my God?
When will that wished—for dawn arise?
While now I cry, 'twixt smiles and tears,
Ah, when, ah, when shall end my fears?
O Paradise! O Paradise!

A Christian's Rule of Life[1057]

In this Rule the first chapter treats of the means we must make use of to keep ourselves in the grace of God. In the second, the acts of those devout exercises which should be practised are set forth at length. In the third is shown the exercise of the principal virtues which a Christian ought to practise.

Chapter I

THE MEANS OF PRESERVING THE GRACE OF GOD

WE must be fully persuaded, that in order to obtain eternal salvation, it is not sufficient to wish to be saved; but we must further use the means which have been left us by Jesus Christ. Otherwise, if we commit sins, it will not avail us in the day of judgment to excuse ourselves by saying that the temptations were great, and we were weak; because God has given us the means, through his grace, to conquer all the assaults of our enemies: if, then we do not take advantage of them, and are overcome, the fault will be our own. All men desire to be saved; but because they omit to employ the means of salvation they sin and are lost.

1. TO FLEE FROM THE OCCASIONS OF SIN

The first means is, to avoid all occasions of sin. It is impossible for anyone who does not endeavour to flee from the occasions of sin, especially in the matter of sensual pleasures, to avoid falling into sin. St. Philip Neri said: "In the war of the senses, the conquerors are the cowards who fly." The occasion is like a veil put before our eyes, so that we can see nothing else—neither God, nor hell nor the resolutions we had made. The Scripture says, it is impossible to walk on burning coals without being burnt: Or can he walk upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt?[1058]. So it is morally impossible for anyone to put himself voluntarily into the occasion of sin and not to fall, although he may have made a thousand resolutions and a thousand promises to God. This is clearly shown every day by the misery of so many poor souls who are plunged into vice for not avoiding the occasions. Anyone who has had the evil habit of sins of impurity must know that, in order to restrain himself, it is not enough merely to avoid those occasions which are absolutely proximate; for if he does not also flee from those which are not altogether proximate, he will easily fall again. Nor must we allow ourselves to be deceived by the devil into thinking that the person towards whom we are tempted is a saint; it often happens that the more devout a person is, the stronger is the temptation. St. Thomas Aquinas says, that the holiest persons attract the most. The temptation will begin in a spiritual way, and will terminate carnally. The great servant of God F. Sertorio Caputo, of the Society of Jesus, said that the devil first induces one to love a person's virtue, then the person, and then blinds one and brings one to ruin. We must also flee from evil companions: we are too weak; the devil is continually tempting us, and the senses are drawing us to evil; the slightest suggestion of bad companions is only wanting to make us fall. Therefore the first thing that we have to do to save ourselves is to avoid evil occasions and bad companions. And we must in this matter do violence to ourselves, resolutely overcoming all human respect. Those who do not use violence to themselves will not be saved. It is true, that we must not put confidence in our own strength, but only in the divine assistance; but God Wills that we should do our part in doing violence to ourselves, when it is necessary to do so, in order to gain Paradise: The violent bear it away.[1059]

2. MENTAL PRAYER

The second means is mental prayer. Without this, the soul will find it almost impossible to remain a long time in the grace of God. The Holy Spirit says: In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin.[1060] He who often meditates on the Four Last Things, namely, death, judgment, and the eternity of hell and paradise, will not fall into sin. These truths are not to be seen with the [natural] eyes, but only with the eyes of the mind: if they are not meditated on, they vanish from the mind, and then the pleasures of the senses present themselves, and those who do not keep before themselves the eternal truths are easily taken up by them; and this is the reason why so many abandon themselves to vice, and are damned. All Christians know and believe that all must die, and that we shall all be judged; but because they do not think about this, they live far from God. Without mental prayer there is no light; we walk in the dark; and walking in the dark, we do not see the danger which we are in, we do not make use of the means we ought, nor pray to God to help us, and so we are lost. Without prayer we have neither light nor strength to advance in the ways of God; because without prayer we do not ask God to give us his grace, and without so praying we shall certainly fall. It was for this reason that Cardinal Bellarmine declared it to be morally impossible for a Christian who does not meditate to persevere in the grace of God. Whereas he who makes his meditation every day can scarcely fall into sin; and if unhappily he should fall on some occasion, by continuing his prayer he will return immediately to God. It was said by a servant of God, that "mental prayer and mortal sin cannot exist together." Resolve, then, to make every day, either in the morning or in the evening,—but it is best in the morning,—half an hour's meditation. In the following chapter you will see briefly explained an easy method for making this prayer. For the rest, it is sufficient that during that time you should recollect yourself by reading some book of meditation—either this one or one of the many others; and from time to time excite some good affection or some aspiration, as you will find pointed out in the following chapter. Above all, I beg you never to leave off this prayer, which you should practise at least once a day, although you may be in great aridity, and should feel great weariness in performing it. If you do not discontinue it, you will certainly be saved.

Together with prayer, it is of great use to make a spiritual reading, in private, out of some book which treats of the life of a saint or of the Christian virtues, during half, or at least a quarter of an hour. How many by reading a pious book have changed their way of living and become saints! Like St. John Colombino, St. Ignatius Loyola, and so many others. It would also be a most useful thing if you were every year to make a retreat in some religious house. But at least do not omit your daily meditation.

3. THE FREQUENTATION OF THE SACRAMENTS.

The third means is the frequenting of the sacraments of Confession and of Communion. By confession the soul keeps itself purified; and by it, it not only obtains remission of sins, but also greater strength to resist temptations. For this purpose you should choose a director, and always confess to the same, consulting him on all more important matters, even temporal ones; and obey him in everything, especially if you are distressed by scruples. He who obeys his confessor need not fear to go astray: He that heareth you, heareth Me.[1061] The voice of the confessor is the voice of God.

Holy Communion is called heavenly bread, because as common bread preserves the life of the body, so Communion preserves the life of the soul: Except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man . . . you shall not have life in you.[1062] On the other hand, to those who often eat this bread eternal life is promised: If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever. [1063] Therefore the Council of Trent calls Holy Communion "the medicine which delivers us from venial sins and preserves us from mortal ones." You should, then, resolve to go to Communion at least once a week, being determined not to give it up for anything in the world; as there is no affair of greater importance than that of your eternal salvation. Indeed, the longer you remain in the world, the greater need you have of assistance, because your temptations are greater.[1064] To make a good confession, as also a good Communion, see the following chapter, where you will also find the acts which may be made before and after confession and Communion by way of preparation and thanksgiving.

4. TO HEAR MASS.

The fourth means is to hear Mass every day. When we attend Mass we give more honour to God than all the angels and saints in heaven can give him because theirs is the honour of creatures; but in the Mass we offer to God Jesus Christ, who gives him an infinite honour. Read the following chapter, where you will also find a way of hearing Mass with much profit.

5. THE VISIT TO THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT AND TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

The fifth means is to make a visit every day to the Most Holy Sacrament in some church, and to the Divine Mother before some devout image. Jesus Christ dwells on the altars of so many churches in order to dispense graces to all who come to visit him; and thus the souls of those who practise this beautiful devotion receive innumerable benefits from it. At the end of the next chapter you will find the prayer which may be said when visiting the Most Holy Sacrament, and the Divine Mother. The graces you ought especially to ask for both from Jesus and Mary, are, the love of God, and holy perseverance till death.

6. PRAYER.

The sixth means which I recommend you above all to put in practice is holy prayer. It is certain that without the divine assistance we can do nothing good for our souls. God also has declared that graces are granted to those only who ask for them: Ask, and it shall be given you.[1065] Seek, and it shall be given you; therefore, as says St. Teresa, he who seeks not does not receive. Hence it is a common opinion of the holy Fathers, with St. Thomas, that without prayer it is impossible to persevere in the grace of God, and to save one's self. But he who prays is sure of the help of God; we have his word for it, which cannot fail, repeated so often in the sacred Gospels: All things whatsoever you ask when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come to you.[1066] Every one that asketh receiveth.[1067] Amen, amen, I say unto you, if you ask the Father anything in My Name, He will give it you.[1068] God grants everything that we ask him for in the name of Jesus Christ. If, then, we wish to be saved, we must pray, and pray with humility and confidence, and above all with perseverance. And this is the reason why mental prayer is so useful, because then we are reminded to pray; otherwise we forget to do so, and so are lost. St. Teresa says, that out of her desire of seeing every one saved, she would have wished to go to the top of a mountain and then to cry out, so as to be heard by all men, nothing but these words, "Pray! pray!" The ancient Fathers of the desert in their conferences decided that there was no better means of saving ourselves than by continually repeating the prayer of David: Incline unto my aid, O God! O Lord, make haste to help us![1069] So let us also try to say. Or else let us make use of the beautiful ejaculation of the Blessed F. Leonard of Porto—Maurice: "My Jesus, mercy!" And the two principal graces which we must always ask for (as I have said before), are the love of God and holy perseverance. We must always ask the same graces from the Most Holy Mary, who is called the dispenser of all the divine graces; and when we pray to her, she will certainly obtain them for us from God. Therefore St. Bernard thus exhorts us: "Let us seek grace, and let us seek it through Mary; for what she seeks she finds, and she cannot be disappointed."[1070]

Chapter II

ACTS AND PRACTICES OF PIETY

§ 1. ACTS AND DIFFERENT PRAYERS ON RISING IN THE MORNING, AND DURING THE DAY

On rising make the sign of the cross, and then say: My God, I adore Thee and love Thee with all my heart.

I thank Thee for all Thy benefits, and especially for having preserved me this night.

I offer thee whatever I may do or suffer this day, in union with the actions and sufferings of Jesus and of Mary, with the intention of gaining all the indulgences I can gain.

I resolve to avoid all sin this day, and especially such a one (it is good to make a resolution, particularly about the fault into which we fall the oftenest); and I beg of Thee to give me perseverance for the love of Jesus Christ.

I resolve to conform myself to Thy holy will, and particularly in those things that are contrary to my inclination, saying always: Lord, Thy will be done.

My Jesus! keep Thy hand over me this day. Most Holy Mary! take me beneath thy mantle. And do Thou, Eternal Father, help me, for the love of Jesus and Mary!

O my angel guardian and my patron saints, assist me.

An Our Father and a Hail Mary and the Creed, with three Hail Marys in honour of the purity of Mary.

When you begin any work or study, say: Lord! I offer Thee this work. When you eat: My God, bless this food and me, that I may commit no fault about it; and may all be for Thy glory. After having eaten: I thank Thee, Lord! for having done good to one who was Thy enemy. When the clock strikes: My Jesus! I love Thee: never permit me to offend Thee again, and let me never be separated from Thee. In adverse circumstances: Lord, since Thou hast so willed it, I will it also. In time of temptation often repeat: Jesus and Mary! When you know or doubt of some fault or sin you have committed, say immediately: My God! I repent of having offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness! I will do so no more. And if it was a grievous sin, confess it at once.

It would be a good thing for parents and masters and mistresses to make the children and those under them learn these acts by heart, that they may use them afterwards throughout life.

§ 2. METHOD OF MAKING MENTAL PRAYER

Mental prayer consists of three parts; the preparation, the meditation, and the conclusion. The preparation consists of three acts: one of faith in the presence of God; of humility, with a short act of contrition; and of prayer to be enlightened: saying as follows, for the first: My God I believe that Thou art present with me, and I adore Thee with all the affection of my soul. For the second: O Lord, by my sins I deserve to be now in hell. I repent, O Infinite Goodness! with my whole heart, of having offended Thee. For the third: My God, for the love of Jesus and Mary, give me light in this prayer, that I may profit by it. Then say a Hail Mary to the Most Blessed Virgin, that she may obtain light for us; and a Glory be to the Father, to St. Joseph, to your guardian angel, and to your patron saint, for the same end. These acts should be made with attention; but briefly; and then you go on directly to the meditation.

In the meditation you can always make use of some book,[1071] at least at the beginning, and stop where you find yourself mostly touched. St. Francis de Sales says that in this we should do as the bees, which settle on a flower as long they find any honey in it, and then pass on to another. It should also be observed, that the fruits to be gained by meditation are three in number: to make affections, to pray, and to make resolutions; and in these consists the profit to be derived from mental prayer. After you have meditated on some eternal truth, and God has spoken to your heart, you must also speak to God; and first, by forming affections, be they acts of faith, of thanksgiving, of humility, or of hope; but above all, repeat the acts of love and contrition. St. Thomas says, that every act of love merits for us the grace of God and paradise: "Every act of love merits eternal life."[1072] Each act of contrition obtains the same thing. Acts of love are such as these: My God, I love Thee above all things! I love Thee with all my heart! I desire to do Thy will in all things. I rejoice that Thou art infinitely happy! and the like. For an act of contrition it is enough to say: O Infinite Goodness, I repent of having offended Thee!

In the second place, you must pray; ask God to enlighten you, to give you humility or other virtues, to grant you a good death and eternal salvation; but above all, his love and holy perseverance. And when the soul is in great aridity, it is sufficient to repeat: My God, help me! Lord, have mercy on me! My Jesus, have mercy! and if you do nothing but this, your prayer will succeed exceedingly well.

In the third place, before finishing your prayer, you must form a particular resolution; as, for instance, to avoid some occasion of sin, to bear with an annoyance from some person, to correct some fault and the like.

Finally, in the conclusion, three acts are to be made; in the first, we must thank God for the inspirations we have received; in the second, we must make a determination to observe the resolutions we have made; in the third, we must ask God, for the love of Jesus and Mary, to help us to keep our resolution. The prayer concludes by the recommendation of the souls in purgatory, the prelates of the Church, sinners, and all our relatives and friends for which we may say an Our Father and a Hail Mary: St. Francis of Sales exhorts us to choose some thought which may have struck us more especially in our prayer, that we may remember it during the rest of the day.

Benedict XIV granted seven years' indulgence to those who make half or at least a quarter of an hour's mental prayer during the day, and a plenary indulgence if it is made every day for a month on the condition of confession and Communion.

§ 3. ACTS TO BE MADE BY WAY OF PREPARATION AND THANKSGIVING BOTH FOR CONFESSION AND COMMUNION

Before confessing, the penitent should beg for light from God to enable him to know what sins he has committed, and to obtain the grace of a true sorrow and purpose of amendment. He should also particularly recommend himself to Our Lady of Sorrows, that she may obtain contrition for him. Then he may make the following acts:

ACT BEFORE CONFESSION.

O God of infinite majesty, behold at Thy feet a traitor, who has offended Thee over and over again, but who now humbly seeks forgiveness. O Lord, reject me not; Thou dost not despise a heart that humbles itself: A contrite and humbled heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[1073] I thank Thee that Thou hast waited for me till now, and hast not let me die in sin, casting me into hell, as I deserved. Since Thou hast waited for me, my God, I hope that, by the merits of Jesus Christ, Thou wilt pardon me in this confession for all the offences I have committed against Thee; I repent, and am sorry for them, because by them I have merited hell and lost paradise. But above all, it is not so much on account of hell which I have merited, but because I have offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness! that I am sorry from the bottom of my heart. I love Thee, O Sovereign Good! and because I love Thee, I repent of all the insults I have offered Thee. I have turned my back upon Thee; I have not respected Thee; I have despised Thy grace and Thy friendship.

O Lord! I have lost Thee by my own free—will; forgive me all my sins for the love of Jesus Christ, now that I repent with all my heart; I hate, detest, and abominate them above every evil. And I repent not only of mortal sins, but also of venial sins, because these are also displeasing to Thee. I resolve for the future, by Thy grace, never more wilfully to offend Thee. Yes, my God, I will rather die than ever sin again.

And if a person confesses a sin into which he has often relapsed, it is a good thing to resolve particularly not to fall into it again, by promising to avoid the occasion of it, and to take the means pointed out by the confessor, or such as he may himself judge to be most efficacious for correcting himself of it.

ACT AFTER CONFESSION.

My dear Jesus! how much do I not owe Thee. By the merits of Thy blood I hope that I have this day been pardoned. I thank Thee above all things. I hope to reach heaven, where I shall praise Thy mercies forever. My God, if I have hitherto lost Thee so often, I now desire to lose Thee no more. From this day forward I will change my life in earnest. Thou dost merit all my love; I will love Thee truly; I will no longer see myself separated from Thee. I have promised Thee this already; now I repeat my promise of being ready to die rather than offend Thee again. I promise also to avoid all occasions of sin, and to use such means as will prevent me from falling again. My Jesus, Thou knowest my weakness: give me grace to be faithful to Thee till death, and to have recourse to Thee when I am tempted. Most holy Mary, help me! Thou art the mother of perseverance; I place my hope in thee.

PREPARATION FOR COMMUNION.

There is no means more efficacious in freeing us from our sins, and in enabling us to advance in the love of God, than Holy Communion. Why is it, then, that some souls find themselves always in the same tepidity, and committing the same faults, notwithstanding the many Communions they make? This happens through the want of a proper disposition and preparation. Two things are requisite for this preparation. The first is to disengage our heart from all affections which are an impediment to the divine love. The second is to have a great desire to love God. And this, says St. Francis de Sales, should be our chief intention when we communicate, namely, to increase in divine love. Out of love alone says the saint, ought our God to be received, who out of love alone gives himself to us. For this end let us make the following acts.

ACTS BEFORE COMMUNION.

My beloved Jesus, true Son of God, who didst die for me on the cross in a sea of sorrow and ignominy, I firmly believe that Thou art present in the Most Holy Sacrament; and for this faith I am ready to give my life.

My dear Redeemer, I hope by Thy goodness, and through the merits of Thy blood, that when Thou dost come to me this morning, Thou wilt inflame me with Thy holy love, and wilt give me all those graces which I need to keep me obedient and faithful to Thee till death. Ah, my God! true and only lover of my soul, what couldst Thou do more to oblige me to love Thee? Thou wert not satisfied, my love, with dying for me, but Thou wouldst also institute the Most Holy Sacrament, making Thyself my food, and giving Thyself all to me; thus uniting Thyself most closely to such a miserable and ungrateful creature. Thou dost Thyself invite me to receive Thee, and dost greatly desire that I should receive Thee. O infinite Love! A God gives himself all to me! O my God, O infinite love, worthy of infinite love, I love Thee above all things; I love Thee with all my heart; I love Thee more than myself, more than my life; I love Thee because Thou art worthy of being loved; and I love Thee also to please Thee, since Thou dost desire my love! Depart from my soul, all ye earthly affections; to Thee alone, my Jesus, my treasure, my all, will I give all my love. This morning Thou dost give Thyself all to me, and I give myself all to Thee. Permit me to love Thee; for I desire none but Thee, and nothing but what is pleasing to Thee. I love Thee, O my Saviour, and I unite my poor love to the love of all the angels and saints, and of Thy Mother Mary, and the love of Thy Eternal Father! Oh; that I could see Thee loved by all! Oh, that I could make Thee loved by all men, and loved as much as Thou dost deserve!

Behold, O m y Jesus, I am now about to draw near to feed on Thy most sacred Flesh! Ah, my God, who am I? and who art Thou? Thou art a Lord of infinite goodness, and I am a loathsome worm, defiled by so many sins, and who have driven Thee out of my soul so often. Domine, non sum dignus. Lord, I am not worthy to remain in Thy presence; I ought to be in hell forever, far away, and abandoned by Thee. But out of Thy goodness Thou callest me to receive Thee: behold, I come, I come humbled and in confusion for the great displeasure I have given Thee, but trusting entirely to Thy mercy and to the love Thou hast for me. I am exceedingly sorry, O my loving Redeemer, for having so often offended Thee in time past! Thou didst even give Thy life for me; and I have so often despised Thy grace and Thy love, and have exchanged Thee for nothing. I repent, and am sorry with all my heart for every offence which have offered Thee, whether grievous or light, because It was an offence against Thee, who art infinite goodness. I hope Thou hast already pardoned me; but if Thou hast not yet forgiven me, pardon me, my Jesus, before I receive Thee, Ah, receive me quickly into Thy grace, since it is Thy will soon to come and dwell within me.

Come, then, my Jesus, come into my soul, that sighs after Thee. My only and infinite good, my life, my love, my all, I would desire to receive Thee this morning with the same love with which those souls who love Thee most have received Thee, and with the same fervor with which Thy Most Holy Mother received Thee; to her Communions I wish to unite this one of mine. O Blessed Virgin, and my Mother Mary, give me Thy Son; I intend to receive him from thy hands! Tell him that I am thy servant, and thus will he press me more lovingly to his heart now that he is coming to me.

ACTS AFTER COMMUNION.

The time after Communion is a precious time for gaining treasures of grace, because the acts and prayers made whilst the soul is thus united with Jesus Christ have more merit, and are of more value, than when they are made at any other time. St. Teresa says that our Lord then dwells in the soul enthroned as on a mercy—seat, and speaks to it in these words: My child, ask of me what you will; for this end am I come to you to do you good. Oh, what great favours do those receive who converse with Jesus Christ after Communion! The Ven. F. Avila never omitted to remain two hours in prayer after Communion; and St. Aloysius Gonzaga continued his thanksgiving for three days. Let the communicant, then, make the following acts, and try during the rest of the day to go on making acts of love and prayer, in order to keep himself united with Jesus Christ, whom he has received in the morning.

Behold, my Jesus, Thou art come, Thou art now within me, and hast made Thyself all mine. Be Thou welcome, my Beloved Redeemer. I adore Thee, and cast myself at Thy feet; I embrace Thee, I press Thee to my heart, and thank Thee for that Thou hast deigned to enter into my breast. O Mary, O my patron saints, O my guardian angel, do you all thank him for me! Since then, O my Divine King! Thou art come to visit me with so much love, I give Thee my will, my liberty, and my whole self. Thou hast given Thyself all to me, I will give myself all to Thee; I will no longer belong to myself; from this day forward I will be Thine, and altogether Thine. I desire that my soul, my body, my faculties, my senses, should be all Thine, that they may be employed in serving and pleasing Thee. To Thee I consecrate all my thoughts, my desires, my affections, and all my life. I have offended Thee enough, my Jesus; I desire to spend the remainder of my life in loving Thee, who hast loved me so much.

Accept, O God of my soul, the sacrifice which I, a miserable sinner, make to Thee, and who desires only to love and please Thee. Work Thou in me, and dispose of me, and of all things belonging to me, as Thou pleasest. May Thy love destroy in me all those affections which are displeasing to Thee, that I may be all Thine, and may live only to please Thee! I ask Thee not f or goods of this world, for pleasures, for honours; give me, I pray Thee, by the merits of Thy Passion, O my Jesus, a constant sorrow for my sins! Enlighten me, and make me know the vanity of worldly goods, and how much Thou dost deserve to be loved. Separate me from all attachment to the world, and bind me entirely to Thy love, that from henceforth my will may neither seek nor desire anything but what Thou willest. Give me patience and resignation in infirmities, in poverty, and in all those things which are contrary to my self—love. Make me gentle towards those who despise me. Give me a holy death. Give me Thy holy love. And, above all, I pray Thee to give me perseverance in Thy grace till death; never permit me to separate myself from Thee again: Jesu dulcissime, ne permittas me separari a Te. And I also ask of Thee the grace always to have recourse to Thee, and to invoke Thy aid, O my Jesus, in all my temptations; and the grace to ask Thee always for holy perseverance.

O Eternal Father, Thy Son Jesus Christ has promised me that Thou wilt grant me everything that I shall ask Thee in his name: If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you[1074]. In the name, therefore, and by the merits of this Son, I ask for Thy love and holy perseverance, that I may one day love Thee in heaven with all my strength, and sing Thy mercies forever, secure of never more being separated from Thee.

O most holy Mary, my mother and my hope, obtain for me these graces which I so desire; as also a great love for thee, my Queen: may I always recommend myself to thee in all my necessities!

§ 4. METHOD OF HEARING MASS

The same action is performed in the Mass as was accomplished on Calvary, except that there the blood of Jesus Christ was really shed, while on the al tar it is shed mystically; but in the Mass the merits of the Passion of Jesus are applied to each one in particular. To hear Mass, therefore, with great fruit, we must pay attention to the ends for which it was instituted, namely:

1. To honour God. 2. To thank him for his benefits. 3 To satisfy for our sins. 4. To obtain graces.

For this reason you may use the following prayer during Mass.[1075]

Eternal Father, in this Sacrifice I offer to Thee Thy Son Jesus, with all the merits of his Passion:

1. In honour of Thy majesty. 2. In thanksgiving for all the favours Thou hast hitherto shown me, and for all those which I hope to receive for all eternity. 3 In satisfaction for my sins, and for those of all the living and dead. 4 To obtain eternal salvation, and all the graces that are necessary for me to gain it.

At the elevation of the Host: My God, for the love of this Thy Son, pardon me and give me holy perseverance. At the elevation of the Chalice: By the Blood of Jesus, give me Thy love and a holy death. At the Communion of the priest make a spiritual Communion saying: My Jesus, I love Thee, and desire to possess Thee. I embrace Thee, and I will never more separate myself from Thee.

§ 5. ACTS TO BE MADE IN VISITING THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT AND THE DIVINE MOTHER

My Lord Jesus Christ, who, for the love Thou bearest to mankind, dost remain night and day in this Sacrament, full of pity and love, awaiting, calling, and receiving all who come to visit Thee; I believe that Thou art present in the Sacrament of the Altar; I adore Thee from the depths of my own nothingness; I thank Thee for the many graces Thou hast given me, and especially for having given me Thyself in this Sacrament; for having given me Mary Thy Mother as my advocate, and for having called me to visit Thee in this church. I salute Thy most amiable and most loving heart; and I do so, first, in thanksgiving for this great gift; secondly, to atone for all the insults Thou hast received in this Sacrament from all infidels, heretics, and bad Catholics; thirdly, I intend in this visit to adore Thee in all those places where Thou, thus veiled in the Most Holy Sacrament, art least reverenced and most abandoned. My Jesus I give Thee with my whole heart. I am sorry that I have hitherto so often offended Thy infinite goodness. With the help of Thy grace, I resolve to displease Thee no more; and, unworthy as I am, I now consecrate myself wholly to Thee; I renounce and give to Thee my will, my affections, my desires, and all that is mine. Henceforward do with me, and all that belongs to me, whatsoever Thou pleasest. I ask for nothing but Thee and Thy holy love, final perseverance, and a perfect fulfilment of Thy will.

I recommend to Thee the souls in purgatory, especially those who were most devout to this Most Holy Sacrament, and to Most Holy Mary. I also recommend to Thee all poor sinners. And lastly, my beloved Saviour, I unite all my affections to those of Thy most loving heart; and thus united, I offer them to Thy Eternal Father; and in Thy name I beseech him to accept and grant them.

While Visiting any Image of the Ever—Blessed Virgin.

Most holy immaculate Virgin Mary, my Mother, I, the most miserable of sinners, have this day recourse to thee, the Mother of my Lord, the advocate, the hope, the refuge of sinners! I worship thee O great Queen, and I thank thee for the many favours thou hast hitherto obtained for me; especially for having delivered me from Hell, which I have so often deserved. I love thee, O most amiable Lady, worthy of all love! and for the love I bear thee, I promise to serve thee always and to do everything in my power to make others serve thee also. In thee do I hope; I place my salvation in thy hands. Accept me for thy servant, receive me under thy mantle, O Mother of Mercy! Thou art all—powerful with God; free me, then from all temptations, or at least obtain for me strength to conquer them as long as I live. From thee I beg a true love of Jesus Christ; and by thy help I hope for a good death. I beseech thee, Mother, by the love thou bearest to God, that thou wilt always help me, but especially at the last moment of my life. Leave me not till thou shalt see me safe in heaven, blessing thee, and singing thy mercies for all eternity. Amen. This is my hope. So may it be!

§ 6. CHRISTIAN ACTS, TO BE MADE IN THE EVENING BEFORE GOING TO BED

Before going to rest, make your examination of conscience in the following manner: First thank God for all the favours you have received; then cast a glance over all the actions you have done and the words you have spoken during the day, repenting of all the faults you have committed. Afterwards make the Christian acts in the following manner:

ACT OF FAITH.

O my God, who art infallible truth, because Thou hast revealed it to Thy Church, I believe all that she proposes to my belief! I believe that Thou art my God, the Creator of all things; that Thou dost reward the just with an eternal paradise, and dost punish the wicked in hell for all eternity. I believe that Thou art one in essence, and three in persons, namely, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. I believe in the Incarnation and death of Jesus Christ. I believe, in fine, all that the Holy Church believes. I thank Thee for having made me a Christian; and I protest that I will live and die in this holy faith.

ACT OF HOPE.

O my God, confiding in Thy promises, because Thou art powerful, faithful, and merciful, I hope through the merits of Jesus Christ to obtain pardon of my sins, final perseverance, and the glory of paradise.

ACT OF LOVE AND CONTRITION.

My God, because Thou art infinite goodness, worthy of infinite love, I love Thee with all my heart above all things; and for the love of Thee I love my neighbour also. I repent with all my heart, and am sorry above all things for all my sins, because by them I have offended Thy infinite goodness. I resolve, by the help of Thy grace which I beseech Thee to grant me now and always: rather to d1e than ever to offend Thee again. I purpose, also, to receive the holy Sacraments during my life, and at the hour of my death.

It is well to know, that to those who make these Christian acts with the desire of receiving the holy Sacraments during their life and at their death Benedict XIII granted seven years' indulgence; and a plenary indulgence, applicable to the souls in purgatory, when they are said regularly for a month; as also a plenary indulgence in articulo mortis—at the hour of death. Besides, by a concession of Benedict XIV., the indulgence may be gained several times a day by any one who recites the above acts, provided he does so with the intention of gaining the indulgence.

Conclude the whole by saying the Rosary and the Litany of the Blessed Virgin.

§ 7. DEVOUT PRAYERS TO JESUS AND MARY TO OBTAIN THE GRACES NECESSARY FOR SALVATION

PRAYER TO JESUS CHRIST, TO OBTAIN HIS HOLY LOVE.

My crucified Jesus, I confess Thee to be the true Son of God and my Saviour. I adore and thank Thee for the death Thou didst suffer for me. My dear Redeemer if I have hitherto done nothing but offend Thee I am now sorry for it above all things, and I desire nothing but to love Thee. Thou hast promised to hear those who pray to Thee; by the merits of Thy Passion, I ask Thee to give me Thy holy love. Ah, draw my heart entirely to Thyself, that from this day forward I may love Thee with all my strength, and may love none other but Thee: a d so may I one day come to love Thee for all eternity in paradise.

PRAYER TO OBTAIN FINAL PERSEVERANCE.

O sovereign and eternal God, I thank Thee for having created me; for having redeemed me by means of Jesus Christ; for having made me a Christian by calling me to the true faith, and giving me time to repent after the many sins I have committed. O Infinite Goodness, I love Thee above all things; and I repent with all my heart of all my offences against Thee. I hope Thou hast already pardoned me; but I am continually in danger of again offending Thee. For the love of Jesus Christ, I beg of Thee holy perseverance till death. Thou knowest my weakness; help me, then, and permit me never again to separate myself from Thee. Rather let me die a thousand times, than ever again to lose Thy grace. O Mary, my Mother, obtain for me holy perseverance!

PRAYERS TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY FOR EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK

SUNDAY

TO OBTAIN THE PARDON OF SINS.

Behold at thy feet, O mother of God! a miserable sinner, who has recourse to thee, and places his confidence in thee. O Mother of mercy, have pity on me. Thou art the refuge, the hope of sinners; thou art, therefore, my refuge and my hope. Thou hast it in thy power to save me by thy holy intercession; succour me for the love of Jesus Christ, stretch forth thy hand to a fallen sinner who commends himself to thee. I know that thou delightest to assist a poor sinner; assist me therefore now that thou hast it in thy power to assist me. I have forfeited divine grace and lost my soul by my sins; I now put myself into thy hands; tell me what I must do to regain the grace of my Lord, for I am willing to do all that thou shalt direct me. To thee then do I have recourse. Thou prayest for many others, pray also to Jesus for me; ask him to pardon me, and he will pardon me; tell him that thou desirest my salvation and he will save me. Manifest the good which thou art able to accomplish in behalf of those who confide in thee. This is my hope. Amen.

MONDAY

TO OBTAIN HOLY PERSEVERANCE.

O Queen of heaven, I dedicate myself to thee to be thy perpetual s:tvant, and I offer myself to serve thee during my whole life; accept of me, and do not reject me as I have deserved. O mother, in thee do I place all my hopes. I bless and thank God, that, in his mercy, he has given me this confidence in thee, which I hold as a great earnest of my salvation. Ah, how have I hitherto miserably fallen, because I have not had recourse to thee! I now hope, through the merits of Jesus and thy prayers, that I have been pardoned; but I may again fall and forfeit divine grace. Most blessed Lady, protect me, and suffer me not to become any more the slave of the devil; always assist me; I know that thou wilt assist me, and I shall conquer With thy assistance, if I recommend myself to thee, but of this I am not afraid: I am afraid that when in danger of falling I may not call upon thee and may perish. This favour I ask of thee, that in all the assaults of the devil I may always have recourse to thee, saying, Mary, help me; help me, Mary, most holy mother· do not suffer me to lose God.

TUESDAY

TO OBTAIN A HAPPY DEATH

O Mary! what will my death be? Considering my sins, and reflecting on that awful moment, when I must breathe my last and be judged, I tremble and am confounded. Most holy Mother, in the blood of Jesus and in thy prayers are placed my hopes. O consolation of the afflicted, do not abandon me then; fail not to console me in that great affliction. If thou assist me not I shall be lost. Ah, blessed Lady! before my death be at hand, obtain for me a great sorrow for my sins, a real amendment of life and fidelity to God, during the remainder of my days. And when I shall arrive at the end of my life, O Mary, my hope, assist me in that distressing moment, and so comfort me that I may not fall into despair at the sight of my sins, which the devil will place before me. Grant that I may invoke thee then more frequently, and that I may expire with thy name on my tongue and the name of thy most holy and divine Son. O blessed Lady, pardon my assurance; but before I die, do thou in person come to console me with thy presence. I am a sinner, it is true, and do not deserve such a favour; but I am devoted to thee, I love thee, and have great confidence in thee. O Mary, I look for thee; let me not remain disconsolate. At least, if I be not then worthy of so great a favour, assist me from heaven, that I may depart from this life loving God and thee, to come to love thee eternally in heaven.

WEDNESDAY

TO ESCAPE HELL

Most dear and blessed Lady, I thank thee for having so often preserved me from falling into hell, which I have deserved by my repeated sins. Alas! there was a time when I must have stood condemned to that dreadful prison; and it may be that on my first committing sin the sentence would have been executed upon me had not thou in thy pity assisted me. Although I did not pray to thee, yet, through thy goodness alone, thou didst restrain divine justice; and conquering the, hardness of my heart, induce me to place my confidence in thee. And oh! into how many more sins should I have fallen, to the dangers of which I was exposed, hadst not thou, my most affectionate Mother, preserved me from them by the graces which thou didst obtain for me! O holy Queen, continue, beseech Thee, to preserve me from hell. If at one time I did not love thee, now, next to God, I love thee above all things. Never suffer me to turn my back upon thee, and upon God, who through thy means hast bestowed so many mercies upon me. Most amiable Lady, suffer me not to have to curse thee for all eternity in hell. Couldst thou endure to see one lost who is thy servant and loves thee? Most Blessed Virgin, since thou hast done so much to save me, accomplish thy work, and continue to assist me. But if thou, when I lived forgetful of thee, didst so favour me, what m ay I not expect from thee now that I love thee and recommend myself to thee! No, no one can be lost who recommends himself to thee. O my Mother, leave me not to myself, that I may be lost; grant that I may always have recourse to thee. Save me, my hope, by thy powerful intercession; save me from hell; and first save me from sin, which alone can condemn me to hell.

THURSDAY

TO OBTAIN HEAVEN

O Queen of heaven, who sittest above all the choirs of angelic spirits nearest to the throne of God, from this valley of tears I salute thee, miserable sinner as I am, and beseech thee to turn towards me those eyes of mercy which distribute favours whithersoever thou directest them. Behold, O Mary! to how many dangers I am now exposed, and must remain exposed so long as I continue in this world, of losing my soul, heaven, and God. In thee, O blessed Lady! next to God, are placed all my hopes. I love thee, and long to approach and behold and praise thee in heaven. O Mary! when will the day come when I shall see myself saved at thy feet, and shall behold thee the mother of my Lord, and my mother also, who hast taken such pains to save me! O blessed Lady! I have been very ungrateful to thee during my life; but if I gain heaven, I shall not be any more ungrateful to thee: then shall I love thee as much as I am able for all eternity, and shall make amends for my past neglect by blessing thee and thanking thee forever. I give sovereign thanks to God for having given me so great confidence in the blood of Jesus, and in thee, as to hope that thou wilt deliver me from my sins, and obtain for me light and strength to accomplish the divine will, and finally conduct me to the gates of paradise. Thy servants have very much hoped in thee, and none have been deceived; nor shall I be deceived. O Mary! thou desirest nothing else in my regard; thou wilt save me. Pray to thy Son Jesus (as I now beseech him through the merits of his bitter Passion) to preserve and to increase in me more and more this my confidence in thee, and I shall be saved.

FRIDAY

TO OBTAIN LOVE FOR JESUS CHRIST AND FOR MARY

O Mary! I know that thou art the most noble, the most holy, and the most amiable of all creatures. O blessed Lady! would that all knew thee and loved thee as thou deservest! I am consoled that so many holy souls both in heaven and on earth love thy goodness and beauty. Above all, I rejoice that God himself loves thee more than all men and angels. Most amiable Queen, I, a miserable sinner, also love thee, but I love thee too little; I desire to obtain a greater and more tender love for thee; obtain this for me: for to love thee is a great sign of predestination, and a grace which God does not grant but to those whom he especially wills to be saved.

I am sensible, O holy Mother! that I am under immense obligations to thy Son, and he is deserving of infinite love. Thou desirest nothing else but to see him loved: to do this is the grace which above all others I beseech thee to obtain for me: obtain for me a great love for Jesus Christ. Thou obtainest from God whatever thou pleasest; oh, then, obtain for me the grace of being so united with the divine will that I may never be separated from it. I ask thee not for the goods of this world, nor for honours, nor riches; I ask thee for what thy heart most desires, that I may love my God. Is it possible that thou shouldst not assist me in obtaining this, which is so pleasing to thee? No; thou wilt assuredly help me, and pray for me. Pray, and cease not to pray, until thou seest me in paradise, safe from all danger of again losing my Lord, and secure of ever loving him, together with thee, my most dear mother.

SATURDAY

TO OBTAIN THE PATRONAGE OF MARY

O Most Holy Mother! I am sensible of the graces which thou hast obtained for me, and of the ingratitude with which I have employed them; but notwithstanding this, I will not cease to confide in thy mercy, which is much greater than my ingratitude. O my powerful advocate, have pity on me. Thou art the dispenser of all the graces which God grants to us miserable sinners. For this end has he made thee so powerful, so rich, and so benign, that thou mayest succour us in our miseries.

O Mother of mercy, leave me not in my poverty. Thou art the advocate of the most miserable and abandoned sinners when they have recourse to thee; defend me, therefore, who recommend myself to thee. Say not that my cause is difficult to be gained; whilst the most desperate causes, when entrusted to thee, are always successful. In thy hands, therefore, do I place my eternal salvation and to thee do I consign my soul, which was lost but which thou wilt save by thy holy intercession. This is my hope. Amen.

Chapter III

THE PRACTICE OF THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES

§ 1. THE PRACTICE OF HUMILITY

No one can please God without being humble, for he cannot bear the proud. He has promised to hear those who pray to him; but if a proud man prays to him, the Lord hears him not; to the humble, on the contrary, he dispenses his graces: God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[1076] Humility is of two kinds; humility of affection, and humility of the will. The former consists in the conviction we have of our own wretchedness so that we can neither know nor do anything but what is evil. All that we have and do that is good comes from God. Let us come now to the practice of humility. With regard, then, to the humility of the affections, first, we must put no confidence in our own strength, nor in our own resolutions; but we must be always diffident and fearful of ourselves: With fear and trembling work out your salvation.[1077] St. Philip Neri said: "He who fears not is sure to fall." Secondly, we must not glory in things that belong to us, as in our natural abilities, in our actions, in our birth, in our relatives, and the like. It is therefore well never to speak of our actions, except to point out where we have been wrong. And it is better not to speak of ourselves at all, either for good or bad; because, even when we blame ourselves, it is often an occasion of vain-glory, by making us think that we shall be praised, or at least be considered humble, and thus humility becomes pride. Thirdly, let us not be angry with ourselves after we have committed a fault. That would not be humility, but pride; and it is even a device of the devil to take away all our confidence, and make us leave off following a good life. When we see that we have fallen, we should say with St. Catharine of Genoa: "Lord, these are the fruits of my own garden." Then let us humble ourselves, and rise up immediately from the fault we have committed by an act of love and contrition, resolving not to fall into the same fault again, and trusting in the help of God. And if we unhappily do fall again, we must always do the same. Fourthly, when we see others fall, we are not to wonder; rather let us compassionate them; and let us thank God, praying him to keep his hand over us; otherwise the Lord will punish us by permitting us to fall into the same sins, and perhaps worse. Fifthly, we must always consider ourselves as the greatest sinners in the world; even when we know that others have sinned more than we; because our sins having been committed after we had received so many favours, and had been enlightened by so many graces, will be more displeasing to God than the faults of others, though they may be more numerous. St. Teresa writes that we must not think we have made any progress in the way of perfection if we do not esteem ourselves worse than everyone else, and desire to be considered the last of all.

The humility of the will consists in being pleased when we are despised by others. Anyone who has deserved hell, deserves to be trodden under foot by the devils forever. Jesus Christ desires that we should learn of him to be meek and humble of heart: Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart[1078] Many are humble in word, but not in heart. They say: "I am worse than all: I deserve a thousand hells." But when any one reproves them, or says a word that displeases them, they immediately take umbrage. They are like hedgehogs, which put out their bristles as soon as they are touched. But how is it—you say you are worse than all, and yet you cannot bear a word? "He who is truly humble," says St. Bernard, "esteems himself good for nothing, and desires to be considered good for nothing by others as well."

In the first place, then, if you wish to be truly humble, when you receive an admonition, receive it in good part, and thank the person who admonishes you. St. Chrysostom says, "When the just man is corrected, he is sorry for the error he has committed; but the proud man is sorry that the error should be known." The saints, when they are accused, even wrongfully, do not justify themselves, except when to defend themselves is necessary to avoid giving scandal: otherwise they are silent, and offer all to God.

In the second place, when you receive any affront, suffer it patiently, and increase in love towards the person who has ill—treated you. This is the touchstone by which you may know whether a person is humble and holy. If he resents an injury, even though he may work miracles; you may say that he is an empty reed. Father Balthazar Alvarez said that the time of humiliation is the time to gain treasures of merits. You will gain more by peaceably suffering contempt, than you could do by fasting ten days on bread and water. Humiliations which we inflict on ourselves are good; but those which we accept from the hands of others are worth much more, because in these last there is less of self and more of God; therefore, when we know how to bear them the merit is greater. But what can a Christian pretend to do if he cannot bear to be despised for the sake of God? How much contempt did not Jesus Christ suffer for us! Buffetings, derisions, scourging, and spitting in his face! Ah! if we loved Jesus Christ, not only should we not show resentment for injuries, but we should rejoice at seeing ourselves despised as Jesus Christ was despised.

§ 2. THE PRACTICE OF MORTIFICATION

If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.[1079] This is all that anyone who wishes to be a follower of Jesus Christ has to do. The denying of one's self is the mortification of self-love. Do we wish to be saved? We must then conquer all to make sure of all. How miserable is the soul that allows itself to be guided by self-love! Mortification is of two kinds—internal and external: by interior mortification we have to study to conquer our passions and especially our most predominant one. A person who does not overcome his predominant passion is in great danger of being lost; whereas he who has overcome that will easily conquer all the others. Some, however, allow one vice to predominate in themselves, and think that they are good, because they do not see in themselves vices which others have. "But what does it matter?" says St. Cyril: "one leak is sufficient to sink the ship." Nor will it suffice to say, "I cannot abstain from this vice;" a resolute will conquers all; that is, of course, with the assistance of God, who will never fail us.

External mortification has to do with conquering the sensual appetites. Worldly people call the saints cruel when they deny their bodies all satisfaction of the senses and chastise them with hair-shirts, disciplines, and other penances. "But," says St. Bernard, "they are in reality much more cruel to themselves, who condemn themselves to burn forever in hell-fire for the sake of the short and miserable pleasures of this life." Others say that all forbidden pleasures should be denied to the body; but they despise external mortifications, saying, that interior mortification is what is required; that is, the mortification of the will. Yes, it is principally necessary to mortify the will, but the mortification of the flesh is also necessary; because, when the flesh is not mortified, it will be hard to be obedient to God. St. John of the Cross said that anyone who taught that external mortification was not necessary, ought not to be believed, even though he worked miracles. But let us come to the practice of it.

In the first place, the eyes must be mortified. The first arrows which wound the soul, and often kill it, enter through the eyes. The eyes are, as it were, grappling-irons of hell, which drag souls, as if by main force, into sin. A certain Pagan philosopher voluntarily put out his eyes to free himself from impurity. It is not lawful for us to pluck out our eyes, but we ought to make them blind by means of mortification; otherwise we shall find it difficult to keep ourselves chaste. St. Francis de Sales said: "You must close the gates, if you do not wish the enemy to enter into the citadel." We must then abstain from looking at any object that may give occasion to temptation. St. Aloysius Gonzaga did not dare to raise his eyes to look even at his own mother; and when by chance our eyes light on some dangerous object, let us take care not to fix them on it. "It is not so much the mere seeing," says St. Francis de Sales," but the inspecting and continuing to look, that is the cause of ruin." Let us then be very careful in mortifying our eyes; because many are now in hell on account of sins committed with the eyes.

In the second place, we must mortify our tongue, by abstaining from words of detraction, or of abuse, or of obscenity. An impure word spoken in conversation, even in jest, may prove a scandal to others, and be the cause of a thousand sins arising from it. And it should be observed, that sometimes a word of double meaning, said in a witty way, does more harm than a word openly impure.

In the third place, we must mortify the taste. St. Andrew Avellini said that, in order to begin to live a good Christian life, a man must begin by the mortification of his palate. And St. Francis de Sales said: "We must eat to live, not live to eat." Many seem to live only to eat, and thus they destroy the health both of their soul and body. For the most part costiveness, diarrhoea, and other illnesses are caused by the vice of gluttony. But the worst is, that intemperance in eating and drinking is often the cause of incontinence. Cassian writes that it is impossible that a man who is satiated with food and heating drinks—as wine, brandy, and the like—should not feel many impure temptations. "But how is this?" says such a one; "must I eat no more?" Yes, my good friend, we must eat to preserve our life, but like rational beings, not as brutes. Especially if you desire to be free from impure temptations, abstain from eating overmuch meat, and from overmuch wine. The Scripture says: Give not wine to kings.[1080] By a king is meant one who brings his flesh under the dominion of reason. Much wine makes us lose our reason, and involves not only the vice of drunkenness, which is certainly a mortal sin, but also that of impurity. Regret not having sometimes to fast or to abstain, especially on a Saturday, in honour of the Most Holy Mary. Many do so on bread and water; this you can at least do on the vigils of the seven principal feasts of Our Lady. I pray you to observe at least, the fasts of obligation. Some go beyond fifteen or twenty ounces at collation, and say: "It is sufficient if I am not satisfied." No, it is not enough; the most that can be taken on the evenings of fast days of obligation is eight ounces; and even that has grown up by custom; for in olden times food could be taken only once a day.

In the fourth place, we must mortify our hearing and our touch: the hearing, by avoiding listening to immodest and scandalous conversations; the touch, by using all possible caution, as well in regard to others as in regard to ourselves. Some say it is nothing, that they only do it in jest; but who, I ask, would play with fire?

§ 3. THE PRACTICE OF CHARITY TOWARDS OUR NEIGHBOUR

He who loves God, loves his neighbour also; but he who loves not his neighbour, neither does he love God; for the divine precept says, That he who loveth God, loves also his brother.[1081] We must also love our neighbour in heart as well as in deed. And how much are we to love him? Here is the rule: "Love the Lord thy God with Thy whole soul, . . . and thy neighbour as thyself."[1082]We must, then, love God above all things, and more than ourselves, and our neighbour as ourselves. So that, as we desire our own good, and take delight in it when we have it, and, on the contrary, are sorry for any evil that may happen to us, so also we must desire our neighbour's good, and rejoice when he obtains it; and, on the other hand, we must be sorry for his misfortunes. So, again, we must neither Judge nor suspect evil of our neighbour, without good grounds. And this is what constitutes interior charity.

External charity consists in our words and actions towards our neighbour. As to words, first we must abstain from the least shadow of detraction. A detractor is hateful to God and man. On the contrary, he who speaks well of every one is beloved by God and men; and when the fault cannot be excused, we must at least excuse the intention. Secondly, let us be careful not to repeat to any one the evil that has been said of him by another; because sometimes long enmities and revenge arise from such things. The Scripture says, he who sows discord is hated by God. Thirdly, we must take care not to wound our neighbour, by saying anything that may hurt him; even were it only in jest. Would you like to be laughed at in the same way as you laugh at your neighbour? Fourthly, let us avoid disputes: sometimes on account of a mere trifle quarrels are begun which end in abuse and rancour. We have also to guard against the spirit of contradiction, which some indulge when they gratuitously set themselves to contradict everything. On such occasions give your opinion and then be quiet. Fifthly, let us speak gently to all even to our inferiors; therefore let us not make use of imprecations or abuse. And when our neighbour is angry with us, and is somewhat abusive, let us answer meekly, and the quarrel will be at an end: A mild answer breaketh wrath.'[1083] And when we are annoyed by our neighbour, we must be careful not to say anything; because our passion will then make us go too far: it will make us exaggerate; but afterwards we shall certainly be sorry for it. St. Francis de Sales says, "I was never angry in my life, that I did not repent of it shortly afterwards." The rule is to be silent as long as we feel ourselves disturbed. And when our neighbour continues to be irritated, let us reserve the correction till another time, even though it should be necessary; because for the moment our words would not convince, and would do no good.

With regard also to the charity of our actions towards our neighbour: first, it is practised by aiding him as we best may. Let us remember what the Scripture says: For alms deliver from all sin and from death, and will not suffer the soul to go into darkness.[1084] Almsgiving, then, saves us from sin and from hell. By alms is understood any assistance which it is in our power to render to our neighbour. The kind of alms giving which is the most meritorious is to help the soul of our neighbour, by correcting him gently and opportunely, whenever we can. And let not us say with some, "What doth it signify to me?" It does signify to one who is a Christian. He who loves God, wishes to see him loved by all.

Secondly, we must show charity towards the sick, who are in greater need of help. Let us make them some little present, if they are poor. At least let us go and wait on them and comfort them, even though they should not thank us for doing so; the Lord will reward us.

Thirdly, we must above all show charity to our enemies. Some are all kindness with their friends; but Jesus Christ says, Do good to those that hate you.[1085] By this you may know that a man is a true Christian, if he seeks to do good to those who wish him evil. And if we can do nothing else for those who persecute us, let us at least pray that God will prosper them, according as Jesus commands us: Pray for them that persecute you.[1086] This is the way the saints revenged themselves. He who pardons anyone who has offended him, is sure of being pardoned by God; since God has given us the promise: Forgive, and you shall be forgiven.[1087] Our Lord said one day to the Blessed Angela of Foligno, that the surest sign of a soul being loved by God, is when it loves a person who has offended it.

Fourthly, let us also be charitable to our neighbours who are dead, that is, to the holy souls in purgatory. St. Thomas says, that if we are bound to help our neighbours who are alive, we are also bound to remember them when dead. Those holy prisoners are suffering pains which exceed all the sufferings of this life; and nevertheless are in the greatest necessity, since they cannot possibly help themselves. A Cistercian monk once said to the sacristan of his monastery: "Help me, brother, by your prayers, when I can no longer help myself." Let us then endevour to succour these holy souls, either by having Masses said for them, or by heating Masses for them, by giving alms, or at least by praying, and applying indulgences in their behalf; they will show themselves grateful by obtaining great graces for us, not only when they reach heaven, if they arrive there sooner through our prayers, but also in purgatory.

St. James says, that patience is the perfect work of a soul: And patience hath a perfect work.[1088] It is by patience that we gain heaven. This earth is a place where we can gain merit; therefore it is not a place of rest, but of labours and sufferings; and it is for this end that God makes us live here, that by patience we may obtain the glory of paradise. Everyone has to suffer in this world; but he who suffers with patience suffers less and saves himself, while he who suffers with impatience suffers more and is damned. Our Lord does not send us crosses that he may see us lost, as some impatient people say, but that we may be thereby saved, and inherit more glory in heaven. Sorrows, contradictions, and all other tribulations, when accepted with patience, become the brightest jewels in our heavenly crown. Whenever, then, we are in affliction, let us console ourselves and thank God for it, since it is a sign that God wishes us to be saved, by chastising us in this life, where the chastisements are but slight and short, so as not to punish us in the next, where the chastisements are cruel and eternal. Woe to the sinner who is prosperous in this life! it is a sign that God has reserved for him eternal punishment. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said: "All sufferings, however great, become sweet when we look at Jesus on the cross." And St. Joseph Calasanctius: "He who cannot suffer for Jesus Christ, does not know how to gain Jesus Christ for his own." He, then, who loves Jesus Christ bears patiently all external crosses-sickness, pains, dishonour, loss of parents and friends ; and all interior crosses-afflictions, weariness, temptations, and desolation of spirit, and he bears them all in peace. On the other hand, he who is impatient and angry when he is in tribulation, what does he do? He does but increase his suffering, and adds to his punishments in the next life. St. Teresa says in her writings: "The cross is felt by those who drag it after them by force; but he who embraces it with a good will does not feel it." Hence St. Philip Neri also said: "In this world there is no purgatory; it is either heaven or hell: he who bears tribulation with patience is in heaven, but he who does not, is in hell." Let us proceed to the practice.

First, patience must be practised in sickness. The time of sickness is a time for testing the devotion of people, whether it is of lead or of gold. Some are pious and cheerful when they are in good health; but when they are visited by any illness, they lose their patience, complain of everything, and give themselves up to melancholy, and commit a thousand other faults. Their gold turns out to be lead. St. Joseph Calasanctius said: "If sick people were patient, we should hear no more complaints." Some complain and say: "But as long as I am in this state, I cannot go to church, nor to Communion, nor to Mass; in short, I can do nothing." You say you can do nothing. You do everything when you do the will of God. Tell me, why do you want to do those things you have named? Is it to please God? This is the good pleasure of God, that you should embrace with patience all vow have to endure, and should leave everything else that you wish to do alone. "God is served," writes St. Francis de Sales, "more by suffering than by any other works we can do." If our sickness be dangerous, then especially must we accept it with all patience, being willing to die should the end of our life be really at hand. Nor should we say: "But I am not now prepared; I should like to live a little longer to do penance for my sins." And how do you know that if you were to live on you would do penance, and would not fall into greatest sins? How many there are who, after recovering from some mortal illness, have become worse than they were before, and have been lost; while, perhaps, if they had died then, they would have been saved! If it is the will of God that you should leave this world, unite yourself to his holy will, and thank him for allowing you the help of the holy Sacraments, and accept death with tranquillity, abandoning yourself into the arms of his mercy. This compliance with the divine will, by accepting death, will be sufficient to insure your eternal salvation.

In the second place, we must accept also with patience the death of our relatives and friends. Some on the death of a relative are so inconsolable, that they leave off saying their prayers, frequenting the sacraments, and all their devotions. Such a one goes so far as even to be angry with God, and to say : " Lord, why hast Thou done this?" What rashness is this! Tell me, what does all your grief profit you? Do you perhaps think to do pleasure to the dead person? No; what you are doing is displeasing to him as well as to God. He desires that with regard to his death, you should become more united with God, and should pray for him if he is in purgatory.

In the third place, let us accept the poverty which God sends us. When you are in want even of the necessaries of life, say: "My God, Thou alone art sufficient for me." One such act will gain treasures for us in paradise. He who possesses God has every good. In the same way let us embrace with patience the loss of property, the failure of our expectations, or even the loss of those who were helping us. Let us be resigned at such times to the will of God, and God will help us; and if he should not then help us as we should wish, let us be content with whatever he may do, because he will do it to try our patience,· that he may enrich us with greater merits and the goods of heaven.

In the fourth place, we must accept patiently contempt and persecutions. You will say: "But what evil have I done, that I should be so persecuted? Why have I had to suffer such an affront?" My brother, go and say this to Jesus Christ on the cross, and he will answer: "And I, what have I done, that I should have to suffer such sorrow and ignominy, and this death of the cross?"

If, then, Jesus Christ has suffered so much for the love of you, it is no great thing that you should suffer this little for the love of Jesus Christ. Particularly if you have ever during your life committed some grievous sin, think that you deserve to be in hell, where you would have to suffer much greater contempt and persecution from the devils. If also you should be persecuted for having done good, rejoice exceedingly. Hear what Jesus Christ says: Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice' sake.[1089] Let us be convinced of the truth of what the Apostle says, that he who would live united with Jesus Christ in this world must be persecuted.

In the fifth place, we must practise patience also in spiritual desolations, which are the heaviest afflictions for a soul that loves God. But God in this way proves the love of his beloved ones. At such times let us humble ourselves and be resigned to the will of God, putting ourselves entirely into his hands. Let us be most careful also not to leave off any of our devotions, our prayers, frequenting of the sacraments, our visits to the Blessed Sacrament, or our spiritual reading. As we do everything then with weariness and trouble, it seems to us to be all lost, but it is not so: while we persevere in all these things, we work without any satisfaction to ourselves; but it is very pleasing to God.

In the sixth and last place, we must practise patience in temptations. Some cowardly souls, when a temptation lasts a long time, are disheartened, and will sometimes even say: God, then, desires my damnation. No; God permits us to be tempted, not for our damnation, but for our advantage, that we may then humble ourselves the more, and unite ourselves more closely to him, by forcing ourselves to resist, redoubling our prayers, and thereby acquiring greater merits for heaven. And because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee.'[1090] Thus was it said to Tobias. Every temptation which we overcome gains for us fresh degrees of glory, and greater strength to resist future temptations. Nor does God ever permit us to be tempted beyond our strength: And God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able, but will make also with temptation issue, that you may be able to bear it.[1091]

We should, however, beg our Lord to deliver us from temptations; notwithstanding, when they come, let us resign ourselves to his holy will, beseeching him to give us strength to resist. St. Paul was troubled with carnal temptations, and he prayed to God to deliver him from them; but the Lord said to him: My grace is sufficient for thee, for power is made perfect in infirmity.[1092] In sensual temptations especially the first precaution to be taken is to remove ourselves as far as possible from all occasions, and then immediately to have recourse to Jesus Christ for help, not trusting in our own strength. And when the temptation continues, let us not cease to pray, saying: "Jesus, help me! Mary, ever Virgin, assist me!" The mere invocation of these all—powerful names of Jesus and Mary will suffice to defeat the most violent assaults of hell. It is also of great use to make the sign of the cross on our forehead, or over our heart. By the sign of the cross, St. Anthony Abbot overcame similar attacks of the devil. It is also a very good thing to acquaint your spiritual father with your temptations. St. Philip Neri used to say: "A temptation which is manifested is half overcome."

§ 5. THE PRACTICE OF CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

All sanctity consists in loving God; and the love of God consists in fulfilling his holy will. In this is our life: And life in His good will.'[1093] And he who is always united with the will of God is always in peace; for the divine will takes away the bitterness of every cross. By saying, God wills it so, God has so willed, holy souls find peace in all their labours: Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad.[1094] You say: Everything goes wrong with me; God sends me all kinds of misfortunes. Things go wrong with you, my friend, because you make them go wrong; if you were to be resigned to the will of God, all would go well, and for your good. The crosses which God sends you are misfortunes, because you make them misfortunes; if you would take them with resignation, they would no longer be misfortunes, but riches for paradise. Ven. Balthazar Alvarez says: "He who in his troubles resigns himself with peacefulness to the divine will, runs to God post-haste." Let us now come to the practice.

And first, let us resign ourselves in the sicknesses which befall us. Worldly people call illnesses misfortunes, but the saints call them visitations of God and favours. When we are ill we ought certainly to take remedies in order to be cured, but we should always be resigned to whatever God disposes. And if we pray for restoration to health, let it always be done with resignation, otherwise we shall not obtain the favour. But how much do we not gain when we are ill by offering to God all we suffer! He who loves God from his heart does not desire to be cured of his illness in order not to suffer, but he desires to please God by suffering. It was this love which made the scourge, the rack, and the burning pitch sweet to the holy martyrs. We must also be especially resigned in mortal sickness. To accept death at such a time, in order that the will of God may be fulfilled merits for us a reward similar to that of the martyrs, because they accepted death to please God. He who dies in union with the will of God makes a holy death; and the more closely he is united to it, the more holy death does he die. The Venerable Blasius declares that an act of perfect conformity to the will of God at the hour of death not only delivers us from hell, but also from purgatory.

Secondly, we must also unite ourselves to the will of God with regard to our natural defects, as want of talents, being of low birth, weak health, bad sight, want of ability for affairs, and the like. All that we have is the free gift of God. Might he not have made us a fly or a blade of grass? A hundred years ago were we anything but nothingness? And what more do we want? Let it suffice that God has given us the power of becoming saints. Although we may have little talent, poor health, and may be poor and abject, we may very well become saints through his grace if we have the will. Oh, how many unfortunate beings have been damned on account of their talents, their health, high birth, riches or beauty! Let us then be content with what God has done for us; and let us thank him always for the good things he has given us, and particularly for having called us to the holy faith; this is a great gift, and one for which few are found to thank God.

Thirdly, we must resign ourselves in all adversities that may happen to us, as the loss of property, of our expectations, of our relatives; and in the attacks and persecutions we may meet with from men. You will say: But God does not will sin; how is it that I must resign myself when someone calumniates me, wrongs me, attacks and defrauds me? That cannot happen by the will of God. What a deception is this! God does not will the sin of such a one; he permits it: but, on the other band, he does will the adversity which you suffer by means of this person. So that it is our Lord himself who sends you that cross, though it comes to you by means of your neighbour; therefore even in these cases you must embrace the cross as coming from God. Nor let us seek to find out a reason for such treatment. St. Teresa says: "If you are willing to bear only those crosses for which you see a reason, perfection is not for you."

Fourthly, we must be resigned in aridity of soul; if, when we say our prayers, make our Communions, visit the Blessed Sacrament, etc., all seems to weary and give us no comfort, let us be satisfied in knowing that we please God, and that the less satisfaction we feel ourselves in our devotions the more pleasure do we give him. At no time can we know better our own insufficiency and misery than in the time of aridity; and therefore let us humble ourselves in our prayers, and put ourselves with resignation into God's hands, and say: "Lord, I do not deserve consolations; I desire nothing but that Thou have pity on me; keep me in Thy grace, and do with me what Thou wilt." And so doing, we shall gain more in one day of desolation than in a month of tears and sensible devotion. And generally speaking, this should be the continual tenor of our prayers, offering ourselves to God; that he may do with us as he pleases; saying to him in our prayers, our Communions, and in the visit: "My God, make me do Thy will." In doing the will of God we shall do everything. For this end let us accustom ourselves to have always on our lips the ejaculation: Fiat voluntas tua! "Thy will be done," even in the least things we do; for instance, if we snuff out a candle, break a glass, or stumble over something , let us always repeat; "May the will of God be done!" When we lose any of our possessions, or when one of our relatives dies, or anything else of the same sort happens to us, let us say: "O Lord, it is Thy will, it is my will also." And when we fear any temporal ill, let us say: "O Lord, I will whatever Thou wiliest." Thus we shall be very pleasing in the sight of God, and shall be always in peace.

§ 6. THE PRACTICE OF PURITY OF INTENTION

Purity of intention consists in doing everything with the sole view of pleasing God. The good or bad intention with which an action is performed renders it good or bad before God. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi says: "God rewards actions according to the amount of purity of intention with which they are done." Let us examine the practice of it. In. the first place, in all our exercises (of devotion), let us seek God and not ourselves: if we seek our own satisfaction we cannot expect to receive any reward from God. And this holds good for all spiritual works. How many labour and exhaust themselves in preaching, hearing confessions, serving at the altar, and in doing other pious works; and because in these they seek themselves and not God, they lose all! When we seek neither approbation nor thanks from others for what we do, it is a sign that we work for God's sake: as also when we are not vexed at the good we undertake not succeeding; or when we rejoice as much at any good that is done by others, as if it had been done by ourselves. Further, whenever we have done some good in order to please God, let us not torment ourselves in endevouring to drive away vain-glory; if we are praised for it; it is enough to say: "To God be the honour and glory." And let us never omit doing any good action which may be edifyi ng to our neighbour, through fear of vain-glory. Our Lord wishes us to do good even before others, that it may be profitable to them: So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.[1095] Therefore when you do good, have first the intention of pleasing God; and secondly, that also of giving a good example to your neighbour. In the second place, in our bodily actions; whether we work, eat, drink, or amuse ourselves with propriety, let us do all in order to please God. Purity of intention may be called the heavenly alchemy, which changes iron into gold; by which is meant, that the most trivial and ordinary actions when done to please God become acts of divine love. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi used to say: "A person who performs all his actions with a pure intention will go straight to paradise." A holy hermit, before putting his hand to any work, used to raise his eyes to heaven, and keep them fixed there for a short time; and when he was asked what he was doing, he answered: "I am taking my aim, so that I may not miss the mark." Let us also do in like manner: before beginning any action, le t us make sure of our aim, and say: "Lord, I do this to please Thee."

§ 7.·RULES FOR AVOIDING TEPIDITY

Souls that make no account of venial sins, and give themselves up to tepidity, without a thought of freeing themselves from it, live in great danger. We do not here speak of those venial sins that are committed by mere frailty, such as useless or idle words, interior disquietudes, and negligence in small matters; but we speak of venial sins committed with full deliberation, above all when they are habitual. St. Teresa writes thus: "From all deliberate sin, howsoever small it may be, O Lord, deliver us!" Ven. Alvarez used to say: "Those little backbitings, dislikes, culpable curiosity, acts of impatience and in temperance, do not indeed kill the soul, but they so weaken it, that when any great temptation takes it unexpectedly, it will not have strength enough to resist, and will consequently fall." So that as on the one hand deliberate venial sins weaken the soul, so on the other do they deprive us of the divine assistance; for it is but just that God should be sparing with those who are sparing towards him: He who sows sparingly, shall also reap sparingly. [1096]‘ And that is what a soul that has received special graces from God has the most reason to fear. Still more ought it to fear lest such faults should be caused by some passionate attachment, as of ambition, or avarice, or of aversion, or inordinate affection towards any person. It happens not unfrequently to souls that are in bondage to some passion, as it does to gamblers, who, after losing many times, at the last throw say, "Let us risk everything;" and so finish by losing all they have. In what a miserable state is that soul which is the slave of some passion; for passion blinds us, and lets us no longer see what we are doing. Let us now come to the practice of what we have to do, in order to be able to deliver ourselves from the wretched state of tepidity.

It is necessary in the first place to have a firm desire to get out of this state. The good desire lightens our labour, and gives us strength to go forward. And let us rest assured that he who makes no progress in the way of God will always be going back; and he will go back so far that at last he will fall over some precipice.

Secondly, let us try to find out our predominant faults to which we are most attached, whether it be anger, ambition, or inordinate affection to persons or things: a resolute will overcomes all with the help of God.

Thirdly, we must avoid the occasion, otherwise all our resolutions will fall to the ground.

And lastly, we must above all be diffident of our own strength, and pray continually with all confidence to God, begging him to help us in the danger in which we are, and to deliver us from those temptations by which we shall fall into sin; which is the meaning of the petition, Ne nos inducas in tentationem, "Lead us not into temptation." He who prays obtains: Ask, and you shall receive. [1097]‘ This is a promise of God, and can never fail; therefore we must always pray, always pray; and let us never leave off repeating, "We must pray always, we must pray always; my God help me, and that soon!"

§ 8. THE PRACTICE OF DEVOTION TOWARDS THE GREAT MOTHER OF GOD

As regards this devotion, I hope that the reader is fully persuaded that, in order to insure eternal salvation, it is most important to be devout to the Most Holy Mary. And if he should wish to be still more convinced of it I would beg him to read the book I have written called The Glories of Mary. We shall here speak only of the practices you may observe, that you may obtain the protection of this sovereign Lady.

First, every morning and evening, when you rise and before you go to bed, say three Hail Marys, adding this short prayer: " By thy pure and immaculate conception, O Mary, make me pure in body and holy in soul!" And put yourself beneath her mantle, that she may keep you that day or that night from sin. And every time you hear the clock strike, say a Hail Mary; do the same whenever you go in or out of the house, and when you pass by any picture or statue of the Blessed Virgin. So also when you begin and finish any of your occupations, such as your study, work, eating, or sleeping, never omit to say a Hail Mary.

Secondly, say the Rosary, meditating on the mysteries, every day, at least five decades. Many devout people also say the Office of Our Lady; it would be well to say at least the Little Office of the Name of Mary, which is very short, and composed of five short psalms.

Thirdly, say an Our Father and Hail Mary every day to the ever blessed Trinity in thanksgiving for the graces that have been bestowed upon Mary. The Blessed Virgin herself revealed to a person that this devotion was very pleasing to her.

Fourthly, fast on bread and water every Saturday in honour of Mary, or at least on the vigils of her seven feasts; or at least fast in the ordinary way, or eat only of one dish, or abstain from something you like. In short, make use of some kind of mortification on Saturdays, and on the above—named vigils, for the sake of this Queen, who, as St. Andrew of Crete says, repays these little things with great graces.

Fifthly, pay a visit every day to some image of your patroness, and ask her to give you holy perseverance and the love of Jesus Christ.

Sixthly, let no day pass without reading a little about Our Lady, or else say some prayer to this Blessed Virgin. For this purpose we have here put seven prayers to Mary, for the seven days of the week (see Chap. II § 7). Seventhly, make the novenas for the seven principal feasts of Mary, and ask your confessor to tell you what devotions and mortifications you should practise during those nine days: say at least nine Hail Marys and Glory be to the Father, and beg her each day of the novena to give you some special grace that you need.

Lastly, often recommend yourself to this divine Mother during the day, and particularly in time of temptation, saying at such times, and often repeating with great affection, "Mary, help me! help me, my Mother!" And if you love Mary, try to promote devo tion to this great Mother of God among your relatives, friends, and servants.

§ 9. ON THE PRACTICE OF CERTAIN MEANS BY WHICH WE MAY ACQUIRE THE LOVE OF JESUS CHRIST

Jesus Christ ought to be our whole love. He is worthy of it, both because he is a God of infinite goodness, and because he has loved us to such an excess, that he died for us. Oh, how great are our obligations to Jesus Christ! All the good we enjoy, all our inspirations, calls, pardons, helps, hopes, consolations, sweetnesses, and loving affections, come to us through Jesus Christ. Let us see by what means we are to acquire this love of Jesus Christ.

In the first place, we must desire to have this love of Jesus Christ, and we must, therefore, often ask him to give it us, especially in our prayers, in our Communions, and in the visit to the Blessed Sacrament. And this grace must also be sought for at the hands of the ever—blessed Mary, from our guardian angel and our holy patrons, that they may enable us to love Jesus Christ. St. Francis de Sales says that the grace of loving Jesus Christ contains all other graces in itself, because he who truly loves Jesus Christ cannot be wanting in any virtue.

In the second place, if we wish to acquire the love of Jesus Christ, we must detach our hearts from all earthly affections; divine love will find no place in a heart that is full of this world. St. Philip Neri used to say: "The love we give to creatures is all so much taken from God."

In the third place, we must often exercise ourselves, especially when we pray, in making acts of love to Jesus Christ. Acts of love are the fuel with which we keep alive the fire of holy charity. Let us make acts of love and complacency, saying: "My Jesus, I rejoice that Thou art infinitely happy, and that Thy eternal Father loves Thee as much as himself!" Of benevolence: "I wish, my Jesus, that all could know and love Thee!" Of predilection, as: "My Jesus, I love Thee more than all things! I love Thee more than myself!" Let us also often make acts of contrition, which are called acts of sorrowful love.

In the fourth place, if any one wishes to make sure of being inflamed with love towards Jesus Christ, let him often try to meditate on his Passion. It was revealed to a holy solitary, that no exercise was more efficacious in enkindling love, than the consideration of the sufferings and ignominy which Jesus Christ endured for love of us. I say it is impossible that a soul, meditating often on the Passion of Christ, should be able to resist his love. It was for this that, although he could have saved us by one drop of his blood, nay even by a single prayer, he chose to suffer so much, and to shed all his blood, that he might attract all hearts to love him; therefore he who meditates on his Passion does what is very agreeable to him. Do you then often make your meditation on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. Do so at least every Friday, the day on which he died for the love of us. For this purpose I have written many meditations on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, especially the Darts of Fire, which speak of the love which Jesus Christ has borne us in the great work of our redemption.[1098]

ADMONITIONS ADDRESSED TO PERSONS OF ALL STATES WHO DESIRE TO BE SAVED.[1099]

God wishes us all to be saved: Who will have all men saved.[1100] "And he is ready to give to all the help necessary for salvation; but he grants it only to those that ask him, as St. Augustine says: "He gives only to those who ask."[1101] Hence, it is a common opinion of theologians and of the holy Fathers, that prayer is necessary for adults as a means of salvation; that is to say, that a person who does not pray, and neglects to ask of God the help requisite for overcoming temptations, and for preserving grace already received, cannot be saved.

On the other hand, our Lord cannot refuse to give graces to those who ask for them, because he has promised to do so: Cry to Me, and I will hear thee.[1102] Have recourse to me, and I will not fail to hear you. Ask of me all you desire, and you shall attain it: Ask, and it shall be given to you.[1103] These promises, however, are not to be understood with reference to temporal goods, because God only gives these when they are for the good of the soul; but he has promised 'absolutely to give spiritual graces to any one who asks him; and having promised it, he is obliged to give them to us: "By his promise, he has made himself our debtor," says St. Augustine.

It should also be observed, that on God's part prayer is a promise, and on our part a binding precept: Ask and it shall be given you.[1104] We ought always to pray.[1105] These words, "ask, we ought," convey, as St. Thomas teaches, a grave precept, which is binding for our whole life; but especially when a man is in danger of death, of falling into sin; because if he does not then have recourse to God, he will certainly be overcome. And he who has already fallen under God's displeasure commits a fresh sin when he does not turn to God for help to rise out of his miserable state. But will God then hear him while he is yet his enemy? Yes, he does hear, if the sinner humbles himself, and prays for pardon from his heart; since it is written in the Gospel: For every one that asketh, receiveth.[1106] It says that God has promised to hear all that pray to him, whether they are just or sinners. In another place God says, Call upon Me . . . and I will deliver Thee.[1107] Call upon Me, and I will deliver thee from hell to which thou dost stand condemned.

No, there will be no excuse in the day of judgment for any one who dies in mortal sin. It will be of no use for him to say that he had not the strength to resist the temptation which troubled him; because Jesus Christ will answer: If you had not the strength, why did you not ask it of me, and I should certainly have given it you? If you fell into sin, why did you not have recourse to me, that I might have delivered you from it?

You see, then, that if you desire to be saved, and would keep yourself in the grace of God, you must often pray to him, that he would keep his hand over you. The Council of Trent declares that for a man to persevere in the grace of God, it is not enough that he should have only that general aid which he gives to all; but he must also have that special assistance which can only be obtained by prayer. For this reason all the Doctors of the Church say, that each one is bound, under grievous sin, to recommend himself often to God, and to ask for the grace of holy perseverance at least once a month. And any one who finds himself in the midst of many dangerous occasions is under the obligation of asking more frequently for the grace of perseverance.

It is besides most useful to keep up some particular devotion to the Mother of God, who is called the Mother of perseverance, in order to obtain this grace; and a person who has not this special devotion to the Blessed Virgin will find it very difficult to persevere; for as St. Bernard says, all divine graces, and especially this one of perseverance, which is the greatest of all, come to us by means of Mary.

Would to God that preachers were more mindful in putting before their hearers this great means of prayer! Some even in the whole course of their Lenten sermons scarcely mention it more than once or twice in passing: while they ought often to make it their chief subject, besides speaking of it in every discourse; if they omit to do so, they will have to render a severe account for it to God. Thus also many confessors are particular merely about the resolution their penitents make not to offend God again, and few take the trouble to inculcate that they must pray when they are tempted again to fall; but we must be well persuaded, that when a temptation is violent, if the penitent does not beg for God's assistance, all his resolutions will avail him little; prayer alone can save him. It is certain that he who prays is saved; he who prays not is damned.

Therefore, I repeat, if you wish to be saved, pray continually to the Lord that he would give you light and strength not to fall into sin. Thus we must be importunate with God, in asking him for his grace. "This importunity with God is our opportunity," say St Jerome. Every morning we must beseech him to keep us from sin during that day. And when any bad thought or occasion of sin presents itself to your mind or you are tempted by some dangerous occasion, immediately have recourse to Jesus Christ and the Blessed Virgin, and say, "My Jesus, help me! Most Blessed Virgin, come to my aid." It is enough at such a time to pronounce the names of Jesus and Mary, and the temptation will. vanish; but should the temptation continue, persevere in invoking the assistance of Jesus and Mary, and you will be victorious.

PROTESTATION FOR A HAPPY DEATH.

MY God, prostrate in Thy presence, I adore Thee; and I intend to make the following protestations, as if I were on the point of passing from this life to eternity:

My Lord, because Thou art infallible truth, and hast revealed it to the holy Church, I believe in the mystery of the Most Holy Trinity—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; three Persons, but only one God, who eternally rewards the just with heaven, and punishes sinners with hell. I believe that the second Person—that is, the Son of God—became man and died for the salvation of men; and I believe all that the holy Church believes. I thank Thee for having made me a Christian; and I protest that in this holy faith I wish to live and die.

My God, my hope, trusting in Thy promises, I hope from Thy mercy, not through my merits, but through the merits of Jesus Christ, for the pardon of my sins, perseverance in Thy grace, and, after this miserable life, for the glory of heaven. And should the devil, at death, tempt me to despair at the sight of my sins, I protest that I wish always to hope in Thee, my Lord, and that I wish to die in the loving arms of Thy goodness.

O God, worthy of infinite love! I love Thee with my whole heart, and more than I love myself; and I protest that I wish to die making an act of love, that thus I may continue to love Thee for eternity in heaven; which, for this purpose, I ask and desire from Thee. And if, O Lord! instead of loving Thee, I have hitherto despised Thy infinite Goodness, I am sorry for it with my whole heart, and I protest that I wish to die bewailing and detesting forever the offences I have offered to Thee. I purpose, for the future, to die rather than commit another sin. And, for the love of Thee, I pardon all who have offended me.

O my God! I accept death, and all the pains that will accompany my death. I unite them to the sorrows and to the death of Jesus Christ, and offer them in honour of Thy supreme dominion, and in satisfaction for my sins.

O Lord! for the sake of the great sacrifice of himself which Thy divine Son offered on the altar of the cross, accept this sacrifice of my life, which I offer to The. I now, for the moment of my death, resign myself entirely to Thy divine will, protesting that I wish to die, saying: O Lord! Thy will be always done.

Most holy Virgin Mary, my advocate and my mother, thou, after God, art and shalt be my hope and consolation at the hour of death. I now invoke thee, and pray thee to assist me in that great passage. My dear queen, do not abandon me at that last moment. Come, then, and take my soul, and present it to thy Son. From this moment I expect thee, and hope to die under thy protection and prostrate at thy feet. My protector, St. Joseph, St. Michael the archangel, my angel—guardian, my holy advocates, come all, and assist me in that last battle with hell.

And Thou, my crucified Love—Thou, my Jesus, who, to obtain for me a good death, hast voluntarily chosen so painful a death, remember at that hour that I am one of the sheep which Thou hast purchased with Thy blood. O my Saviour, who alone can console me and save me at that hour when every one on this earth will have abandoned me and when no friend will be able to assist me! make me then worthy to receive Thee for my Viaticum. Do not permit me to lose Thee forever, and to go forever to remain at a distance from Thee. No, my beloved Saviour; since I now embrace Thee, receive me then into Thy holy wounds. At my last breath I intend to breathe forth my soul into the loving wound in Thy side, saying now, for that moment: Jesus and Mary, I give Thee my heart and my soul: Jesus and Mary, I give Thee my heart and my soul.

Happy suffering, to suffer for God! Happy death, to die in the Lord!

I embrace Thee, my good Redeemer, that I may die in Thy embraces. If, O my soul! at your departure from this world, Mary assists you, and Jesus receives you, death will be for you not death, but sweet repose.

'Tis blessed to suffer, Creator most kind;
'Tis blessed to die, and to suffer for Thee.
I embrace Thee, O Crucified! hoping to find
Thine arms everlasting in death circling me.
So it will not be death, but ineffable rest,
That shall close at the last on these earth—wearied eyes,
When my forehead by Mary is soothingly prest,
And Jesus receives my last penitent sighs.

A Short Prayer to be said every day to Jesus crucified, and to our Lady of Sorrows, to obtain the grace of a happy death.

My Lord Jesus Christ, by that bitterness which Thou didst endure on the cross, when Thy blessed soul was separated from Thy most sacred body, have pity on my sinful soul, when it leaves my miserable body to enter into eternity.

O Mary! by that grief which thou didst experience on Calvary in seeing Jesus expire on the cross before thine eyes, obtain for me a good death, that loving Jesus and thee, my Mother, in this life, I may attain heaven, where I shall love thee for all eternity.

Latin Prayer for the Same Object.

Domine Jesu Christe, per illam amaritudinem quam sustinuit nobilissima anima tua, quando egressa est de benedicto corpore tuo, miserere animæ meæ peccatricis, quando egredietur de corpore meo. Amen.

HYMN

Mary our Hope.
Mary, thou art hope the brightest,
Love most pure and sweet;
Life and peace I find reposing
At thy blessed feet!
When I call on thee, O Mary!
When I think on thee,
Joy and pleasure all entrancing
Fill my heart with glee.
If anon the clouds of sadness
Rise within my heart, when they hear thy name, O Mary!
Straightway they depart.
Li k e a star on life's dark ocean,
Shining o'er the wave,
Thou canst guide m y bark to harbor.
Thou my soul canst save.
Under thy protecting mantle,
Queen belov'd, I fly;
There I wish to live securely,
There I hope to die.
If I chance my life to finish
Mary, loving thee,
Then I also know, dear Lady,
Heaven is for me.
Cast thy gentle bonds around me,
And my heart enchain;
Prisoner of love forever,
Safe will I remain.
Thus my heart, O sweetest Mary!
Is not mine, but thine:
Take it; give it all to Jesus;
Ne'er shall it be mine.

NOTICE

THIS volume contains the quintessence of the science of the saints. It gives a correct idea of the spirit, of the heart, and of the talent of Saint Alphonsus: one might say that in it his whole soul is poured out.

The entire work is divided into three parts. In the first, we resume, under another form, the considerations on the eternal truths or the Last Things, treated at greater length in the preceding volume. The second part traces and paves the way that leads to divine love, or to sanctity and true happiness, and inspires us at the same time with the desire, the zeal, and the courage to undertake everything to reach this end. The third part transports us to the summit of the holy mountain, or Christian perfection, shows us in detail the mysteries of the interior life, and enables us to breathe its sweetest perfume.

Some persons have objected that the writings of Saint Alphonsus contain many repetitions. This is true in regard to the ascetical works; but these repetitions are not useless. There is no question here of a study, a scientific work done for the sole purpose of exercising the mind. It is a food destined to give strength to the life of the soul. Each one takes for himself everyday the amount that agrees with his spiritual temperament. But let us hear what the author himself says in regard to this matter: "I entreat my readers not to grow weary if in those prayers they always find petitions for the grace of perseverance and the grace of divine love. For us, these are the two graces most necessary for the attainment of eternal salvation."[1108] He also says: "One should not find it tiresome that I repeat the texts that I have already cited several times. . . . The authors of pernicious books, who treat of obscene things, reproduce even to satiety their impure sallies in order to inflame their imprudent readers with the fire of concupiscence; and should it not be permitted to me to repeat sacred texts that are most suitable to inflame souls with divine love?"[1109] Ah, let us never grow tired of reading and meditating on what the holy bishop has had the patience to write so many times for our benefit. ED.

PART I

Meditations Suitable for All Times in the Year[1110]

Meditation I

ETERNAL SALVATION

1. Our most important affair is that of our eternal salvation; upon it depends our happiness or misery for ever. This affair will come to an end in eternity, and will decide whether we shall be saved or lost forever; whether we shall have acquired an eternity of delights, or an eternity of torments; whether we shall live forever happy, or forever miserable. O God! what will my lot be? Shall I be saved, or shall 1 be lost? I may be either. And if I may be lost, why do I not embrace such a life, as may secure for me life eternal? O Jesus! Thou didst die to save me; yet have I been lost, as often as I have lost Thee, my sovereign good: suffer me not to lose Thee any more.

2. Men esteem it a great affair to gain a lawsuit, to obtain a post of honour, or to acquire an estate. Nothing, however, that will end with time deserves to be esteemed great. Since, therefore, all the goods of this world will one day end in our regard, as we shall either leave them or they will leave us, that affair alone should be esteemed great, upon which depends eternal happiness or eternal misery.

O Jesus, my Redeemer, cast me not away from Thy face, as I have deserved! I am indeed a sinner; but I am grieved from the bottom of my heart for having offended Thy infinite goodness. Hitherto I have despised Thee, but now I love Thee above all things. Henceforth Thou alone shalt be my only good, my only love. Have pity on a sinner who penitently casts himself at Thy feet, and desires to love Thee. If I have grievously offended Thee, I now ardently desire to love Thee. What would have become of me, if Thou hadst called me out of life when I had lost Thy grace and favour? Since Thou, O Lord! hast shown so much mercy to me, grant me grace to become a saint.

3. Let us awaken our faith in a heaven and a hell of eternal duration: one or other will be our lot. O God! how could I, knowing that by committing sin I was condemning myself to eternal torments how could I sin so often against Thee and forfeit Thy grace? Knowing that Thou art my God and my Redeemer, how could I, for the sake of a miserable gratification, so often turn my back upon Thee? O God, I am sorry above every evil for having thus despised Thee. I love Thee above every good, and henceforth I will suffer the loss of all things rather than lose Thy friendship. Give me strength to continue faithful. And do Thou, O Blessed Virgin Mary! pray for me and assist me.

Meditation II

SIN AS IT DISHONOURS GOD

1. By transgression of the law thou dishonourest God.[1111] When the sinner deliberates whether he shall give or refuse his consent to sin, he takes the balance into his hands to decide which is of most value the favour of God, some passion, some worldly interest or pleasure. When he yields to temptation, what does he do? He decides that some wretched gratification is more desirable than the favour of God. Thus it is that he dishonours God, declaring, by his consent, that a miserable pleasure is preferable to the divine friendship. Thus, then, O God! have I so many times dishonoured Thee, by esteeming Thee less than my miserable passions.

2. Of this the Almighty complains by the prophet Ezekiel, when he says: They violated Me among My people, for a handful of barley and a piece of bread.[1112] If the sinner should exchange God for a treasure of jewels, or for a kingdom, it would indeed be doing a great evil, because God is of infinitely more value than all the treasures and kingdoms of the earth. But for what do so many exchange him? for a vapour, for a little dirt, for a poisoned pleasure, which is no sooner tasted than it vanishes.

God! how could I have had the heart for such vile things, so often to despise Thee, who hast shown so much love for me? But behold, my Redeemer, how I now love Thee above all things; and because I love Thee, I feel more regret for having lost Thee, my God, than if I had lost all other goods, and even my life. Have pity on me, and forgive me. I will never more incur Thy displeasure. Grant that I may rather die than offend Thee any more.

3. Lord, who is like to Thee?[1113] And what good things, God! can be comparable to Thee, O infinite goodness? But how could I have turned my back upon Thee, to give myself to those vile things which sin held out to me? O Jesus, Thy precious blood is my hope. Thou hast promised to hear him who prays to Thee. I ask Thee not for the goods of this world: I ask Thee for the pardon of those sins which I have committed against Thee, and for which I am sorry above every other evil. I ask Thee for perseverance in Thy grace until the end of my life. I ask Thee for the gift of Thy holy love; my soul is enamoured of Thy goodness; hear me, O Lord! Only grant that I may love Thee both here and hereafter, and to all things else do with me as Thou pleasest. My Lord, and my only good, suffer me not to be any more separated from Thee! Mary, Mother of God, do thou also listen to me, and obtain for me that I may ever belong to God, and that God may be my inheritance forever.

Meditation III

THE PATIENCE OF GOD IN WAITING FOR SINNERS

1. Who in this world has so much patience with his equals as God with us his creatures, in bearing with us, and waiting for our repentance, after the many offences we have committed against him? Ah! my God, had I thus offended my brother or my father, long ago would he have driven me from his face! O Father of mercies, cast me not away from Thy face,[1114] but have pity on me.

2. Thou hast mercy, says the wise man, upon all, because Thou canst do all things, and overlookest the sins of men for the sake of repentance.[1115] Men conceal their sense of the injuries which they receive, either because they are good, and know that it belongs not to themselves to punish those who offend them; or because they are unable, and have not the power to revenge themselves. But to Thee, my God, it does belong to take revenge of the offences which are committed against Thy infinite majesty; and thou indeed art able to avenge Thyself, whenever Thou pleaseth; and dost Thou dissemble? Men despise Thee; they make promises to Thee and afterwards betray Thee; and dost Thou seem not to behold them, or as if Thou hadst little concern for Thy honour? Thus, O Jesus, hast Thou done towards me. Ah! my God, my infinite good, I will no longer despise Thee, I will no longer provoke Thee to chastise me. And why should I delay until Thou abandonest me in reality and condemnest me to hell? I am truly sorry for all my offences against Thee. I would that I had died rather than offend Thee! Thou art my Lord, Thou hast created me, and Thou hast redeemed me by Thy death; Thou alone hast loved, Thou alone deservest to be loved, and Thou alone shall be the sole object of my love.

3. My soul, how could you be so ungrateful and so daring against your God? When you offended him, could he not have suddenly called you out of life and punished you with hell? And yet he waited for you; instead of chastising you, he preserved your life and gave you good things. But you, instead of being grateful to him and loving him for such excessive goodness, you continued to offend him! O my Lord, since Thou hast waited for me with so great mercy, I give Thee thanks. I am sorry for having offended Thee. I love Thee. I might at this hour have dwelt in hell, where I could not have repented, nor have loved Thee. But now that I can repent, I grieve with my whole heart for having offended Thy infinite goodness; and I love Thee above all things, more than I love myself. Forgive me, and grant that from this day I may love no other but Thee, who hast so loved me. May I live for Thee alone, my Redeemer, who for me didst die upon the cross! All my hopes are in Thy bitter Passion. O Mary, Mother of God! assist me by thy holy intercession.

Meditation IV

THE CERTAINTY OF DEATH

1. We must die! how awful is the decree! we must die. The sentence is passed: It is appointed for all men once to die.[1116] Thou art a man and thou must die. St. Cyprian says that we are born with a rope around our necks, and as long as we live on earth we hourly approach the gallows, that is, the sickness that puts an end to our life. It would be madness for any one to delude himself with the idea that he shall not die. A poor man may flatter himself that he may become rich, or a vassal that he may be a king; but who can ever hope to escape death? One dies old, another young, but all at last must come to the grave. I therefore must one day die and enter eternity. But what will be my lot for eternity? happy or miserable? My Saviour Jesus, be Thou a Saviour to me!

2. Of all those who were living upon the earth at the beginning of the last century, not one is now alive. The greatest and most renowned princes of this world have exchanged their country; scarcely does there remain any remembrance of them, and their bare bones are hardly preserved in stone monuments. Make me, O God! more and more sensible of the folly of loving the goods of this world, and for the sake of them renouncing Thee, my sovereign and infinite good. What folly have I not been guilty of; and how much it grieves me! I give Thee thanks for having made me sensible of it.

3. A hundred years hence, at most, and neither you nor I will be any longer in this world; both will have gone into the house of eternity. A day, an hour, a moment, is approaching which will be the last both for you and me; and this hour, this moment, is already fixed by Almighty God; how then can we think of anything else but of loving God, who will then be our judge? Alas! what will my death be? O my Jesus and my judge! what will become of me when I shall have to appear before Thee to give an account of my whole life? Pardon me, I beseech Thee, before that moment arrives which will decide my happiness or misery for eternity. I am sorry for having offended Thee, my sovereign good. Hitherto I have not loved Thee; but now I will love Thee with my whole soul. Grant me the grace of perseverance. O Mary, refuge of sinners, have pity on me!

Meditation V

THE LOSS OF ALL THINGS IN DEATH

1. The day of destruction is at hand.[1117] The day of death is called the day of destruction, because then is destroyed all that man has acquired; honours, friends, riches, possessions, kingdoms all are then no more. What then doth it profit us to gain the whole world if in death we must leave all? All is at an end at the bedside of the dying man. Is there any king, think you, said St. Ignatius to Xavier when he sought to bring him to God, who has taken with him into the other world even a thread of purple to mark his sovereignty? Has any rich man taken with him a single coin, or even one servant to attend him? In death all is left behind. The soul enters eternity alone and unattended, except by its works. Woe to me! where are my works to accompany me to a blessed eternity? I can discover none but such as render me deserving of eternal torments.

2. Men come into the world in unequal conditions: one is born rich, another poor, one a noble, another a plebeian; but all go out of it equal and alike. Consider the graves of the dead: see if you can discover among the bodies which are there interred, who was a master and who a servant, who was a king and who a beggar. O God! while others amass the fortunes of this world, may my only fortune be Thy holy grace. Thou alone art my only good both in this life and in the next.

3. In one word, everything on earth will come to an end. All greatness will end, all misery will end, honours will end, ignominies will end; pleasures will end, sufferings will end. Blessed in death, therefore, not he who has abounded in riches, honours, and pleasures, but he who has patiently endured poverty, contempt, and sufferings! The possession of temporal goods affords no consolation at the moment of death: that alone consoles us which has been done or suffered for God. O Jesus! separate my heart from this world, before death entirely takes me from it. Help me with Thy grace; Thou indeed knowest how great is my weakness. Permit me not to be any more unfaithful to Thee, as I have hitherto been. I am sorry, O Lord! for having so often despised Thee. Now will I love Thee above every good, and will die a thousand times rather than forfeit Thy grace. But the infernal one ceases not to tempt me; in mercy abandon me not, leave me not to myself, permit me not to be any more separated from Thy love. O Mary, my hope! obtain for me the grace of perseverance.

Meditation VI

THE GREAT THOUGHT OF ETERNITY

1. Thus did St. Augustine designate the thought of eternity: "The great thought" "magna cogitatio." It was this thought that induced so many solitaries to retire into deserts; so many religious, even kings and queens, to shut themselves up in cloisters; and so many martyrs to sacrifice their lives in the midst of torments, in order to acquire a happy eternity in heaven, and to avoid a miserable eternity in hell. The Ven. John of Avila converted a certain lady with these two words: "Reflect," said he to her, "on these two words: Ever and Never." A certain monk went down into a grave that he might meditate continually on eternity, and constantly repeated, "O eternity! eternity!" How frequently, my God, have I deserved the eternity of hell! Oh, that I had never offended Thee! Grant me sorrow for my sins; have compassion on me.

2. The same Ven. John of Avila says, that he who believes in eternity and becomes not a saint should be confined as one deranged. He who builds a house for himself takes great pains to make it commodious, airy, and handsome, and says: "I labour and give myself a great deal of trouble about this house, because I shall have to live in it all my life." And yet how little is the house of eternity thought of! When we shall have arrived at eternity there will be no question of our residing in a house more or less commodious, or more or less airy: the question will be of our dwelling in a palace overflowing with delights, or in a gulf of endless torments. And for how long a time? not for forty or fifty years, but forever, as long as God shall be God. The saints, to obtain salvation, thought it little to give their whole lives to prayer, penance, and the practice of good works. And what do we do for the same end?

O my God! many years of my life are already past, already death is near at hand, and what good have I hitherto done for Thee? Give me light, and strength, to devote the remainder of my days to Thy service. Too much, alas! have I offended Thee; I desire hence forth to love Thee.

3. With fear and trembling work out your salvation.[1118] To obtain salvation we must tremble at the thought of being lost, and tremble not so much at the thought of hell, as of sin, which alone can send us thither. He who dreads sin avoids dangerous occasions, frequently recommends himself to God, and has recourse to the means of keeping himself in the state of grace. He who acts thus will be saved; but for him who lives not in this manner it is morally impossible to be saved. Let us attend to that saying of St. Bernard: "We cannot be too secure where eternity is at stake."[1119] Thy blood, O Jesus, my Redeemer! is my security. I should have been already lost on account of my sins, hadst Thou not offered me Thy pardon, on condition of my repentance for having offended Thee. I am sorry therefore with my whole heart for having offended Thee, who art infinite goodness. I love Thee, O sovereign good! above every other good, I know that Thou willest my salvation, and I will endeavour to secure it by loving Thee forever. O Mary, Mother of God! pray to Jesus for me.

Meditation VII

THE DEATH OF JESUS CHRIST

1. How is it possible to believe that the Creator should have been willing to die for us, his creatures? Yet we must believe it because faith so teaches it. Hence the Council of Nice commands us to confess: "I believe in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who for us men and for our salvation was crucified for us, suffered, and was buried."[1120] And if it is true, O God of love! that Thou hast died for the love of men, can there be one who believes this, and does not love Thee, so loving a God? But, O God! of those who are guilty of such ingratitude I am one; and not only have I not loved Thee, my Redeemer, but I have many times, for the sake of gratifying my miserable and depraved inclinations, renounced Thy grace and Thy love.

2. Thou hast then, my Lord and my God, died for me; and how could I, knowing this, have so often disowned Thee and turned my back upon Thee? But Thou, my Saviour, didst come down from heaven to save that which was lost.[1121] My ingratitude, therefore, does not deprive me of the hope of pardon. Yes, O Jesus! I hope that Thou wilt pardon me all offences which I have committed against Thee, through the death which Thou didst suffer for me on Mount Calvary. Oh that I could die of grief and of love as often as I think of the offences which I have committed against the love which Thou hast shown towards me! Make known to me, O Lord! what I must do henceforward to make amends for my ingratitude. Keep up in my mind a continual remembrance of the bitter death Thou wast pleased to suffer for me, that I may love Thee and never more offend Thee.

3. God, then, has died for me; and shall I be able to love anything else but God? No, my Jesus, I will love none but Thee. Thou hast loved me too much. Thou canst do no more to compel me to love Thee. I have obliged Thee by my sins to cast me away from Thy face; but Thou hast not abandoned me forever; Thou regardest me with tender affection; Thou art about to call me to Thy love; I will no longer resist. I love Thee, my sovereign good; I love Thee, my God, who art worthy of infinite love; I love Thee, my God, who hast died for me. I love Thee, but I love Thee not enough; do Thou increase my love. Grant that I may forsake all things, and forget all things else, to please and to love Thee, my Redeemer, my love, and my all. O Mary, my hope! recommend me to thy divine Son.

Meditation VIII

THE ABUSE OF GOD'S MERCY

1. There are two ways by which the devil endeavours to deceive men to their eternal ruin: after they have committed sin he tempts them to despair on account of the severity of divine justice; but before they have sinned he encourages them to do so by the hope of obtaining the divine mercy. And he effects the ruin of numberless souls as well by the second as by the first artifice. "God is merciful," says the obstinate sinner to him who would convert him from the iniquity of his ways. "God is merciful." But as the Mother of God expresses it in her canticle, His mercy is to them that fear Him.[1122] Yes, the Lord deals mercifully with him that fears to offend him, but not so with the man who presumes upon his mercy to offend him still more. O God! I give Thee thanks for having made me sensible of Thy patience in bearing with me. Behold, I am of the number of those who, presuming on Thy goodness, have offended Thee again and again.

2. God is merciful; but he is also just. Sinners are desirous that he should be merciful only, without being just; but that is impossible, because were he only to forgive and never to chastise, he would be wanting in justice. Hence Father Avila observes that patience on the part of God towards those who avail themselves of his compassion to offend him the more, would not be compassion, but a want of justice. He is bound to chastise the ungrateful. He bears with them for a certain time, but after that abandons them.

Such a punishment, O God! has not as yet overtaken me, or else I had now dwelt in hell, or had been obstinate in my sins. But no: I desire to amend my life; I desire to offend Thee no more. Though I have hitherto displeased Thee, I am sorry for it with my whole soul; I desire henceforth to love Thee, and I desire to love Thee more than others do, because Thou hast not shown the same patience towards others as towards me.

3. God is not mocked.[1123] Yet he would be mocked, if the sinner could go on continually offending him, and yet afterwards enjoy him in heaven. What things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap.[1124] He who sows good works shall reap rewards; but he who sows iniquities shall reap chastisements. The hope of those who commit sin because God is forgiving, is an abomination in his sight: their hope, says holy Job, is an abomination.[1125] Hence the sinner, by such hope, provokes God to chastise him the sooner, as that servant would provoke his master, who, because his master was good, took advantage of his goodness to behave ill.

O Jesus! such, I fear, has been my conduct towards Thee; because Thou wast good I have made no account of Thy precepts. I confess that I have done wickedly; and I detest all the offences I have committed against Thee. Now do I love Thee more than myself, and I desire never more to displease Thee. Ah, if I should again offend Thee by mortal sin! Permit it not, O Lord; rather let me die. O Mary, Mother of perseverance, do thou assist me.

Meditation IX

THE EMPTINESS AND SHORTNESS OF HUMAN LIFE

1. Holy David said that the happiness of this life is as the dream of one awaking from sleep: as the dream of them that awake[1126] All the greatness and glory of this world will appear no more to poor wordlings, at the hour of death, than as a dream to one awaking from sleep, who finds that the fortune which he had acquired in his dream ends with his sleep. Hence, did one who was undeceived wisely write on the skull of a dead man, "Cogitanti omnia vilescunt" He who thinks, undervalues all things. Yes, to him who thinks on death, all the goods of this life appear, as they really are, vile and transitory. Nor can that man fix his affections on the earth who reflects that in a short time he must leave it forever. Ah, my God, how often have I despised Thy grace for the miserable goods of this world! Henceforth I desire to think of nothing but of loving and serving Thee. Assist me with Thy holy grace.

2. "And is it thus, then, that worldly grandeur and sovereign power must end?" Such was the exclamation of St. Francis Borgia, when he beheld the corpse of the Empress Isabella, who died in the flower of her youth. Reflecting upon what he saw, he resolved to bid adieu to the world, and to give himself entirely to God, saying, "I will henceforth serve a master who will never forsake me." Let us detach ourselves from present goods before death tears us away from them. What folly it is to expose ourselves to the danger of losing our souls, for the sake of some attachment to this miserable world, from which we shall soon have to depart; for soon it will be said to us by the minister of God, "Go forth, Christian soul, out of this world!"[1127]

O my Jesus, that I had always loved Thee! How many offences have I been guilty of against Thee! Teach me how to correct my disorderly life, for I am willing to do whatever Thou pleasest. Accept of my love, accept of my repentance, in which I love Thee more than myself, and crave Thy mercy and compassion.

3. Reflect that you cannot remain forever in this world. You must one day leave the country in which you now reside; you must one day go out from the house in which you now dwell to return to it no more. Think that many before you inhabited the same room in which you are at present reading; that they slept in the same bed in which you are accustomed to sleep; and where are they? gone into eternity. The same will happen to you. Make me sensible, O God, of the injustice I have been guilty of in turning my back upon Thee, my sovereign good; and grant me the sorrow to bewail my ingratitude as I ought. O that I had died rather than ever offended Thee! Suffer me not to live any longer ungrateful for the love which Thou hast shown me. My dear Redeemer, I love Thee above all things, and I desire to love Thee to the best of my power during the remainder of life. Strengthen my weakness by Thy grace; and do thou, Mary, Mother of God, intercede for me.

Meditation X

THE CONTEMPT WITH WHICH THE SINNER TREATS GOD

1. God himself declares that the sinner treats him with contempt, and complains of it in these words: I have brought up children, and exalted them; but they have despised me.[1128] I have brought up my children, I have preserved and nourished them, but with base ingratitude they have despised me. But who is God who is thus despised by men? He is the Creator of heaven and earth; he is the sovereign infinite good, in whose sight men and angels are as a drop of water, or a grain of sand: as a drop of a bucket, as a little dust.[1129] a word, all things created, in the presence of his infinite greatness, are as though they were not: All nations are before him as if they had no being at all, and counted to him nothing and vanity.[1130]

Behold me, O God! a daring sinner who have presumed to despise Thy infinite majesty. But whilst Thou art infinite majesty, Thou art also infinite mercy. I love Thee, O Lord! and because I love Thee I am sorry for having offended Thee; do Thou have pity on me.

2. And, O God! who am I who have despised Thee? A poor helpless worm, who have nothing but what Thou in Thy bounty hast bestowed upon me. Thou hast given me my soul, my body, the use of reason, and numberless other benefits in this world; and I have made no other use of them all but to offend Thee, my benefactor. Nay, more; at the very time that Thou didst preserve my life, that I might not fall into hell as I deserved, I abused Thy goodness and forbearance. O my Saviour! how couldst Thou have had such patience with me? Wretch that I am, how many nights I slept under Thy displeasure! But Thou wouldst not have me perish. I trust, O my Jesus! in Thy blessed Passion that Thou wilt enable me to change my life. Let not that sacred blood be lost, which with so much pain and sorrow Thou didst shed for my salvation.

3. But, O God! what have I done! Thou, my Redeemer, hast shown that regard for my soul, so as to shed Thy blood for its salvation, and I have been so wretched as to allow it to perish for a mere nothing, for a caprice, for a maddening passion, for a miserable gratification, for contempt of Thy grace and love. Ah! if faith did not assure me that Thou hast promised to pardon those who repent, I should not now dare to implore Thy forgiveness. O my Saviour! I kiss Thy sacred wounds, and for the love of these wounds I beseech Thee to forget the injuries which I have committed against Thee. Thou hast said that, when the sinner repents, Thou wilt forget all his ingratitude. I am sorry above every evil for having despised Thee, my sovereign good; make haste to pardon me, as Thou hast promised; let me be quickly reconciled to Thee. I love Thee now more than myself; may I never more incur Thy displeasure. O Mary, refuge of sinners! succour a poor sinner who invokes thy assistance.

Meditation XI

THE PAIN OF LOSS

1. The greatest pain of hell is not the fire nor the darkness, not the stench, nor any other of all the material torments of that dreadful prison of despair; it is the pain of loss that is, the pain of having lost God which of itself may be said to constitute hell. The soul was created to be forever united with God, and to enjoy the sight of his enrapturing countenance. God is its last end, its only good, so that all the goods of earth and heaven, without God, could not make it happy. Hence it is that if a condemned soul in hell could possess and love God, hell, with all its torments, would be to it a paradise. But this will be its sovereign punishment, which will render it forever inconceivably miserable, to be deprived of God for all eternity, without the least hope of ever again beholding him or loving him. Jesus, my Redeemer! nailed to the cross for my sake, Thou art my hope; oh that I had died rather than offended Thee!

2. The soul, being created for God, has an instinctive tendency to become united with its sovereign good, its God; but being united with the body, when it wallows in iniquity, it becomes so darkened by the created objects which allure the senses that it loses its sight, and has so little knowledge of God as no longer to desire to be united with him. But when separated from the body, and from sensible objects, then it will know that God is the only good that can render it happy. Therefore, as soon as it shall have departed hence, it will feel itself drawn with most powerful attraction towards a union with God; but having left this life an enemy of God, it will be not only kept back from him by its sins, as by a chain, but dragged by them into hell, there to be forever separated and at a distance from God. The wretched soul in that eternal dungeon will know how beautiful God is, but will not be able to behold him. It will know how amiable God is, but will not be able to love him; it will even feel itself forced by its sins to hate him; and this will be its hell of hells, to know that it hates a God who is infinitely lovely. It will desire that it were possible to destroy God, to whom it is hateful; and to destroy itself, hating God; and this will be the eternal occupation of this unhappy soul. Do Thou, O Lord! have pity on me.

3. This torment will be immensely increased by the remembrance of the graces that God bestowed upon it, and the love which he evinced towards it during its lifetime. It will especially call to mind the love of Jesus Christ in shedding his blood, and laying down his life for its salvation; but, ungrateful soul, not to forego its own miserable gratifications, it consented to lose God, its sovereign good; and it will find that no hope will be left of ever regaining him. Ah, my God! were I in hell, I should not be able to love Thee, nor to repent of my sins; but as I have it now in my power to repent and to love Thee, I am sorry with my whole soul for having offended Thee, and love Thee above all things. Grant me to remember continually that hell which I have deserved, that I may love Thee with still greater and greater fervour. O Mary, refuge of sinners! do not abandon me.

Meditation XII

THE PARTICULAR JUDGMENT

1. It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment.[1131] It is of faith, that immediately after death we shall be judged according to our works in this life. And it is also of faith, that upon this judgment will depend our eternal salvation or perdition. Imagine yourself to be in your agony, and to have only a short time to live. Think that in a short time you would then have to appear before Jesus Christ to give an account of your whole life. Alas! how alarming would the sight of your sins then be to you! Jesus, my Redeemer! pardon me, I beseech Thee, before Thou judgest me. I know that I have many times already deserved to be sentenced to eternal death. No, I desire not to present myself guilty before Thee, but penitent and pardoned. O my sovereign good! I am grievously sorry for having offended Thee.

2. O God! what will be the anguish of the soul when it shall first behold Jesus Christ as its judge, and behold him terrible in his wrath? It will then see how much he has suffered for its sake; it will see what great mercies he has exercised towards it, and what powerful means he has bestowed upon it for the attainment of salvation; then will it also see the greatness of eternal goods, and the vileness of earthly pleasures, which have wrought its ruin; it will then see all these things, but to no purpose, because then there will be no more time to correct its past errors; what shall have then been done will be irrevocable. Before the judgment-seat of God, no nobility, nor dignity, nor riches will be considered; our works alone will be weighed there. Grant, O Jesus! that when I first behold Thee I may see Thee appeased; and, for this end, grant me the grace to weep, during the remainder of my life, over the evil which I have done in turning my back upon Thee, to follow my own sinful caprices. No, I desire never more to offend Thee. I love Thee and desire to love Thee forever.

3. What contentment will that Christian enjoy at the hour of death who has left the world to give himself to God; who has denied his senses all unlawful gratifications: and who, if he has on some occasions been wanting, has at last been wise enough afterwards to do worthy penance for it! On the other hand, what anguish will that Christian experience who has continually relapsed into the same vices, and at last finds himself at the point of death! Then will he exclaim: "Alas! in a few moments I must appear before Jesus as my judge, and I have not as yet even begun to change my life! I have many times promised to do so, but I have not done it; and now, in a short time, what will become of me?"

Ah, my Jesus and my judge! I return Thee thanks for the patience with which Thou hast hitherto waited for me. How many times have I myself written my own eternal condemnation. Since Thou hast thus waited to pardon me, reject me not, now prostrate at Thy feet. Receive me into Thy favour through the merits of Thy bitter Passion. I am sorry, my sovereign good! for having despised Thee. I love Thee above all things. I desire never more to forsake Thee. O Mary! recommend me to thy Son Jesus, and do not abandon me.

Meditation XIII

PREPARATION FOR THE PARTICULAR JUDGMENTS

1. "Be you ready: for at what hour you think not, the Son of man will come."[1132] The time of death will not be the time to prepare ourselves to die well; to die well and happily, we must prepare ourselves beforehand. There will not be time then to eradicate bad habits from the soul, to expel from the heart its predominant passions, and to extinguish all affection to earthly goods. "The night cometh when no man can work"[1133] All in death will be night; when nothing will be seen; and, hence, nothing done. The heart hardened, the mind obscured, confusion, fear, the desire of health, will all render it almost impossible at the hour of death to set in order a conscience confused and entangled in sin. Sacred wounds of my Redeemer! I adore you, I humbly kiss you, and I confide in you.

2. The saints thought they did but little, though they spent their whole lives in preparing for death, by acts of penance, prayer, and the practice of good works; and they trembled when they came to die. The venerable John Avila, although he had led a very holy life from his youth, when it was announced to him that he was about to die, made answer and said, "Oh that I had a little more time to prepare myself for death!" And what shall we say when the summons of death shall be brought to us? No, my God, I do not wish to die disquieted and ungrateful, as at present I should die, if death were to overtake me; I desire to change my life, I desire to bewail my offences against Thee, I desire to love Thee with my whole heart. O Lord! help me, enable me to do something for Thee before I die, for Thee who hast died for the love of me.

3. The time is short,[1134] says the Apostle. Yes, we have but a short time in which to set our accounts in order. Hence the Holy Ghost admonishes us, Whatsoever thy hand is able to do, do it quickly.[1135] Whatever thou art able to do to-day, put it not off till to-morrow; for to-day is passing away, and to-morrow may bring death, which will deprive thee of all means of doing good, or of amending what thou hast done amiss. Woe to me! if death should find me still attached to this world. Ah, my God, how many years have I lived at a distance from Thee! And how hast Thou had so much patience with me, in waiting for me and in calling me so often to repentance! I thank Thee, O my Redeemer! for Thy long forbearance, and I hope to thank Thee for it forever in heaven. "The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever." [1136] Hitherto I have not loved Thee, and have made little account of being or not being loved by Thee, but now I do love Thee with my whole heart; I love Thee above all things, more than I love myself, and I desire nothing so much as to be loved by Thee; and, recollecting how I have despised Thy love, I would willingly die of grief for having done so. Jesus, grant me perseverance in virtue. Mary, my holy mother, obtain for me the happiness of being faithful to God.

Meditation XIV

THE SUFFERING OF SOULS IN HELL IN THEIR MENTAL FACULTIES

1. The souls in hell will be tormented in their memory. Never, in the abode of infinite misery will they lose for a moment the remembrance of the time that was allowed them in this life to practise virtue, and to make amends for the evil which they have done; and never will it be concealed from them that there is no longer the least hope of remedy. They will call to mind the lights which they received from God, his many loving calls, his offers of pardon, all despised; and they will see that all is now at an end, and that nothing remains for them, but to suffer and to despair for all eternity. O Jesus! Thy blood, Thy sufferings, and Thy death are my trust and hope. Alas! suffer me not to fall into hell, there to curse forever even the blessings which Thou hast bestowed upon me.

2. The souls in hell will be tormented in their understanding, by thinking continually of heaven, which they have wilfully lost through their own fault. The immense felicity enjoyed by the blessed in the abode of delights will be forever before their eyes; and this will render their life of dreadful sufferings, which they must drag on forever in the prison of despair and woe, still more tormenting. Had I then died, my Redeemer, when I was in sin, I should now have had no hope of ever enjoying Thee in heaven! Thou gavest me life that I might gain heaven, and now have I lost heaven for something worse than nothing, by losing Thy grace! I love Thee, O God, and I am sorry for having offended Thee; and I hope, through the merits of Thy Passion, to come to love Thee forever in heaven.

3. The souls in hell will be tormented in their will, by being denied everything which they desire, and by having every punishment inflicted upon them which they do not desire. They will never have anything which they wish for, but everything which they abhor. They will long to rid themselves of their torments and to find peace; but there will be no peace for them; they will be forced to dwell in the midst of their torments forever. Their perverse will, by hating God when they know him to be the supreme good, and worthy of infinite love, will become their greatest torment. So it is, my God; Thou art an infinite good and worthy of infinite love, and I have exchanged Thee for nothing! Oh that I had died and had not offered Thee so grievous an injury! I love Thee, my sovereign good. Have pity on me and suffer me not to be again ungrateful to Thee! I renounce all the delights of this world, and embrace Thee as my only good. I will be forever Thine; be Thou forever mine. This is my hope, my God, my love, and my all. Deus meus et omnia. O Mary! thou art all-powerful with God; obtain for me the grace of leading a holy life.

Meditation XV

Devotion TO THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY

1. Jesus is the mediator of justice; Mary obtains for us grace; for, as St. Bernard, St. Bonaventure, St. Bernardine of Sienna, St. Germanus, St. Antoninus, and others say, it is the will of God to dispense through the hands of Mary whatever graces he is pleased to bestow upon us. With God, the prayers of the saints are the prayers of his friends, but the prayers of Mary are the prayers of his mother. Happy they who confidently and at all times have recourse to this divine mother! This, above all others, is the most pleasing devotion to the Blessed Virgin, ever to have recourse to her and to say: O Mary! intercede for me with thy Son Jesus.

2. Jesus is omnipotent by nature; Mary is very powerful by grace; she obtains whatever she asks for. It is impossible, says St. Antoninus, that this mother should ask any favour of her Son for those who are devout to her, and the Son not grant her request. Jesus delights to honour his mother by granting whatever she asks of him. Hence St. Bernard exhorts us to seek for grace, and to seek for it through Mary; because she is a mother to whom nothing can be denied.[1137] If, then, we should be saved, let us recommend ourselves to Mary, that she may intercede for us, because her prayers are always heard. O mother of mercy! have pity on me. Thou art styled the advocate of sinners; assist me, therefore, a sinner placing my confidence in thee.

3. Let us not doubt whether Mary will hear us when we address our prayers to her. It is her delight to exercise her powerful influence with God in obtaining for us whatever graces we stand in need of. It is sufficient to ask favours of Mary to obtain them. If we are unworthy of them, she renders us worthy, by her powerful intercession; and she is very desirous that we should have recourse to her, that she may save us. What sinner ever perished, who, with confidence and perseverance, had recourse to Mary, the refuge of sinners? He is lost who has not recourse to Mary. Mary, my mother and my hope! I take refuge under thy protection; reject me not, as I have deserved. Protect me and have pity on me, a miserable sinner. Obtain for me the forgiveness of my sins; obtain for me holy perseverance, the love of God, a good death, and a happy eternity. I hope all things of thee, because thou art most powerful with God. Make me holy, since thou hast it in thy power to do so, by thy holy intercession. O Mary! in thee do I confide, in thee do I place all my hopes, next to thy divine Son Jesus.

Meditation XVI

JESUS SUFFERING FOR OUR SINS

1. Seeing men lost in their sins, God was pleased to take pity on them; but his divine justice required satisfaction, and there was no one capable of making adequate satisfaction. On this account he sent into the world his own Son, made man, and loaded him with all our offences: The Lord laid on him the iniquity, of us all,[1138] so that he might pay our debts, satisfy divine justice, and save mankind. O eternal God! what more couldst Thou have done to induce us to confide in Thy mercy, and to attract our hearts to Thy love, than give us even Thy own Son? But how could I, after all that Thou hast done for me, have been guilty of so many offences against Thee? O my God! for the love of this Thy Son, have pity on me. I am sorry above every evil for having offended Thee. And though I have grievously offended Thee, I desire to love Thee with the greatest fervour; give me strength so to love Thee.

2. The eternal Father having loaded his Son with all our crimes, was not content even with such satisfaction from him, as would have amply atoned for us all, but, as Isaias continues: The Lord was pleased to bruise him in infirmity.[1139] He would have him mangled to exhaustion, with scourges, thorns, nails, and torments, until he died of tortures on an infamous gibbet. If faith, O God! did not assure us of this excess of Thy love towards men, who could possibly believe it? O God, worthy of all love! permit us not to be anymore ungrateful to Thee. Enlighten and strengthen us to correspond with such immense love during the remainder of our lives; do this, we beseech Thee, for the love of this Thy Son, whom Thou hast given to us.

3. Behold that innocent Son, attentive to the will of his Father, who would have him thus sacrificed for our sins, full of humility before his Father, full of love towards us, obediently embraces his life of pain and his bitter death: He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross.[1140]Dearest Saviour, I will therefore say to Thee with the penitent Ezechias: Thou hast delivered my soul that it should not perish; Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back.[1141] I had deserved by my sins to be cast into hell, but Thou hast delivered me from it, and, as I hope, pardoned me. I had offended Thy divine majesty, and Thou hast loaded Thyself with my crimes, and hast suffered for me. After this, if I should again offend Thee, or if I should not love Thee with my whole heart, what punishment will ever be sufficient for my chastisement? Beloved Jesus, O love of my soul! I am exceedingly sorry for having so grievously offended Thee. I give Thee my whole self; accept of me, and suffer me not to be anymore separated from Thee. Holy Virgin, Mary, Mother, pray to thy divine Son for me, that he may be pleased to accept of me, and make me all his own.

Meditation XVII

THE ONE THING NECESSARY

1. One thing is necessary,[1142] the salvation of our souls. It is not necessary to be great, noble, or rich in this world, or to enjoy uninterrupted health; but it is necessary to save our souls, For this has God placed us here: not to acquire honours, riches, or pleasures, but to acquire by our good works that eternal kingdom which is prepared for those who, during this present life, fight against and overcome the enemies of their eternal salvation. Ah, my Jesus, how often have I renounced heaven by renouncing Thy grace! But, O Lord! I am more grieved for having forfeited Thy friendship than for having lost heaven. Give me, O Jesus! a great sorrow for my sins, and mercifully pardon me.

2. Of what consequence is it if a man be poor, mean, infirm, and despised in this life, provided that in the end he dies in the grace of God and secures his salvation? The more he has been afflicted with tribulations, if he suffered them with patience, the more will he be glorified in the kingdom of heaven. On the other hand, what does it profit a man to abound in riches and honours, if, when he dies, he is lost forever? If we are lost, all the goods that we have enjoyed in this world will be remembered only to increase our misery for eternity. Do Thou, my God, enlighten me; give me to understand that my only evil is to offend Thee, and my only good to love Thee. Enable me to spend the remainder of my days in serving Thee.

3. Salvation is necessary, because there is no medium; we must either be saved or lost. It will not do to say: I shall be satisfied with not going to hell; I shall not be concerned at being deprived of heaven. No; either heaven or hell; either forever happy with God in heaven in an ocean of delights, or forever trampled upon by devils in hell in an ocean of fire and torments: either saved, or lost; there is no alternative. Jesus! I have hitherto chosen hell, and for years past I should have been suffering there, if in pity Thou hadst not borne with me. I thank Thee, O my Saviour! and I am sorry above every evil for having offended Thee. I hope, for the future, with the assistance of Thy grace, to walk no more in the way that conducts to hell. I love Thee, O my sovereign good! and I desire to love Thee forever. Grant me perseverance in good, and save me through that blood which Thou hast shed for me. O Mary, my hope! intercede for me.

Meditation XVIII

THE SINNER'S DISOBEDIENCE TO GOD

1. Pharaoh, when Moses announced to him the orders of God for the liberation of the Hebrews, insolently answered, Who is the Lord, that I should hear His word? . . . I know not the Lord.[1143] It is thus that the sinner replies to his own conscience when it intimates to him the divine precepts, which forbid him to do that which is evil: "I know not God; I know that he is my Lord, but I will not obey him." Thus have I too often addressed Thee, O God! when I have committed sin. If Thou hadst not died for me, my Redeemer! I should not dare to crave Thy pardon; but Thou hast offered me Thy pardon from the cross, if I be desirous of availing myself of it. I do indeed desire it; I am sorry for having despised Thee, my sovereign good. I will rather die than offend Thee anymore.

2. Thou hast broken my yoke; thou saidst, I will not serve.[1144] The sinner, when tempted to commit sin, hears indeed the voice of God, saying to him, "My son, do not revenge thyself, do not gratify thyself with that infamous pleasure; relinquish the possession of that which is not thine." But by yielding to sin, he replies, "Lord, I will not serve thee. Thou desirest that I should not commit this sin, but I will commit it." My Lord and my God, how frequently have I, not by my words, but my deeds and my will, thus daringly replied to Thee! Alas! cast me not away from Thy face.[1145] I am now sensible of the wrong I have done Thee in parting with Thy graces for the gratification of my own wretched desires. Oh that I had died rather than ever offended Thee!

3. God is the Lord of all things, because he has created all. All things are in Thy power, because Thou hast made heaven and earth, and all things that are under the cope of heaven.[1146] All creatures obey God; the heavens, the earth, the sea, the elements, the brute creation; while man, although he has been gifted and loved by God above all other creatures, obeys him not, and is heedless of the loss of his grace!

I give Thee thanks, O God, for having waited for me. What would have become of me, had I died in one of those nights in which I went to rest under Thy displeasure? But as Thou hast patiently waited for me, it is a sign that Thou art desirous of pardoning me. Pardon me then, O Jesus! I am sorry above every evil for having ever lost the respect which is due to Thee. But then I did not love Thee; now I do love Thee more than myself, and I am ready to die a thousand times rather than again forfeit Thy grace and friendship. Thou hast said that Thou lovest those who love Thee.[1147] I love Thee; do Thou love me in return, and give me grace to live and die in Thy love; that so I may love Thee forever. Mary, my refuge, through thee do I hope to remain faithful to God until the hour of my death.

Meditation XIX

THE MERCIFUL CHASTISEMENTS OF GOD

1. God, being infinite goodness, desires only our good and to communicate to us his own happiness. When he chastises us, it is because we have obliged him to do so by our sins. Hence the prophet Isaias says that on such occasions he doth a work foreign to his desires.[1148] Hence it is said that it is the property of God to have mercy and to spare, to dispense his favours and to make all happy. O God! it is this Thy infinite goodness which sinners offend and despise, when they provoke Thee to chastise them. Wretch that I am, how often have I offended Thy infinite goodness!

2. Let us therefore understand that when God threatens us it is not because he desires to punish us, but because he wishes to deliver us from punishment; he threatens because he would have compassion on us. O God, . . . Thou hast been angry, and hast had mercy on us.[1149] But how is this? he is angry with us, and treats us with mercy? Yes! He shows himself angry towards us, in order that we may amend our lives, and that thus he may be able to pardon and save us; hence if in this life he chastises us for our sins, he does so in his mercy, for by so doing he frees us from eternal woe. How unfortunate, then, is the sinner who escapes punishment in this life! Since then, O God! I have so much offended Thee, chastise me in this life, that Thou mayest spare me in the next. I know that I have certainly deserved hell; I accept all kinds of pain, that Thou mayest reinstate me in Thy grace and deliver me from hell, where I should be forever separated from Thee. Enlighten and strengthen me to overcome every obstacle to Thy favour.

3. He who makes no account of the divine threats ought much to fear lest the chastisement threatened in the Proverbs should suddenly overtake him. The man that with a stiff neck despiseth him that reproveth him shall suddenly be destroyed; and health shall not follow him.[1150] A sudden death shall overtake him that despises God's reprehensions, and he shall have no time to avoid eternal destruction. This, O Jesus! has happened to many, and I indeed have deserved that the like should happen to me; but, my Redeemer! Thou hast shown that mercy towards me which Thou hast not shown to many others who have offended Thee less frequently than I have done, and who are now suffering in hell without the least hope of ever again being able to regain Thy favour. I know, O Lord! that Thou desirest my salvation, and I also desire it, that I may please Thee. I renounce all, and turn myself to Thee, who art my God and my only good. I believe in Thee, I hope in Thee, I love Thee, and Thee alone. O infinite goodness! lam exceedingly displeased with myself for having hitherto done evil against Thee; and I wish that I had suffered every evil rather than offended Thee. Suffer me not any more to depart from Thee, rather let me die than offer Thee so great an injury. In Thee, my crucified Jesus, do I place all my hopes. O Mary, mother of Jesus! recommend me to thy Son.

Meditation XX

THE PATIENCE OF GOD WITH SINNERS

1. The more we have experienced the patient mercies of God, the more we ought to be afraid of continuing to abuse them, lest the time of God's vengeance overtake us. Revenge is Mine, and I will repay in due time.[1151] God will put an end to his forbearance towards those who will not cease to abuse it. I give Thee thanks, O Lord! for having patiently borne with me, though I have so often betrayed Thee. Make me sensible of the evil that I have done by abusing Thy patience for so long a time; make me sorry for all the offences I have committed against Thee. No, I will never more abuse Thy tender mercy.

2. "Commit this sin; you can afterwards confess it." Such is the artifice with which the devil has drawn many souls into hell. Many Christians, now in hell, have been lost by this delusion. The Lord waiteth, that He may have mercy on you.[1152] God waits for the sinner, that the sinner may be converted, and obtain mercy; but when God sees that the time which he allows the sinner for doing penance is employed only in increasing the number of his offences, then he waits no longer, but punishes him as he deserves. Pardon me, O God! for I desire never more to offend Thee. And why should I delay? that Thou mayest condemn me to hell? I fear indeed that now Thou canst no longer have patience with me. I have indeed offended Thee too grievously. I am sorry for it. I repent of it. I hope for forgiveness through the merits of that blood which Thou hast shed for me.

3. The mercies of the Lord that we are not consumed: because His commiserations have not failed.[1153] Thus should he exclaim who finds, to his confusion, that he has frequently offended God. He should be most grateful to God for not having suffered him to die in his sins, and be most careful not to offend him again; otherwise the Lord will reproach him, saying: What more could I have done for My vineyard that I have not done?[1154] God will say to him: Ungrateful soul! if thou hadst committed the same offences against man, who is viler than the earth, verily he would not have borne with thee. And how great mercies have I exercised towards thee! How many times have I called thee, and enlightened thee, and pardoned thee? The time of punishment is at hand; the time of forgiveness is past. Thus has God spoken to many who are now suffering in hell; where one of their greatest torments is the remembrance of the mercies which they formerly received from God. O Jesus, my Redeemer and my Judge! I also have deserved to hear the same from Thy mouth; but I hear Thee now again calling me to pardon: Be converted to the Lord thy God:[1155] O accursed sin, which has made me lose my God, how much do I abhor and detest thee! I turn my whole self towards Thee, my Lord and my God! My sovereign good, I love Thee; and because I love Thee I repent with my whole soul for having, during the time that is past, so much despised Thee. My God! I desire never more to offend Thee: give me Thy love, grant me perseverance. Mary, my refuge, succour and help me.

Meditation XXI

DEATH, THE PASSAGE TO ETERNITY

1. It is of faith that my soul is immortal, and that one day, when I least think of it, I must leave this world. I ought therefore to make a provision for myself, which will not fail with this life, but will be eternal even as I am eternal. Great things were done here, in their life time, by an Alexander or a Caesar; but for how many ages past have their glories ceased! and where are they now? O my God, that I had always loved Thee! What now remains for me, after so many years spent in sin, but trouble and remorse of conscience? But since Thou dost allow me time to repair the evil which I have done, behold me, Lord, ready to perform whatever Thou requirest of me, whatever Thou pleasest. I will spend the remainder of my days in bewailing my ungrateful conduct towards Thee, and in loving Thee with all my power, my God and my all, my only good.

2. What will it avail me to have been happy in this world (if indeed true happiness can be attained without God) if hereafter I should be miserable for all eternity? But what folly it is, to know that I must die, and that an eternity either of happiness or misery awaits me after death, and that upon dying ill or well depends my being miserable or happy forever, and yet, not to adopt every means in my power to secure a good death! O Holy Spirit, enlighten and strengthen me to live always in Thy grace, until the hour of my departure. O infinite goodness! I am sensible of the evil which I have done by offending Thee, and I detest it: I know that Thou alone art worthy of being loved, and I love Thee above all things.

3. In a word, all the good things of this life must end at our burial and be left, while we are mouldering in our graves. The shadow of death will cover and obscure all the grandeur and splendour of this world. He only, then, can be called happy who serves God in this world, and by loving and serving him acquires eternal happiness. O Jesus! I am truly sorry for having hitherto made so little account of Thy love. Now I love Thee above all things, and I desire nothing else but to love Thee. Henceforth Thou only shalt be the sole object of my love, Thou only shalt be my all; and this is the only inheritance I ask of Thee; to love Thee always, both in this life and in the next. For the merits of Thy bitter Passion, give me perseverance in all virtues. Mary, mother of God, thou art my hope.

Meditation XXII

THE REFORMATION OF OUR LIVES BEFORE DEATH,

1. Everyone desires to die the death of the saints, but it is scarcely possible for the Christian to make a holy end who has led a disorderly life until the time of his death; to die united with God, after having always lived at a distance from him. The saints, in order to secure a. happy death, renounced all the riches, the delights, and all the hopes which this world held out to them, and embraced poor and mortified lives. They buried themselves alive in this world, to avoid, when dead, being buried forever in hell. O God! for how many years past have I deserved to be buried in that place of torments, without hope of pardon, or of being able to love Thee! But Thou hast waited in order to pardon me. Truly, then, am I sorry from the bottom of my heart for having offended Thee, my sovereign good; and have pity on me, and do not permit me to offend Thee any more.

2. God forewarns sinners that they will seek him in death and will not find him: You shall seek and shall not find Me.[1156] They shall not find him because they will not then seek.him through love, but only through the fear of hell; they will seek God without renouncing their affection for sin, and hence they shall not find him. No, my God, I will not wait to seek Thee in death, but will seek and desire Thee from this moment. I am sorry for having hitherto given Thee so much displeasure by seeking to gratify my own inclinations. I am sorry for it, I confess that I have done evil. But Thou willest not that the heart that seeks Thee should despair, but rejoice: Let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord.[1157] Yes, O Lord! I seek Thee, and I love Thee more than myself.

3. How miserable is the Christian who before his death has not spent a good part of his life in bewailing his sins! It is not to be denied that such a man may be converted at his death and obtain salvation; but the mind obscured, the heart hardened, the bad habits formed, the passions predominant, render it morally impossible for him to die happily. An extraordinary grace will be necessary for him; but does God reserve such a grace to bestow it upon one who has continued ungrateful to him even until the moment of death? O God, to what straits are sinners reduced to escape eternal destruction! No, my God, I will not wait until death to repent of my sins and to love Thee. I am sorry now for having offended Thee; now do I love Thee with my whole heart. Suffer me not any more to turn my back upon Thee; rather let me die. O holy Mother, Mary, obtain for me perseverance in virtue.

Meditation XXIII

THE LAMB OF GOD SACRIFICED FOR OUR SINS

1. Behold the Lamb of God;[1158] thus did the Baptist speak of our Blessed Redeemer, who offered his blood and even his life in sacrifice to obtain our pardon and our eternal salvation. Behold him in the hall of Pilate; as an innocent Lamb he permits himself to be shorn, not of wool, but of his sacred flesh, with thorns and scourges, He shall be dumb as a lamb before His shearer, and He shall not open His mouth. [1159] He opens not his mouth, nor does he complain, because he desires to suffer himself the punishments due to our sins. May the angels and all creatures bless Thee. O Saviour of the world! for the great mercy and love which Thou hast shown towards us. We had committed sins, and Thou didst make satisfaction for them.

2. Behold him, bound like a malefactor and surrounded by executioners, conducted to Calvary, there to become the victim of the great sacrifice, by which the work of our redemption is to be accomplished. I was as a meek lamb that is carried to be a victim.[1160] Whither, O Jesus! do the people conduct Thee, loaded with such a cross, after having so cruelly tormented Thee? Thou answerest me. They conduct Me to death, and I go willingly, because I am going to save thee, and to prove how great my love is towards thee. And how, O my Saviour! have I proved my love towards Thee? Thou indeed knowest: by injuries and grievous offences, and by my frequent contempt of Thy grace and love. But Thy death is my hope. I am sorry, O Thou love of my soul! for having offended Thee; I am sorry, and will love Thee with my whole heart.

3. St. Francis of Assisi, seeing a lamb led to the slaughter, could not refrain from tears, saying, "As this lamb is led to the slaughter, so was my innocent Lord conducted for me to the death of the cross." Since, then, O Jesus! Thou dost not refuse to go to sacrifice Thy life for the love of me, shall I refuse to give my whole self for the love of Thee? This Thou requirest of me: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.[1161] This, and this only, do I desire to love Thee, and to love Thee with my whole heart. Thou hast loved without any reserve, and so will I love Thee. I am sorry for having offended Thee, O Lamb of God! and I give my whole self to Thee. Accept of me, O Jesus! and make me faithful to Thy grace. O Mary, Mother of my Redeemer, make me by thy prayers entirely his!

Meditation XXIV

THE VALUE OF TIME

1. Time is a treasure of inestimable value, because in every moment of time we may gain an increase of grace and eternal glory. In hell the lost souls are tormented with the thought, and bitterly lament that now there is no more time for them in which to rescue themselves by repentance from eternal misery. What would they give but for one hour of time to save themselves by an act of true sorrow from destruction! In heaven there is no grief; but if the blessed could grieve, they would do so for having lost so much time during life, in which they might have acquired greater glory, and because time is now no longer theirs. I give Thee thanks, O God! for giving me time to bewail my sins, and to make amends by my love for the offences I have committed against Thee.

2. Nothing is so precious as time; and yet how comes it that nothing is so little valued? Men will spend hours in jesting, or standing at a window or in the middle of a road, to see what passes; and if you ask them what they are doing, they will tell you they are passing away time. O time, now so much despised! thou wilt be of all things else the most valued by such persons when death.shall have surprised them. What will they not then be willing to give for one hour of so much lost time! But time will remain no longer for them when it is said to each one of them: "Go forth, Christian soul, out of this world:"[1162] hasten to be gone, for now there is no time for thee. How will they then exclaim, lamenting, Alas! I have squandered away my whole life; during so many years I might have become a saint; but how far am I from being such; and shall I become such, now that there is no more time for me! But to what purpose will such lamentations be, when the dying man is on the verge of that moment on which will depend eternity?

3. Walk whilst you have light.[1163] The time of death is the time of night, when nothing can any longer be seen, nor anything be accomplished. The night cometh, in which no man can work.[1164] Hence the Holy Spirit admonishes us to walk in the way of the Lord, whilst we have the light and the day before us. Can we reflect that the time is near approaching in which the cause of our eternal salvation is to be decided, and still squander away time?

Let us not delay, but immediately put our accounts in order, because when we least think of it, Jesus Christ will come to judge us. At what hour ye think not, the Son of man will come.[1165] Hasten, then, my Jesus, hasten to pardon me. And shall I delay? shall I delay until I am cast into that eternal prison, where, with the rest of the condemned souls, I must forever lament, saying, "The summer is past, and we are not saved."[1166] No, my Lord, I will no longer resist Thy loving invitations. Who knows but that this meditation which I am now reading may be the last I shall ever cast my eyes upon! I am sorry for having offended Thee, O sovereign good! To Thee do I consecrate the remainder of my days, and beseech Thee to grant me holy perseverance. I desire never more to offend Thee, but forever to love Thee. O Mary, refuge of sinners! in thee do I place my confidence.

Meditation XXV

THE TERRORS OF THE DYING MAN AT THE THOUGHT OF APPROACHING JUDGMENT

1. Consider the fear which the thought of judgment will cause in the mind of a dying man, when he reflects that in a very short time he must present himself before Jesus Christ, his Judge, to render an account of all the actions of his past life. When the awful moment of his passage out of this world into another, out of time into eternity, arrives, then will there be nothing so tormenting to him as the sight of his sins. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, being ill, and thinking of judgment, trembled. Her confessor told her not to fear. "Ah, Father," she replied, "it is an awful thing to appear before Jesus Christ as our Judge." Such were the sensations of this holy virgin, who was a saint from her infancy. What will he say who has frequently deserved hell?

2. The abbot Agatho after many years of penance trembled, saying, "What will become of me when I shall be judged?" And how should he not tremble who has offended God by many mortal sins, and yet has done no penance for them? At death, the sight of his crimes, the rigor of the divine judgments, the uncertainty of the sentence to be pronounced upon him, what a tempest of horror and confusion will these raise around him! Let us be careful to throw ourselves at the feet of Jesus Christ, and secure our pardon before the arrival of our accounting day. Ah! my Jesus and my Redeemer, who wilt one day be my judge, have pity on me before the day of justice. Behold at Thy feet a deserter, who has often promised to be faithful to Thee, and has as often again turned his back upon Thee. No, my God, Thou hast not deserved the treatment which Thou hast hitherto received at my hands. Forgive me, O Lord! for I desire truly to change and amend my life. I am sorry, my sovereign good! for having despised Thee: take pity on me.

3. Then will be decided the great affair of our eternal salvation. Upon this decision will depend our being either saved or lost forever, our being happy or miserable for all eternity. But, O God! each one knows this, and says, "So it is." But if it is so, why do we not leave all to attend only to our sanctification, and to the securing of our eternal salvation? My God, I give Thee thanks for the light which Thou hast given me. Remember, O Jesus! that Thou didst die for my salvation; grant that when I first behold Thee I may see Thee appeased. If hitherto I have despised Thy grace, I now esteem it above every other good. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! and because I love Thee, I am sorry for having offended Thee. Hitherto I have forsaken Thee, but now I desire Thee and seek Thee; grant that I may find Thee, O God of my soul! Mary, my mother, recommend me to thy Son Jesus.

Meditation XXVI

THE FIRE OF HELL

1. It is certain that hell is a pit of fire, in which the miserable souls of the wicked will be tormented forever. Even in this life the pain of burning is of all pains the most intense and dreadful; but the fire of hell has the power of inflicting much more excruciating torment, because it has been created by God to be the instrument of his wrath upon his rebellious creatures. "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire,"[1167] is the sentence of the reprobate. And as in this sentence of condemnation fire is particularly mentioned, we may conclude that, of all the torments with which the senses of the wicked are afflicted, fire is the greatest. Ah, my God, for how many years past have I deserved to burn in this fire! But Thou hast waited for me, to behold me burning, not with this dreadful fire, but with the blessed flames of Thy holy love. Wherefore do I love Thee, my sovereign good, and desire to love Thee forever.

2. In this world fire burns only outwardly, and does not penetrate our interior; but in hell the fire enters into the inmost recesses of its victims. Thou shalt make them as an oven of fire.[1168] Every one will become as a furnace of fire, so that the heart will burn within the chest, the bowels within the carcass, the brains within the skull, and even the marrow within the bones. Sinners, what are your feelings with regard to this fire? You, who cannot now bear a spark accidentally fallen from a candle, nor a house too hot, nor a ray of the sun upon your head, how will you endure to be permanently immersed in an ocean of fire, where you will be forever dying, and yet never, never die? O my Redeemer! let not that blood which Thou didst shed for the love of me, be shed for me in vain. Grant me sorrow for my sins, grant me Thy holy love.

3. Which of you, saith the prophet, can dwell with devouring fire?[1169] As a wild beast devoureth his prey, so shall the fire of hell continually devour the unhappy soul, but without ever depriving him of life. Hence St. Peter Damian exclaims, "Go on, sinner, go on, unchaste one; give thy flesh its desires: a day will come when thy impurities will be to thee as pitch within thy bowels, to nourish the fire which will consume thee in hell for all eternity."[1170] O my God, whom I have despised and lost! forgive me, and suffer me not to lose Thee any more. I am sorry above every evil for having offended Thee. Receive me into Thy favour, for now do I promise Thee that I will love Thee, and love no other but Thee. Most holy Mary, deliver me by thy holy intercession, from ever suffering the torments of hell.

Meditation XXVII

THE VANITY OF ALL WORLDLY THINGS

1. What is life but a vapour, which appears for a short time and then is seen no more? What is your life? says St. James; it is a vapour which appeareth for a little while, and afterwards shall vanish away.[1171] The vapours which arise from the earth, when raised into the air and surrounded by the rays of the sun, appear brilliant and beautiful; but the least wind disperses them, and they are seen no more. Such is the grandeur of this world. Behold that prince; to-day, he is feared, attended upon and honoured by thousands; to-morrow, he will be dead, despised and hated by all. In a word, honours, pleasures, and riches must all end in death. O my God! make me sensible of the immensity of Thy goodness, that I may love nothing but Thee.

2. Death deprives man of whatever he may possess in this world. What a sad sight, to behold a rich man, after death, carried out of his palace, to return thither no more! How sad to behold others taking possession of the estates which he has left, of his wealth, and whatever else he so lately enjoyed! His servants, after having accompanied him to his grave, abandon him, and leave him there, to be devoured by worms; no one esteeming him, no one flattering him. Formerly every one obeyed his nod, but now no one takes the least notice of his orders. How wretched have I been, O Lord! in having, for so many years, gone after the vanities of the world, and left Thee, my sovereign good! But from this day forward I desire to possess Thee as my only treasure, as the only love of my soul.

3. Dust and ashes, why are you proud?[1172] Man, says the Almighty, seest thou not that in a short time thou wilt become dust and ashes? and on what dost thou fix thy thoughts and affections? Reflect that death will soon rob thee of everything, and separate thee from the whole world. And if, when thou givest in thy accounts, thou be found wanting, what will become of thee for eternity? I give Thee thanks, my Lord and my God. Thou speakest thus to me, because thou desirest to save me. Let Thy mercies now prevail. Thou hast promised to pardon such as repent of their offences against Thee. From the bottom of my heart do I repent: grant me therefore pardon. Thou hast promised to love those who love Thee: above all things do I now love Thee; wherefore do Thou love me also, and hate me not any more, as I have deserved. O Mary, my advocate, in thy protection is my hope.

Meditation XXVIII

THE NUMBER OF OUR SINS

1. It is the opinion of St. Basil, St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and others, that as God has determined for each one the number of talents, the goods of fortune, and the number of days to be bestowed upon him, so he has also determined for each one the number of sins to be pardoned him, which being completed, God will pour out his chastisements upon him and pardon him no more. Each one, says St. Augustine, is patiently borne with by Almighty God for a certain time; but when this is over, there is then no longer any more pardon for him. [1173] I am aware, O God! that I have hitherto abused Thy patience too much; but I know that Thou hast not yet abandoned me, because I am sorry for my sins, and this sorrow is a sign that Thou still lovest me. O my God! I desire never more to displease Thee; for pity's sake do not abandon me.

2. The Lord patiently expecteth, that when the day of judgment shall come, He may punish them in the fullness of their sins.[1174] Although God has patience and waits for the sinner, yet, when the day arrives for the measure of his sins to be filled up he will wait for him no longer, but chastise him. O Lord! wait yet for me a little while, do not yet abandon me; I hope with the assistance of Thy grace never to offend Thee more, nor to excite Thy anger against me. I am sorry, O my sovereign good! for having offended Thee, and I protest that I will never more betray Thee. I now esteem Thy friendship more than all the goods of the whole world.

3. We commit sins, and we take no notice of the load of guilt which we are accumulating; but let us tremble lest what happened to King Baltassar befall us also: Thou art weighed in the balance, and art found wanting.[1175] The devil may tell you that it matters not whether it be ten or eleven sins. But no, that wicked enemy deceives you; the sin which he is tempting you to commit will increase the load of your guilt; it may decide the balance of divine justice against you, and you may be condemned for it to the torments of hell. If, Christian brother, you live not in fear that God will not show you mercy, should you add one more mortal sin to those which you have already committed; if you tremble not at the thought of this, you are in great danger of being lost. No, my God: Thou hast borne with me too long; I will never more abuse Thy bountiful goodness. I thank Thee for having waited for me until now. I have forfeited Thy love too often; but I hope never more to lose Thee. Since Thou hast not yet abandoned me, enable me to find Thee again. I love Thee, O my God! and I am sorry from the bottom of my heart for having ever turned my back upon Thee. No, I desire never more to lose Thee. Assist me with Thy grace. And thou, my queen and my mother, Mary, help me by thy holy intercession.

Meditation XXIX

THE FOLLY OF LIVING AS ENEMIES OF GOD

1. Sinners call the saints who, in this life, fly from honours, riches, and the pleasures of sense, and embrace poverty, contempt, and mortification, fools. But at the day of final retribution they will confess that they themselves have been fools in judging the lives of the saints to be folly: We fools esteemed their life madness.[1176] And what greater folly can there be than to live without God? which is to live a miserable life in this world, to be succeeded by a still more miserable one in hell. No, I will not wait till the last day to confess my folly; I now confess it: how great has it been in offending Thee, my sovereign good! Father, "I am not worthy to be called Thy son."[1177] Father, I am not worthy to receive Thy forgiveness, but I hope for it through the blood which Thou hast shed for my sake. My Jesus, I am sorry for having despised Thee, I love Thee above all things.

2. Unhappy sinners! blinded by their sins, they lose all judgment. What would be said of a man who should sell a kingdom for the smallest coin? And what should be said of him who, for a momentary pleasure, a vapour, a caprice, sells heaven and the grace of God? They think only of this life, which will shortly end, and in the meantime deserve hell for that life which will never end. O my God! permit me not to become any more so blind as to prefer, as I have hitherto done, my own unlawful gratifications before Thee, and for the sake of them to despise Thee, my sovereign good! I now detest them, and love Thee above all things.

3. Miserable worldlings! the time will come when they will bewail their folly; but when? when there will be no longer anything to prevent their eternal ruin. Then will they say, What hath pride profited us? or what advantage Hath the boasting of riches brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow?[1178] Behold, they will exclaim, how all our delights have passed away like a shadow, and nothing remains to us now but suffering and eternal lamentation! Dear Jesus! have pity on me. I had forgotten Thee, but Thou didst not forget me. I love Thee with my whole soul, and I detest above all evil whatever sins I have committed against Thee. Pardon me, O God! and remember not my offences against Thee. And since Thou knowest my weakness, do not abandon me; give me strength to overcome all things to please Thee. O Mary, Mother of God! in thee do I place my hopes.

Meditation XXX

THE SACRED WOUNDS OF JESUS

1. St. Bonaventure says that the wounds of Jesus wound the hardest hearts and inflame the coldest souls.[1179] And in truth, how can we believe that God permitted himself to be buffeted, scourged, crowned with thorns, and finally put to death for the love of us, and yet not love him? St. Francis of Assisi frequently bewailed the ingratitude of men as he passed along the country, saying, "Love is not loved, love is not loved." Behold, O my Jesus! I am one of those who are thus ungrateful, who have been so many years in the world and have not loved Thee. And shall I, my Redeemer, remain forever such? No, I will love Thee until death, and will give myself wholly to Thee; mercifully accept of me and help me.

2. The Church, when she shows us Jesus Christ crucified, exclaims: "His whole figure breathes forth love; his head bowed down, his arms extended, his side opened."[1180] She cries out: Behold, O man! behold thy God, who has died for thy love; see how his arms are extended to embrace thee, his head bowed down to give thee the kiss of peace, his side opened to give thee access to his heart, if thou wilt but love him. Assuredly I will love Thee, my treasure, my love, and my all. And whom shall I love, if I love not God who has died for me?

3. The charity of Christ, saith the Apostle, presseth us.[1181] Ah! my Redeemer, Thou hast died for the love of men; yet men do not love Thee, because they live unmindful of the death which Thou hast suffered for them. Did they bear it in mind, how could they live without loving Thee? "Knowing," says St. Francis de Sales, "that Jesus being really God, has so loved us as to suffer the death of the cross for us, do we not on this account feel our hearts, as it were, in a press, in which they are forcibly held, and love expressed from them by a kind of violence, which is the more powerful as it is the more amiable?" And this is what St. Paul says in these words: "The charity of Christ presseth us"[1182] the love of Jesus Christ forces us to love him. Ah! my beloved Saviour, heretofore I have despised Thee, but now I esteem and love Thee more than my own life; nothing afflicts me so much as the remembrance of the many offences I have committed against Thee. Pardon me, O Jesus! and draw my whole heart to Thyself, that so I may not desire, nor seek, nor sigh after any other beside Thee. O Mary, my mother! help me to love Jesus.

Meditation XXXI

THE GREAT AFFAIR OF SALVATION

1. The affair of our eternal salvation is of all affairs the most important. But how comes it that men use all diligence to succeed in the affairs of this world, leave no means untried to obtain a desirable situation, to gain a lawsuit, or to bring about a marriage, reject no counsels, neglect no measures by which to secure their object, neither eat nor sleep, and yet do nothing to gain eternal salvation, nothing to gain it, but everything to forfeit it, as though hell, heaven, and eternity were not articles of faith, but only fables and lies? O God! assist me by Thy divine light; suffer me not to be any longer blinded, as I hitherto have been.

2. If an accident happen to a house, what is not immediately done to repair it? If a jewel be lost, what is not done to recover it? The soul is lost, the grace of God is lost, and men sleep and smile. We attend most carefully to our temporal welfare, and almost entirely neglect our eternal salvation! We call those happy who have renounced all things for God; why then are we so much attached to earthly things? O Jesus! Thou hast so much desired my salvation as to shed Thy blood and lay down Thy life to secure it; and I have been so indifferent to the preservation of Thy grace as to renounce and forfeit it for mere nothing! I am sorry, O Lord! for ha ving thus dishonoured Thee. I will renounce all things to attend only to Thy love, my God, who art most worthy of all love.

3. The Son of God gives his life to save our souls; the devil is most diligent in his endeavours to bring them to eternal ruin: and do we take no care of them? St. Philip Neri convicts that man of the height of folly who is inattentive to the salvation of his soul. Let us arouse our faith: it is certain that, after this short life, another life awaits us, which will be either eternally happy or eternally miserable. God has given us to choose which we will. Before man is life and death . . . that which he shall choose shall be given him.[1183] Ah! let us make such a choice now as we shall not have to repent of all eternity. O God! make me sensible of the great wrong I have done Thee in offending Thee and renouncing Thee for the love of creatures. I am sorry with my whole heart for having despised Thee, my sovereign good; do not reject me now that I return to Thee. I love Thee above all things, and for the future I will lose all things rather than forfeit Thy grace. Through the love which Thou hast shown me in dying for me, succour me with Thy help, and do not abandon me. O Mary, Mother of God! be thou my advocate.

Meditation XXXII

THE FREQUENT THOUGHT OF DEATH

1. Men who are attached to this world endeavour to banish the thoughts of death from their minds, as though, by avoiding the remembrance of death, they could avoid death itself. But no; by banishing the thoughts of death from their minds, they expose themselves to greater danger of making an evil end. There is no alternative: sooner or later we must die; and what is still more, we can die but once; and if once we be lost, we shall be lost forever. My God, I give Thee thanks for having enlightened me. I have already lost too many years in offending Thee; but I will now spend the remainder of my life entirely in Thy service. Command me what Thou willest, for I desire to please Thee in all things.

2. Holy anchorets, who formerly fled from the world into deserts in order to secure for themselves a happy death, took nothing with them but some spiritual book and a skull, by the sight of which they might continually keep up in their minds the remembrance of their last end. They meditated upon it, saying: "As the bones of him to whom this skull belonged, so will the bones of my body one day be: and my soul who knows where that shall dwell?" And thus they endeavoured to gain not the goods of this life, but of that life which will never end. I give Thee thanks, O Lord! for not having suffered me to die when I was in the state of sin. I am sorry for having offended Thee, and hope, through Thy precious blood, for mercy and pardon. I desire, O Jesus! to renounce all things, and to do my utmost to please Thee.

3. A certain hermit, being at the point of death, was observed to smile, and being asked why he was so cheerful, answered: "I have always kept death before my eyes, and hence, now that it is come, it does not alarm me." The approach of death, therefore, is terrible to those only who have thought of nothing but of gratifying themselves during their lifetime, and have never thought of their last end; but it is not terrible to those who, by frequently thinking upon it, have learned to despise all earthly goods, and to love nothing but God. O my Saviour! I perceive that death is already drawing near to me, and as yet I have done nothing for Thee, who didst die for me. No, before death, I will, O God! love Thee, who art worthy of infinite love. I have hitherto dishonoured Thee by the offences which I have committed against Thee; but I am sorry for them with my whole heart. For the future I will honour Thee, by loving Thee to the utmost of my power. Give me light and strength to do so. Thou wouldst have me be wholly Thine, and such do I desire to be. Help me by Thy grace; in Thee do I confide. And in thee also do I confide, O Mary, my Mother, and my hope!

Meditation XXXIII

THE TURNING AWAY FROM GOD BY SIN

1. St. Augustine and St. Thomas define mortal sin to be a turning away from God: that is, the turning of one's back upon God, leaving the Creator for the sake of the creature. What punishment would that subject deserve who, while his king was giving him a command, contemptuously turned his back upon him to go and transgress his orders? This is what the sinner does; and this is punished in hell with the pain of loss, that is, the loss of God, a punishment richly deserved by him who in this life turns his back upon his sovereign good. Alas! my God, I have frequently turned my back upon Thee; but I see that Thou hast not yet abandoned me; I see that Thou approachest me, and inviting me to repentance, dost offer me Thy pardon. I am sorry above every evil for having offended Thee, do Thou have pity on me.

2. Thou hast forsaken Me, saith the Lord, thou hast gone backward.[1184] God complains and says, Ungrateful soul, thou hast forsaken me! I should never have forsaken thee hadst not first turned thy back upon me: thou hast gone backward.[1185] O God, with what consternation will these words fill the soul of the sinner when he stands to be judged before Thy divine tribunal! Thou makest me hear them now, O my Saviour! not to condemn me, but to bring me to sorrow for the offences I have committed against Thee. Yes, O Jesus! I sincerely repent of all the displeasure which I have given Thee. For my own miserable gratifications I have forsaken Thee, my God, my sovereign, infinite good! But behold me a penitent returned to Thee; and reject me not.

3. Why will you die, O house of Israel? return ye and live.[1186] I have died, says Jesus Christ, for the salvation of your souls, and why will you condemn them by your sins to eternal death? Return to me, and you will recover the life of my grace. O Jesus! I should not dare to crave Thy pardon, did I not know that Thou hast died to obtain my forgiveness. Alas! how often have I despised Thy grace and Thy love! O that I had died rather than ever offered Thee so great an injury! But Thou, who didst come near to me even when I offended Thee, wilt not now reject me, when I love Thee and seek no other but Thee. My God and my all, suffer me not any more to be ungrateful to Thee. Mary, Queen and Mother, obtain for me the grace of holy perseverance.

Meditation XXXIV

THE MERCY OF GOD IN CALLING SINNERS TO REPENTANCE

1. The Lord called to Adam, and said to him, Where art thou?[1187] These are the words of a father, says a pious author, going in quest of his lost son. Oh the immense compassion of our God! Adam sins, he turns his back upon God; and yet God does not abandon him, but follows him and calls after him, "Adam, where art thou?" Thus, my soul, has God frequently done towards thee; thou hadst forsaken him by sin; but he did not hesitate to approach thee, and to call upon thee by many interior lights, by remorse of conscience, and by his holy inspirations; all of which were the effects of his compassion and love. God of mercy, O God of love! how could I have so grievously offended Thee, how could I have been so ungrateful to Thee!

2. As a father when he beholds his son hastening to cast himself down from the brink of a precipice, presses forward towards him, and with tears endeavours to withhold him from destruction; so, my God, hast Thou done towards me. I was already hastening by my sins to precipitate myself into hell, and Thou didst hold me back. I am now sensible, O Lord! of the love which Thou hast shown me, and I hope to sing forever in heaven the praises of Thy mercy: The mercies of the Lord I will—sing forever. [1188] I know, O Jesus! that Thou desirest my salvation; but I do not know whether Thou hast yet pardoned me. Oh! give me intense sorrow for my sins, give me an ardent love for Thee, as signs of Thy merciful forgiveness.

3. O my Saviour! how can I doubt of receiving Thy pardon, when Thou Thyself dost offer it to me, and art ready to receive me with open arms on my return to Thee? Wherefore I do return to Thee, sorrowing and overpowered at the consideration that after all my offences against Thee, Thou indeed still lovest me. Oh that I had never displeased Thee, my sovereign God! how much am I grieved for having done so! Pardon me, O Jesus! I will never more offend Thee. But I shall not be able to rest satisfied with Thy forgiveness only: give me also a great love for Thee. Having so often deserved to burn in the fire of hell, I now desire to burn in the fire of Thy holy love. I love Thee, who art my only love, my life, my treasure, my all. O Mary, my protectress! pray for me, that I may continue faithful to God until the end of my life.

Meditation XXXV

THE SOUL'S APPEARANCE AT THE TRIBUNAL OF GOD

1. When criminals are presented before their judges, though they fear and tremble, yet flatter themselves that either their crimes will not be proved against them, or that their judges will remit in part the punishments which they have deserved. O God! how great will be the horror of a guilty soul when presented before Jesus Christ, from whom nothing will be hidden, and who will judge it with the utmost severity! I am the Judge and the Witness.[1189] will he then say: "I am thy Judge, and I am witness of all the offences thou hast committed against me." O my Jesus! I deserved to hear this from Thy mouth, had the hour of my judgment arrived. But now Thou art pleased to assure me, that if I will repent of my sins, Thou wilt no longer remember them: I will not remember all his iniquities.[1190]

2. It is the opinion of divines, that in the same place in which the soul is separated from the body it will be judged, and its lot decided either for eternal life or eternal death. But should the soul unhappily depart from the body in sin, what will it be able to say when Jesus Christ reminds it of his abused mercies, of the years he granted it, of the calls by which he invited it, and of the many other means which he afforded it of securing its salvation? O Jesus, my Redeemer! Thou who condemnest obstinate sinners, dost not condemn those who love Thee and who are sorry for having. offended Thee. I am a sinner, but I love Thee more than myself, and I am sorry above every evil for having displeased Thee; oh, do Thou pardon me before the time comes when Thou wilt judge me!

3. At what hour you think not, the Son of man will come.[1191] When, therefore, O my Jesus and my Judge! Thou shalt judge me, after my death, Thy wounds will be a terror to me, reproaching me with my ingratitude for the love which Thou hast shown me in suffering and dying for me, but now they encourage me and give me confidence to hope for pardon from Thee, my Redeemer, who for the love of me, and that Thou mayest not have to condemn me, didst suffer Thyself to be tormented and crucified. We therefore pray Thee, "help Thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood."[1192] O my Jesus! have pity on me, who am one of those sheep for whom Thou didst shed Thy sacred blood. If hitherto I have despised Thee, I now esteem and love Thee above all things. Make known to me the means by which I may be saved, and strengthen me to fulfil Thy holy will. I will no longer abuse Thy goodness. Thou hast placed me under too many obligations to Thee; I will no longer suffer myself to live at a distance from Thee and deprived of Thy love. Mary, Mother of mercy, have compassion on me.

Meditation XXXVI

THE UNHAPPY LIFE OF THE SINNER

1. There is no peace for the wicked.[1193] The devil deceives poor sinners by making them believe that if they gratify their sensual desires, revenge themselves, or take what belongs to another, they will gain satisfaction and obtain peace: but no, for the reverse will always be their portion; the soul after sin becomes more than ever disquieted and afflicted. The brutes alone, who are created for the earth, can gain contentment from the enjoyments of the earth; but man, who is created to enjoy God, cannot derive satisfaction from any or all of God's creatures; his only source of happiness is God. O my God! what, of all the delights by which I have offended Thee, now remains but bitterness and sorrow to torment me? I do not regret the bitterness which they now cause me; but only the displeasure which they have given Thee, who hast so much loved me.

2. The wicked are like the raging sea, which cannot rest.[1194] What is a soul in disgrace with God but a tempestuous sea, always in agitation? one wave rises and another succeeds, and all are waves of pain and anguish. No one in the world can have all things according to his will. He who loves God, when adversity comes resigns himself to God's blessed will, and thus secures peace to his soul; but how can the sinner, if he is an enemy of God, pacify himself by resignation to God's holy appointments? Besides, sin always brings with it the dread of divine vengeance. The wicked man fleeth, when no man pursueth.[1195] Yes, for his own sin followeth after him, and by the remorse with which it preys upon his soul, makes him suffer an anticipated hell. O my Lord and my God! I am exceedingly sorry for having forsaken Thee; do Thou forgive me, and suffer me not to lose Thee any more.

3. Delight in the Lord, and He will give thee the requests of thy heart.[1196] Man, whither goest thou in search of content? Seek after God, and he will satisfy all the desires of thy soul. "Seek," says St. Augustine, the one only good, in whom are all other goods."[1197] Behold a St. Francis, who when stripped of all worldly goods, being still united with God, found in this a heaven even here upon earth, and could not often enough exclaim, "My God! my God and my all!"[1198] Happy the soul that leaves all for God, for in him it finds all. O Jesus! instead of abandoning me, as I have deserved, Thou offerest me pardon, and callest me to Thy love. Behold, I return to Thee overwhelmed with sorrow for the evil which I have done, and deeply affected at seeing that even still Thou lovest me after the many offences I have committed against Thee. Thou lovest me, and I also love Thee and love Thee more than myself. Receive me into Thy favour, and do with me what Thou pleasest: only do not deprive me of Thy love. Mary, Mother, have pity on me.

Meditation XXXVII

THE LOVE OF JESUS CRUCIFIED

1. Well might our loving Redeemer declare that he came upon the earth to enkindle divine love, and that he desired nothing else but to see this sacred fire burning in our hearts: I am come to cast fire upon the earth: and what will I but that it be kindled?[1199] And, in fact, how many happy souls have been so inflamed with the thoughts of a crucified God as to forsake all things else to give themselves entirely to his holy love! What more could Jesus Christ have done to induce us to love him than to die in torments upon a cross to prove how much he loved us? With good reason did St. Francis of Paula, when he contemplated with admiration Jesus crucified, exclaim in an ecstasy of love, "O charity! charity! charity!"

2. But alas, how generally do men live forgetful of so loving a God! If the vilest of men if a slave had done for me what Jesus Christ has done and suffered for me, how should I be able to live without loving him? O God! who is he that hangs upon the cross? the same that created me and that now dies for me, That cross, those thorns, those nails, exclaim, and with a still louder voice those wounds cry out and demand our love.

3. "May I die," said St. Francis of Assisi, "for the love of Thy love, O Jesus! who hast died for the love of my love." To make an adequate return for the love of God in dying for us would require another God to die for him. It would be but little, it would be nothing, were each of us to give a thousand lives in return for the love of Jesus Christ. But Jesus is satisfied with our giving him our hearts; nevertheless he is not satisfied unless we give them entirely to him. For this end, says the Apostle, did he die, that he might have the entire dominion of our hearts: That He might be Lord both of the dead and of the living.[1200] My beloved Redeemer, how can I ever more forget Thee? how can I love anything else, after ha ving seen Thee die in torments on an infamous gibbet to satisfy for my sins? and how can I reflect that my sins have reduced Thee to this, and not die with grief at the remembrance of the offences I have committed against Thee? Jesus, help me; I desire nothing but Thee; help me and love me. O Mary, my hope! assist me by thy prayers.

Meditation XXXVIII

THE WILL OF GOD TO SAVE ALL

1. The Apostle St. Paul teaches us that God willeth the salvation of all: He will have all men to be saved;[1201] and St. Peter saith: the Lord, dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[1202] For this end the Son of God came down from heaven, and was made man, and spent thirty-three years in labours and sufferings, and finally shed his blood and laid down his life for our salvation; and shall we forfeit our salvation? Thou, my Saviour, didst spend Thy whole life in securing my salvation, and in what have I spent so many years of my life? What fruit hast Thou hitherto reaped from me? I have deserved to be cut off and cast into hell. But Thou desirest not the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live.[1203] Yes, O God! I leave all and turn myself to Thee. I love Thee, and because I love Thee I am sorry for having offended Thee. Accept of me, and suffer me not to forsake Thee any more.

2. How much did the saints do to secure their eternal salvation! How many nobles and kings have forsaken their kingdoms and estates, and shut themselves up in cloisters! How many young persons have forsaken their country and friends, and have dwelt in caves and deserts! And how many martyrs have laid down their lives under the most cruel tortures! And why? to save their souls. And what have we done? Woe to me, who, although I know that death is near at hand, yet think not of it! No, my God, I will no longer live at a distance from Thee. Why do I delay? Is it that death may overtake me in the miserable state in which I now am? No, my God, do Thou assist me to prepare for death.

3. O God, how many graces has my Saviour bestowed on me to enable me to save my soul! He has caused me to be born in the bosom of the true Church; he has many times pardoned me my transgressions; he has favoured me with many lights in sermons, in prayers, in meditations, in Communions, and spiritual exercises; and often has he called me to his love. In a word, how many means of salvation has he granted me which he has not granted others! And yet, O God! when shall I detach myself from the world and give myself entirely to Thee? Behold me, O Jesus! I will no longer resist. Thou hast obliged me to love Thee. I desire to be wholly Thine: do Thou accept of me, and disdain not the love of a sinner who has hitherto so much despised Thee. I love Thee, my God, my love, and my all; have pity on me, O Mary! thou art my hope.

Meditation XXXIX

THE NEAR APPROACH OF DEATH

1. Every one knows that he must certainly die; yet many delude themselves by imagining that death is at so immense a distance from them that it will scarcely ever reach them. No; our life is indeed short, and death is very near us. The days of our sojourning here are few, and perhaps much fewer than we imagine. What else is our life but a light vapour, which is driven away and disappears with the wind? a blade of grass which is dried up in the heat of the sun? O God! Thou wouldst not suffer death to overtake me when I was under Thy displeasure, because Thou didst love me and didst desire my salvation; wherefore I will also love Thee.

2. My days, said holy Job, have been swifter than a post.[1204] Death is hasting towards us more rapidly than a post, and we at every step, and every breath and moment, are drawing nearer and nearer to death. At the time of our death how shall we wish for one day or one hour of the many we now squander away to no purpose! Ah! Lord, if death were now announced to me, what should I find that I have done for Thee? Alas! come to my assistance; let me not die ungrateful to Thee as I hitherto have been. Grant me true sorrow for my sins, the gift of Thy love, and holy perseverance.

3. Death hastens towards us; wherefore we must also hasten to do that which is good, and to put our accounts in order against the day of its arrival. When death comes it precludes all remedies for what has been done amiss. How many are now in hell who thought of amending their lives at some future period, but were prevented by death and consigned to eternal torments! My dear Redeemer, I will no longer resist Thy calls. Thou offerest me pardon, and I am desirous of obtaining it; I pray for it, and hope for it, through that death which Thou, my Jesus, hast suffered that Thou mayest be able to impart it to me. I am sorry, O infinite goodness, for having offended Thee. Thou, my Jesus, hast died for me, and I have postponed Thy friendship to my own wretched inclinations. For the future I hope with Thy assistance always to love Thee. I love Thee, O God! I love Thee. Thou art now and shalt be forever my only good, my only love. Mary, mother of God, watch over me and take pity on me.

Meditation XL

GOD ABANDONS THE SINNER IN HIS SINS

1. It is a grievous chastisement of God, when he cuts the sinner off in his sins; but still worse is that whereby he abandons him and suffers him to add sin upon sin. "No punishment is so great," says Bellarmine, "as when sin is made the punishment of sin."[1205] I give Thee thanks, therefore, O Jesus! for not having suffered me to die in my sins; and I give Thee still greater thanks for not having abandoned me in my sins. And oh! into how much deeper an abyss of sin should I have fallen if Thou hadst not supported me. Continue, O Lord! to keep me from sin and do not forsake me.

2. I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be wasted.[1206] When the master cuts down the fence of his vineyard, and leaves it open for any one to enter therein, it is a sign that he considers it not worth cultivating, and abandons it. In like manner does God proceed when he forsakes a sinful soul: he takes away from it the hedge of his holy fear, of his light, and of his voice; and hence the soul being blinded and enslaved by its vices, which overpower it, despises everything, the grace of God, heaven, admonitions, and censures; it thinks lightly even of its own damnation, and thus enveloped in darkness is certain to be lost forever.

The wicked man, when He is come into the depths of sins, contemneth.[1207] This have I deserved, O God! for having so often despised Thy light and Thy calls. But I see that Thou hast not yet abandoned me. I love Thee, O my God! and in Thee do I place all my hopes.

3. We would have cured Babylon, but she is not healed; let us forsake her. [1208] The physician visits the sick man, prescribes remedies for him, and makes him sensible of his maladies; but when he sees that his patient does not obey him, and on this account grows worse and worse, he takes leave of him and forsakes him. It is thus that God deals with obstinate sinners: after a certain time he speaks but little to them; and only assists them with grace just sufficient to enable them to save their souls; but they will not save them. The darkness of their minds, the hardness of their hearts, and the inveteracy of their wicked habits, render it morally impossible for them to gain salvation. But, O God! since Thou still callest me to repentance, Thou hast not yet abandoned me; I desire never more to forsake Thee. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! and because I love Thee I am exceedingly sorry for having offended Thee. I love Thee, and I hope through Thy blood to love Thee forever. Suffer me not to be any more separated from Thee. Hail Mary, Virgin of virgins, become my advocate.

Meditation XLI

THE EXAMINATION AT THE PARTICULAR JUDGMENT

1. In the same moment and in the same place in which the soul departs from the body, the divine tribunal is erected, the indictment read, and the sentence pronounced by the sovereign judge. Whom he foreknew, says St. Paul, he also predestinated to be made conformable to his Son . . . them he also justified.[1209] In order, therefore, to be made worthy of glory, our lives must be made conformable to the life of Jesus Christ. Hence it is that St. Peter says that, in the day of judgment, the just man shall scarcely be saved.[1210] O Jesus, my Saviour and my judge! what will become of me, since my whole life has hitherto been the reverse of Thine? But Thy Passion is my hope. I am a sinner, but Thou canst make me a saint, and this I hope for from Thy bounty.

2. The Venerable Father Louis da Ponte, reflecting on the account which he should have to give of his whole life at the time of his death, trembled to such a degree as to make the whole room shake. And how ought we to tremble at the thought of this account! and how diligent ought we to be in seeking the Lord whilst we may find him! At the time of death it will be difficult to find him, if we are overtaken in our sins; but now we may easily find him by repentance and love.[1211] Yes, my God, I am sorry above every evil for having despised Thee; and I now esteem and love Thee above every good.

3. What shall I do, said holy Job, when God shall rise to judge? and when He shall examine, what shall I answer Him?[1212]

And what shall I answer him, if, after so many mercies, so many calls, still I resist him? No, Lord, I will no longer resist Thee, I will no longer be ungrateful to Thee. I have committed many offences and disloyalties against Thee, but Thou hast shed Thy blood to save me from my sins. "Help Thy servant whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood."[1213] I am sorry, my sovereign good, for having offended Thee, and I love Thee with my whole heart; have pity on me. And O Mary, my Mother, do not abandon me!

Meditation XLII

THE JOURNEY TO ETERNITY

1. Man shall go into the house of his eternity.[1214] This earth is not our true country; we are only passing through it on our way to eternity. The land in which I dwell, the house which I inhabit, are not mine. In a short time, and when I least expect it, I must leave them. The house which will contain my body until the day of general judgment will be the grave, and the house of my soul will be eternity, in heaven if I be saved, in hell if I be lost. Foolish indeed, then, should I be were I to place my affections on things which I must soon leave. I will endeavour to procure for myself a happy mansion in which I may dwell forever.

2. Man shall go into the house of his eternity. It is said "he shall go," to give us to understand that each one shall go, in another life, into that house which he himself has chosen: "he shall go," he shall not be conducted, but shall go thither of his own free will. Faith teaches us that, in the next life, there are two habitations: one is a palace of delights, where all are happy forever, and this is paradise; the other is a prison of excruciating torments, where all are forever miserable, and this is hell. Choose, my soul, to which of the two thou wilt go. If thou desirest heaven, thou must walk in the way which leads to heaven; if thou shouldst walk in the way which leads to hell, thou wilt one day unhappily find thyself there. O Jesus, enlighten me; Jesus, strengthen me. Suffer me not to be separated from Thee.

3. Man shall go into the house of his eternity. If then I be saved and enter into the house of bliss, I shall there be happy forever; but if I be lost and enter into the house of woe, I shall be miserable forever. If, therefore, I would be saved, I must keep eternity always before my eyes. He who frequently meditates upon eternity does not become attached to the goods of this world, and thus secures his salvation. I will endeavour, therefore, so to regulate all my actions that they may be so many steps towards a happy eternity. O God! I believe in life eternal. Henceforth I will live only for Thee; hitherto I have lived for myself and have lost Thee, my sovereign good. I will never more lose Thee; but will forever serve and love Thee. Assist me, O Jesus! and do not abandon me. Mary, my Mother, protect me.

Meditation XLIII

JESUS, THE MAN OF SORROWS

1. The prophet Isaias calls our Blessed Redeemer a man of sorrows;[1215] and such he was, for his whole life was a life of sorrows. He took upon his own shoulders all our debts. It is true that as he was man and God, a single prayer from him would have been sufficient to make satisfaction for the sins of the whole world; but our Saviour would rigorously satisfy divine justice, and hence he chose for himself a life of contempt and suffering, being content for the love of man to be treated as the last and the vilest of men, as the prophet Isaias had foreseen him: We have seen Him . . . despised and the most abject of men.[1216] O my despised Jesus! by the contempt which Thou didst endure Thou hast made satisfaction for the contempt with which I have treated Thee. Oh that I had died and had never offended Thee!

2. Who, my God, amongst the sons of men, was ever so afflicted and oppressed as our most loving Redeemer? Man, however much he may be afflicted in this world, enjoys from time to time relief and consolation. Thus does our compassionate God treat his ungrateful and rebellious creatures. But he would not thus treat his beloved Son; for the life of Jesus Christ in this world was not only a life of afflictions, but of continual afflictions from its commencement until death. Our Blessed Saviour was deprived of all consolation and of every kind of relief. In a word, he was born but to suffer and to be the man of sorrows. O Jesus! how unhappy is he who does not love Thee, or who loves Thee but little, after Thou hast so loved us miserable worms who have offended Thee! Enable me from this day forward to love no other but Thee, who alone art worthy of being loved.

3. Again, men suffer afflictions, but it is only while they are suffering them, because they do not know those which are yet to come. But Jesus Christ, having, as God, a knowledge of all future things, suffered in every moment of his life, not only the pains which actually afflicted him, but all those also which were to come upon him, and especially the outrages of his most sorrowful Passion, having always before his eyes his scourging at the pillar, his crowning with thorns, his crucifixion and bitter death, with all the sorrows and desolation which accompanied it. And why, O Jesus! didst Thou suffer so much for me who have so grievously offended Thee? Accept of me now that I may love Thee, and that henceforward I may love no other but Thee. My love and my only good, accept of me and strengthen me. I am resolved to become holy, that I may please Thee alone. Thou desirest me to be all Thine, and such do I desire to be. Holy Mary, thou art my hope.

Meditation XLIV

THE FOLLY OF NEGLECTING SALVATION

1. What doth it profit a man, saith our Lord, if he gain the world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?[1217] How many rich men, how many nobles, how many monarchs, are now in hell! What now remains to them of their riches and honours but remorse and rage, which prey upon their souls, and will continue to prey upon them for all eternity? O my God! enlighten me and assist me. I hope nevermore to be deprived of Thy grace. Have pity on a sinner who desires to love Thee.

2. How comes it, writes Salvian, that men believe in death, judgment, hell, and eternity, and yet live without fearing them? Hell is believed, and yet how many go down thither! But, O God! while these truths are believed, they are not dwelt upon, and hence are so many souls lost. Alas! I also have been of the number of those who have been guilty of such folly. Although I knew that by offending Thee I was forfeiting Thy friendship, and writing my own condemnation; yet I was not restrained from committing sin! "Cast me not away from Thy face." I am sensible of the evil I have done in despising Thee, my God, and am grieved for it with my whole soul. Oh, "cast me not away from Thy face."

3. And then? and then? Oh, what force had these two words with F. P. Francis Zazzera when repeated to him by St. Philip Neri, in order to induce him to renounce the world and give himself wholly to God! Oh that they would be wise, and would understand, and would provide for their latter end.[1218] Oh! if all persons would but think of death, in which everything must be relinquished; of judgment, in which an account must be given of our whole lives; of a happy or miserable eternity, which must be the lot of each one: if all did but provide for these last things of their lives, no one would be lost. The present only is thought of, and hence is eternal salvation lost. I give Thee thanks, O God, for the patience with which Thou hast hitherto borne with me, and for the light which—Thou now bestowest upon me. I see that although I forgot Thee, Thou didst not forget me. I am sorry, my sovereign good, for having turned my back upon Thee, and I am now resolved to give myself entirely to Thee. And why should I delay? That Thou mayest abandon me, and that death may find me as miserable and ungrateful as I have been even until now? No, my God, I will no more offend Thee, but will love Thee. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! Give me perseverance and Thy holy love; I ask for nothing more. Mary, refuge of sinners, intercede for me.[1219]

Meditation XLV

THE MOMENT OF DEATH

1. "O moment, on which depends eternity!"[1220] x Oh: how much depends on the last moment of our lives, on our last breath Either an eternity of delights, or an eternity of torments, a life of happiness, or a life of misery. What folly therefore must it be, for the sake of a wretched momentary pleasure in this life, to run the risk of making an evil end, and beginning a life of misery which will never terminate! O God! what will become of me in the last moment of my life? O Jesus, who didst die for my salvation! suffer me not to be lost forever; suffer me not to lose Thee, my only good.

2. O God! how do those miserable criminals who are condemned to cast lots for their lives tremble when they throw the dice, upon the cast of which depends their life or death! Tell me, Christian, if you were in such a situation, how much you would give to be liberated from it? But faith teaches you that you will one day arrive at that last moment, on which will depend your eternal life or death. You will then say, "Alas! I must now be either happy forever with God, or in despair forever without him." No, my God, I will not lose Thee; if I have hitherto forfeited Thy friendship, I am sorry for it, and sincerely repent of it; I will never lose Thee more.

3. Either we believe, or we do not believe. And if we believe that there is an eternity, that we can die only once, and that if we die ill, the consequences will be eternal, without the least hope of remedy; why do we not resolve to separate ourselves from all danger of being lost, and to use all the means in our power to secure for ourselves a happy death? No security can be too great when eternity is at stake. The days of our lives are so many favours from God, by which he allows us time to prepare our accounts against the arrival of death. Delay not, for you have no time to lose. Behold me, O God! tell me what I must do to be saved, for I will do all that Thou requirest of me. I have turned my back upon Thee; and for this I am exceedingly sorry, and for having done so would willingly die of grief. Pardon me, O Lord! and suffer me not to forsake Thee anymore. I love Thee above all things, and will never more cease to love Thee. Holy Mary, Virgin of virgins, obtain for me the grace of perseverance in virtue.

Meditation XLVI

THE DESIRE OF GOD TO SAVE SINNERS

1. It is indeed very surprising that man, a worm of the earth, should dare to offend his Creator and turn his back upon him, by despising his graces after God has so favoured and loved him as to lay down his life to save him. But it is still more surprising that God, after having been thus despised by man, should seek after him, invite him to repentance and offer him his pardon, as though God stood in need of us and not we of him. O Jesus! Thou seekest me, and I seek after Thee. Thou desirest me, and I desire only Thee.

2. For Christ, saith the Apostle, we beseech you, be reconciled to God.[1221] "And does God," exclaims St. Chrysostom, "call thus upon sinners? And what does he ask of them? to be reconciled, and be in peace with him."[1222] My Redeemer, Jesus Christ, how couldst Thou have had so much love for me, who have so often offended Thee? I detest all my offences against Thee; give me still greater grief, still greater love, that I may deplore my sins, not so much on account of the punishments I have deserved by them, as for the injury I have offered to Thee, my God, who art infinitely good and amiable.

3. What is man, exclaims holy Job, that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him?[1223] What good, O Lord! hast Thou ever derived from me? and what canst Thou expect from me, that Thou lovest me so much, and comest so near to me? Hast Thou then forgotten all the injuries and treasons which I have committed against Thee? But since Thou hast so much loved me, I, a miserable worm, must also love Thee, my Creator and my Redeemer. Yes, I do love Thee, my God; I love Thee with my w hole heart, I love Thee more than myself, and because I love Thee I will do everything to please Thee. Thou knowest that nothing is so grievous to me as the remembrance of my having so often despised Thy love. I hope for the future to be able to compensate by my love for the frequent displeasure which I have given Thee. Help me for the sake of that precious blood which Thou hast shed for me. Help me also, O holy Mary! for the love of thy Son who died for me.

Meditation XLVII

THE SENTENCE OF PARTICULAR JUDGMENT

1. Oh! what joy will he experience who, departing out of this life in the grace of God, will, on being presented before Jesus Christ, behold him with a benignant countenance, be lovingly received by him, and hear from him those delightful words: Well done, thou good and faithful servant: because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.[1224] But, O Jesus! if I were now to be summoned to judgment before Thee, how could I hope that Thou wouldst call me a good and faithful servant, when I have hitherto been so bad and faithless towards Thee, changing my promises of fidelity into treasons? But I will be faithful to Thee for the future, and will so oner lose my life a thousand times than forfeit Thy grace. Do Thou give me strength to fulfil this my resolution.

2. On the other hand, what anguish, O Jesus! will that sinner experience, who, dying in sin, and being presented before Thee, beholds Thy wrathful countenance! The soul that departs this life in God's displeasure will first condemn itself, and will then hear from Jesus Christ that terrible sentence: Depart from me, thou accursed, into everlasting fire?[1225] How often, O Jesus, have I deserved to hear from Thee the same sentence when I have committed mortal sin! When death overtakes me, Thou wilt then be my judge; but now Thou art my Father and Redeemer, ready to pardon me, if I am sorry for having offended Thee. I am therefore sorry, from the bottom of my heart, for all my offences against Thee; and I am sorry, not so much on account of hell which I have deserved by them, as because by them I have grievously offended Thee, who hast loved me with an infinite love.

3. The soul goes forth and leaves the body, but it is for some time doubtful whether the person be alive or dead. While the bystanders are doubting, the soul has already entered eternity. The priest, satisfied at length that the man is dead, recites the prayer of the Church: "Come to his assistance, all ye saints of God: meet him, all ye angels of God: receive his soul and present it now before its Lord."[1226] But of what avail will it be to the soul that has departed an enemy of God, and upon which sentence has already been passed, to call the saints and angels to its assistance? O my good angel, ye saints, my holy advocates, St. Michael, St. Joseph, and you my holy protectress Mary! help me now whilst you have it in your power. And Thou, my Redeemer, pardon me now whilst Thou dost exercise mercy. I am sorry for having offended Thee, and I love Thee with my whole heart. Assist me, O Lord! and support me, that I may never offend Thee more. O Mary! take me forever to thy care.

Meditation XLVIII

AN UNPROVIDED DEATH

1. Nothing is more certain than death, but nothing more uncertain than the hour of death. It is certain that the year and day of each one's death are already determined by our Lord, though we know them not; and wisely does God conceal them from us, in order that we may always prepare for our departure. I give Thee thanks, O Jesus! for having waited for me, and for not having called me out of life in the state of mortal sin. During the remainder of my life I will bewail my iniquities and love Thee with all my strength. I know that I must die, and by Thy grace I will prepare myself for a good death.

2. Jesus Christ admonishes us of the hour of our death, and when will it be? when we least expect it. At what hour you think not, the Son of man will come.[1227] If then, says St. Bernard, death may at any time take us out of life, we should at all times be prepared for it and keep our accounts in order. O Jesus! I will not wait until the moment of my death to give myself to Thee. Thou hast said that those who seek Thee shall find Thee: Seek and ye shall find.[1228] I seek Thee, I desire Thee; grant that I may find Thee. I am sorry for my sins and will nevermore offend Thee.

3. When then, dear Christian, you are tempted to commit sin with the hope of confessing it on the morrow, say to yourself: But who knows but that this moment may be my last? And if in this moment I should be guilty of sin, and death should overtake me, whither should I go? O God! how many miserable sinners have been struck by death in the act of feasting themselves on some poisonous gratification! The devil will say to you: This misfortune will not befall you. But do you answer him: If it should befall me, what will become of me for eternity? O God! may not that happen to me which has happened to so many other unhappy sinners? How many are now in hell for lesser sins than I have committed! I give Thee thanks. O Jesus! for having waited for me with so much patience, and for having now enlightened me. I have erred in forsaking Thee; and death might have been my punishment; but since Thou givest me time, henceforward I will think of nothing but of loving Thee. Assist me with Thy grace. And do thou, Mary, assist me by thy holy intercession.

Meditation XLIX

THE ETERNITY OF HELL

1. If hell were not eternal, it would not be hell. Punishment that does not continue for a long time is not grievous punishment. On the other hand, punishment, however light it may be, when it continues for a long time, becomes intolerable. Were a person obliged during the whole of his life to see the same entertainments, or to hear the same music, how could he endure it? What then must it be to remain in hell and to suffer all its torments! And for how long a time? For all eternity. It would be folly, for the sake of a day's pleasure, to condemn onēs self to be burnt alive. And is it not folly, for the sake of a sensual gratification, which can last but for one moment, to condemn onēs self to the fire of hell, whose victims, though dying every moment, yet never, never die? O God! preserve me by Thy grace. Woe to me if I should turn my back upon Thee after the great mercy with which Thou hast dealt with me! Keep me, O God! and preserve me from so great a misfortune.

2. Let us awaken our slumbering faith. It is certain that he who is lost is lost forever, without the least hope of being redeemed from eternal ruin. They shall go into eternal punishment.[1229] He who once enters the prison of hell can come out no more. Otherwise the condemned wretches would flatter themselves with hopes, and would say, Who knows, perhaps God may some day have pity on us and deliver us? But no, they well know that hell will never have an end, and that they must continue to suffer the same torments that they at present endure so long as God shall be God. My dear Redeemer, I know too well that by the past I have forfeited Thy grace, and condemned myself to hell; but I do not know whether Thou hast pardoned me. Hasten to forgive me, O Jesus! while I bitterly lament my offences against Thee, and never suffer me to offend Thee any more.

3. In this life death is of all things the most dreaded, but in hell it is of all things the most desired. There they desire and long for death, but cannot die. They shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them.[1230] Are there not at least, in that place of torments, some to compassionate them? No, all hate them, and rejoice in their sufferings, which will last forever, without end of mitigation. The trumpet of divine justice continually sounds and thunders forth in their ears those terrible words: "Ever, ever; never, never." Amongst these miserable beings, O Jesus! I have deserved to be numbered; but do Thou, who hast hitherto preserved me from falling into hell, preserve me for the future from falling into sin, which alone can condemn me to that place of woe. Ah! never suffer me again to become Thy enemy. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! and I am sorry for having offended Thee. Pardon me, and as I have deserved to burn forever in the fire of hell, grant me to burn forever with the fire of Thy holy love. O Mary, in thy powerful intercession do I confide.

Meditation L

THE UNCERTAINTY OF GRACE

1. Delay not to be converted to the Lord, and put it not off from day to day: for His wrath shall come on a sudden, and in the time of vengeance will He destroy thee.[1231] The Lord admonishes us to be speedily converted, if we would be saved; because if we go on putting off our conversion from day to day, the time of vengeance will come, when God will neither call nor wait for us any longer; death will overtake us in sin, and there will be no means of escaping eternal damnation. God admonishes us in this manner, because he loves us and wills not to see us perish. I am convinced, O God! that Thou desirest my salvation; I know that Thou desirest to deal with me in Thy mercy; and it is my desire nevermore to despise Thee.

2. Alas! to how many are the admonitions given by God during life, become now in hell the most cruel swords that pierce their souls! In proportion as the mercies which God showed them were greater, so were their crimes more enormous. If, O Jesus! Thou hadst condemned me to hell, as I have deserved, how great would have been my punishment, since Thy graces and favours have been so abundant towards me! No, I will no longer be ungrateful to Thee. Say to me what Thou pleasest, and I will obey Thee in all things. I am sorry for having so often offended Thee; henceforward I will not seek to please myself, but to please only Thee, my God and only good.

3. How cautious are men in their temporal affairs, and yet how negligent in the affairs of eternity! If a man has to receive a sum of money from another, he uses every expedient to obtain it as quickly as possible, saying, "Who knows what may happen?" And yet, why do so many live months and years in sin? Because they do not say, when the soul is at stake, "Who knows what may happen?" If money be lost, however valuable it may be, all is not lost; but if the soul be lost, all is lost, and must be lost forever, without hope of recovery. My beloved Redeemer, Thou hast given me life that I may become worthy of Thy grace; and yet I have often renounced Thy grace for something worse than nothing. Pardon me, O infinite goodness! for I am sorry, from the bottom of my heart, for having done so. O Jesus! Thou hast done too much to oblige me to love Thee, and I desire to love Thee to the utmost of my power. I love Thee, my sovereign good, I love Thee more than myself. Permit me not, O God! to cease to love Thee any more. O Mary, holy queen! protect me.

Meditation LI

THE DEATH OF JESUS FOR THE LOVE OF MEN

1. Was it ever possible that God, the Creator of all things, should have been pleased to die for the love of his creatures? It is of faith that he has done so. He hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.[1232] The earth, the heavens, and all nature, with astonishment beheld Jesus, the only begotten Son of God, the lord of the universe, die of intense pain and anguish, on a disgraceful cross; and why? For the love of men. And do men believe this and not love God? I have believed it, O Jesus! and yet not only have I not loved Thee, but I have frequently offended Thee. Pardon me, I beseech Thee, and remind me continually of the death which Thou hast suffered for me, that I may nevermore offend Thee, but may always love Thee.

2. It was not necessary for man's salvation that God should die; one drop of his blood, a single tear, or a prayer would have been sufficient, because being of infinite value, it would have redeemed this or a thousand other worlds. But, O Jesus! Thou wouldst suffer so much, to teach us Thy great love for us. Hence, St. Bonaventure exclaims, but with much greater reason may I exclaim, who have so often offended my Redeemer: "Alas! my God, why hast Thou so much loved me? why, O Lord, why? Who am I?" O divine Pastor of my soul, behold I am the lost sheep, in quest of which Thou didst come upon the earth. I have ungratefully fled away from Thee; since, unmindful of the sufferings which I have occasioned Thee, Thou callest me, miserable as I am, but overcome with Thy great goodness, embracing Thy sacred feet, nailed to the cross. Jesus, my love, my treasure! I love Thee, and because I love Thee I am sorry for having offended Thee.

3. St. Bernard, imagining himself present when Pilate passed sentence of death on our Blessed Saviour, thus addresses him: "What hast Thou done, my most innocent Saviour, that Thou shouldst be thus condemned?[1233] Thou art innocence itself; and how do I now behold Thee condemned to death, even to the death of the cross? What crime hast Thou committed?" And he proceeds to answer, "Thy crime is love." As if he had said, Ah! it is Thy too great love for us, and not Pilate, that condemns Thee to death. When, my dear Redeemer, I remember the offences I have committed against Thee, it is not hell, which I have deserved for them, that makes me grieve, but the love which Thou hast shown me. Ah! my crucified God, I desire to be henceforth and forever Thine, and I will love no other but Thee. Strengthen my weakness, and make me faithful to Thee. Holy Mary, mother of God, enable me to love Jesus; this is the only favour I ask.

THE CERTAINTY OF BEING EITHER SAVED OR LOST

1. With fear and trembling, saith the Apostle, work out your salvation.[1234] In order to be saved we should tremble lest we be lost, for there is no medium; we must be either saved or lost forever. He who trembles not is in great danger of being lost, because he takes but little care to employ the means of obtaining salvation. God desires that all should be saved, and he gives to all his grace; but lie requires that all should co-operate for this end. All desire to be saved; many, because they will not employ the means of salvation, are lost. St. Philip Neri used to say, "Heaven is not made for the slothful." Enlighten me, O Lord, that I may know what I ought to do, and what to avoid, for I desire to do all that Thou requirest of me. I am determined, by Thy grace, to save my soul.

2. St. Teresa said to her religious, "One soul! my daughters, one eternity!" She meant that in this world we ought not to attend to anything but to the salvation of our souls; because if the soul be lost, all will be lost; and if once lost, will be lost forever. Benedict XII, being asked by a prince for a favour that he could not grant without committing sin, answered the ambassador: "Tell your prince that if I had two souls I would give him one; but as I have only one, I cannot consent to lose it for his sake." Thus should we answer the devil or the world when they offer us forbidden fruit. O God! how often have I lost my soul. By forfeiting Thy grace! But since Thou offerest me Thy pardon, I detest all the offences I have committed against Thee, and love Thee above all things.

3. Would that we were fully impressed with the meaning of that great maxim of St. Francis Xavier, "There is but one evil, and there is but one good in the world!" The only evil is damnation; the only good, salvation. No; poverty, infirmity, ignominies are not evils; these when embraced with resignation will increase our glory in heaven. On the other hand, health, riches, and honours are not goods for too many Christians, because they become to them greater occasion of losing their souls. Save me then, O God! and do with me what Thou pleasest. Thou knowest and willest what is best for me. I abandon myself to Thy mercy: Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit.[1235] I am so sorry for having been hitherto opposed to Thy will, as to die to expiate my offences; but now I love Thee, and will nothing but what Thou willest. Grant me Thy love, that I may be faithful to Thee. And, Mary, give me thy powerful assistance.

Meditation LIII

THE CERTAINTY OF DEATH

1. How is it possible, O God! that there should be any Christians who believe that they must one day die; and that after death an eternity of happiness or misery awaits them; who know that on the moment of death will depend their being happy or miserable forever; and yet adopt not all the means of securing for themselves the blessing of a good death? Give, O Lord! tears to my eyes that I may bewail my offences against Thee. I knew that by offending Thee I should forfeit Thy grace and condemn myself to eternal torments; I knew this, and yet I was not restrained from committing sin. I am sorry, O God! for having dishonoured Thee, by renouncing Thee for the sake of my own wretched inclinations; have pity on me.

2. If we hear of one dying suddenly who did not live prepared for death, we compassionate him, and say, "Alas! what has become of his poor soul?" And yet why are we not ourselves prepared at all times to die? It may be that the misfortune of a sudden death may happen to us; but whether sooner or later, whether prepared or unprepared, whether we think of it or not, we must one day surrender our souls into the hands of God. The place of execution is already prepared for us, and the malady which is to be our executioner and take us out of the world is stealing upon us; why then do we not endeavour to become daily more and more united with Jesus Christ, who will soon become our Judge? My dear Redeemer, I hope through the merits of Thy death to live and die in Thy grace and favour. I love Thee, O infinite goodness, and I hope to love Thee always in this life and for all eternity in the next.

3. In every succeeding age, cities and kingdoms are peopled with new beings, and their predecessors buried in their graves. Those who lived here a century ago, where are they now! gone into eternity! And thus, dear reader, in a hundred years hence, even in a much shorter time, neither you nor I will be alive in this world, but we shall be either happy or miserable forever in the next; either saved or lost for all eternity, one or other will most certainly be our lot. I may then, O God! either be saved, as I hope I shall be, or I may be lost on account of my sins And is it possible that I may be lost, and yet not think of adopting every means of securing my salvation? Enlighten me, O Lord! and make known to me what I must do to be saved, for with Thy help I will do all that Thou requirest of me. I have many times lost my respect for Thee, my Father, but Thou hast not ceased to love me. I detest all my offences against Thee, and I love Thee, O God! with my whole soul. Give me Thy blessing, Father, and never suffer me to be again separated from Thee. Mary, my mother, have pity on me.

Meditation LIV

THE VANITY OF THE WORLD

1. Only the grave, saith holy Job, remaineth for me.[1236] Days and years pass away, pleasures, honours, and riches pass away, and what will be the end? Death will come and strip us of all, and we shall be buried in the grave to corrupt and moulder into dust, deserted and forgotten by all. Alas! how, in the end of our lives, will the remembrance of all we have acquired in this world serve for nothing but to increase our anguish and our uncertainty of salvation! O death, O death, never depart from before my eyes. O God, do Thou enlighten me.

2. My life is cut off as by a weaver.[1237] How many, in the midst of executing their long-contemplated designs, are overtaken by death and deprived of all things! Ah, with what pain and remorse will the goods of this world be regarded, on the bed of death, by those who have been unduly attached to them! To worldlings who are spiritually blind the goods of this present life appear great; but death will discover what they really are. dust smoke, and vanity. Before the light of this last lamp all the dazzling grandeur of this world will vanish and disappear. The greatest fortunes, the highest honours, when considered on the bed of death, will lose all their value and splendour. The shade of death will obscure even crowns and sceptres. Grant me, O God! Thy holy grace, for this alone is all I desire. I am grieved for having ever despised such a treasure. Jesus, have pity on me.

3. Of what avail then will riches be at the hour of death, when nothing will remain for us but a wooden coffin and a winding-sheet? Of what avail will be the honours which we have acquired, when no others will remain for us but a funeral procession and a tomb, which will not be able to afford us the least satisfaction, if our souls should be lost? And of what avail will the beauty of the body be, when the body itself will become a mass of worms, infect the air with its stench, and excite horror in all who behold it? My dear Redeemer, although I knew that by sinning I should forfeit Thy friendship, yet did I sin; but I hope for pardon from Thee who hast died to purchase pardon for me. Oh that I had never offended Thee, my good God! I behold the love which Thou hast shown me; and this increases my grief for having displeased Thee who art so good a Father. I love Thee, O Lord! and will never live without loving Thee; give me perseverance. Mary, my mother, pray to Jesus for me.

Meditation LV

THE PROVOKING OF GOD BY SIN

1. Thus does the royal prophet speak of sinners: They tempted and provoked the most high God.[1238] God is incapable of grief; but were it possible for him to grieve, every sin that men commit would deeply afflict him and deprive him of happiness. Sin, O God! is the return I have made Thee for Thy love! How often have I renounced Thy friendship for the sake of some wretched self-gratification O infinite goodness! because Thou art such, pardon me my offences.

2. St. Bernard, moreover, adds that the malice of sin is so great that it would annihilate God, were this possible.[1239] If God could die, mortal sin would deprive him of life.

And how? Father Medina answers, "Because it would give him infinite sorrow." How afflicting is it to be injured by those whom we have especially befriended and loved! What then must it be for God to behold man, whom he has favoured with so many and so great benefits and loved with so great love, even to shedding his blood and laying down his life, what must it be to behold man turn his back upon him and despise his grace for a mere nothing, for a fit of passion, or a momentary pleasure! Were he capable of grief and sadness, he would die of the bitterness which such conduct would occasion him.[1240] Dearest Jesus, I am the lost sheep; Thou art the good shepherd who hast laid down Thy life for Thy sheep; have pity on me, pardon me for all the displeasure which my sins have occasioned Thee. I am grieved, O Jesus! for having offended Thee, and love Thee with my whole soul.

3. It was because our loving Redeemer had our sins constantly before his eyes that his life was so painful and full of bitterness. This was the cause of his sweating blood and suffering the agonies of death in the garden of Gethsemane, where he declared that "his soul was sorrowful even unto death."[1241] What made him sweat blood and cast him into so dreadful an agony but the sight of the sins of men? Give me then, O Jesus! a share of the sorrow which then oppressed Thee for my sins; grant that it may afflict me during my whole life, and, if Thou pleasest, even unto death. O Jesus! I desire nevermore to displease Thee, I will nevermore afflict Thee, but will love Thee with all my strength, who art my love, my life, and my only good. Suffer me not to offend Thee any more. Mary, my hope, have compassion on me.

Meditation LVI

THE LAST JUDGMENT

1. The last day is called in Scripture a day of wrath and misery;[1242] and such it will be for all those unhappy beings who have died in mortal sin; for on that day their most secret crimes will be made manifest to the whole world, and themselves separated from the company of the saints, and condemned to the eternal prison of hell, where they will suffer all the agonies of ever dying yet always remaining alive. St. Jerome, in the cave of Bethlehem, devoted to continual prayer and penance, trembled at the bare thought of the general judgment. The Ven. F. Ju venal Ancina hearing that sequence for the dead sung, "Dies iræ, dies ilia,"[1243] was so struck with the anticipation of judgment that he left the world and embraced a religious life. O Jesus! what will become of me on that day? Shall I be placed on Thy right with the elect, or on Thy left with the reprobate? I know that I have deserved to be placed on Thy left, but I know also that Thou wilt still pardon me, if I repent of my sins: wherefore I do repent of them with my whole heart, and am resolved rather to die than offend Thee any more.

2. As this will be a day of calamity and terror for the reprobate, so will it be a day of joy and triumph for the elect; for then, in the sight of all mankind, will the blessed souls of the elect be proclaimed queens of paradise, and spouses of the immaculate Lamb. O Jesus! Thy precious blood is my hope. Remember not the offences that I have committed against Thee, and inflame my whole soul with Thy love. I love Thee, my sovereign good, and I trust that in that day I shall be associated with those loving souls who will praise and love Thee for all eternity.

3. Choose, my soul; choose now either an eternal crown in that blessed kingdom, where God will be seen and loved face to face in the company of the saints, of the angels, and of Mary the Mother of Jesus; or the prison of hell, where you must weep and lament forever, abandoned by God and by all. "O Lamb of God that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us."[1244] O divine Lamb, who, to deliver us from the pains of hell, wast pleased to sacrifice Thy divine life by a bitter death upon the cross, have compassion on us; but more particularly on me who have more than others offended Thee. I am sorry above every evil for having dishonoured Thee by my sins, but I hope on that day to honour Thee before men and angels, by proclaiming Thy mercies towards me. O Jesus! help me to love Thee; 1 desire Thee alone. O Mary, holy queen! protect me in that day.

Meditation LVII

THE INTENSITY OF THE PAINS OF HELL

1. In this life when a person suffers, however great his sufferings may be, he may, at least occasionally, obtain some mitigation or repose. A sick man may suffer all the day long the pains of the most cruel disorders; but, when night comes, he may perhaps sleep a little and be somewhat relieved. Not so with the miserable reprobate. For him there is no relief, no repose. He must weep and lament forever, he must suffer forever, and suffer torments the most excruciating, without once having throughout all eternity one moment of ease or mitigation. Such, O Jesus! would have been my lot, hadst Thou called me out of life in my sins. Dearest Redeemer, I refuse not to suffer, but will truly love Thee.

2. In this life by constantly suffering pain we become accustomed to it and better able to bear it; time mitigates sufferings which at first were most grievous to us. But will the souls in hell, by eternally suffering the torments which they endure, by the habit of enduring them for so many years, will they ever find their intensity diminished? No, for the torments of hell are of such a nature that, at the end of a hundred or a thousand years, those souls will experience the same degree of pain from them as when they first descended into that bottomless abyss. In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped, let me never be confounded.[1245] I know, O Lord! that I have frequently deserved hell, yet I know likewise that Thou dost not desire the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live. O my God! I will not continue obstinate, but will repent with my whole soul of all my sins, and will love Thee more than myself; do Thou restore me to life, to the life of Thy holy grace.

3. In this life, when a person suffers he has the pity and sympathy of his relatives and friends; and these afford at least some comfort. But how miserable would it be for a man in the most excruciating pains to be upbraided and reproached by his relatives and friends with the misdeeds for which he was suffering, saying to him without pity, "Rave on in rage and despair; you have deserved all you suffer!" The miserable wretches in hell suffer all kinds of torments, suffer them continually without any relief or comfort, and have none to compassionate them. Not even God can compassionate them, for they are his enemies; nor Mary, the Mother of Mercy; nor the angels, nor the saints; on the contrary, they rejoice in their sufferings. And, at the same time, what is the conduct of the devils towards the reprobate? They trample upon them and reproach them with the crimes which they have committed against God, and for which they are now most justly punished. O Holy Mary, Mother of God, have pity on me, for thou hast it now in thy power to take pity on me and to recommend me to thy divine Son. O Jesus! Thou who didst not spare Thyself, to have compassion on me, but didst die upon the cross for my sake, save me, and may my salvation be to love Thee forever. I am sorry, O Lord! for having offended Thee, and will love Thee with my whole heart.

Meditation LVIII

THE LOVE OF CHRIST CRUCIFIED

1. Who could have conceived that the Son of God, the Lord of the universe, to show his love for us, would suffer and die upon the cross, if he had not really done so? With reason therefore did Moses and Elias on Mount Tabor speak of the death of Jesus Christ as of an excess of love.[1246] And what could be greater excess of love than for the Creator to die for his creatures? To make Thee an adequate return for Thy love, my dear Redeemer, it would be necessary for another God to die for Thee. It would therefore be but little, it would be nothing, were we poor miserable worms of the earth to give up our whole lives for Thee, who hast given Thine for us.

2. What should still more excite us to love him is the ardent desire with which, through the course of his life, he longed for the hour of his death. By this desire he indeed proved how great his love was for us.

I have a baptism, said he, wherewith I am to be baptized; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished.[1247] I must be baptized with the baptism of my own blood, to wash away the sins of men, and how am I dying with the desire of my bitter Passion and death! My soul, lift up your eyes, and behold thy Lord hanging upon a disgraceful cross; behold the blood which trickles down from his wounds; behold his mangled body, all inviting you to love him. Your Redeemer in his sufferings would have you love him at least through compassion. O Jesus! Thou didst not refuse me Thy life and precious blood, and shall I refuse Thee anything that Thou requirest of me? No, Thou hast given Thyself to me without reserve. I will give myself to Thee in like manner.

3. St. Francis de Sales, speaking of these words of the Apostle, The charity of Christ presseth us[1248] says: "Knowing that Jesus Christ, being true God, has loved us even to the laying-down of his life for us, and this upon a cross, do we not feel our hearts as it were in a press, forcibly straitened, and love expressed from them by a violence which is the more powerful as it is the more amiable?" And he adds: "Why, therefore, do we not cast ourselves upon Jesus Christ crucified, to die on the cross for the love of him who has willingly died upon the cross for the love of us? I will adhere to him, should we say, and will never abandon him; I will die with him, and be consumed in the fire of his love. My Jesus has given himself entirely to me, and I will give myself entirely to him. I will live and die upon his bosom; neither life nor death shall ever separate me from him. O eternal love! my soul seeks Thee and espouses Thee forever."[1249] O Mary, Mother of God, obtain that I may belong entirely to Jesus Christ.

Meditation LIX

THE IRRETRIEVABLE LOSS OF THE SOUL

1. There is no error so fatal in its consequences as the loss of eternal salvation. Other errors may be repaired; if a person lose a situation, lie may perhaps in time regain it; if he lose his goods, he may replace them, but if he lose his soul, he has no remedy nor hope of redemption. He can die but once; and if that once his soul be lost, it must be lost forever, and no power can save it for all eternity. Behold, O God! a wretched sinner prostrate at Thy feet, one who for so many years past has deserved to dwell in hell without further hope of salvation, but who now loves Thee, and is sorry above every other evil for having offended Thee, and hopes for mercy.

2. Does then nothing remain for the many wretched souls in hell but to lament bitterly, and say, "Therefore we have erred,"[1250] and there is no remedy for our error, nor will there be so long as God shall be God? Ah! my Redeemer, were I in hell, I could nevermore repent, nor love Thee. I thank Thee for having borne with me with so great patience, even though I have deserved hell; and now that I am still able to repent and to love Thee, I do sincerely repent for having offended Thy infinite goodness, and love Thee above all things, more than I love myself. Never permit me, O Jesus! to cease to love Thee.

3. Oh, what a torment must it be to the souls in hell to think that they knew their error before they were lost, and that they are lost entirely through their own fault! If a person lose a gold ring through carelessness, or a valuable coin, he has no peace for thinking that he has lost it through his own fault. O God! how great is the internal torment of the wicked when they exclaim, "I have lost my soul, I have lost heaven, I have lost my God; I have lost my all; and this through my own fault!" O my dear Saviour! I desire never to lose Thee: if I have hitherto lost Thee, I have done ill; Iam sorry for it with my whole soul, and love Thee above all things. O Jesus! Thou hast saved me from hell that I may love Thee. I will therefore truly love Thee. Enable me to compensate by my love for the offences which I have committed against Thee. Holy Virgin Mary, thou art my hope.

Meditation LX

WE MUST DIE

1. How much is contained in these words, "we must die!" Christian brother, you must one day certainly die. As your name was one day entered in the baptismal register, so will it one day be entered in the book of the dead, and this day is already determined by Almighty God. As you now speak of the dear memory of your father, or of your uncle, or brother, so will posterity speak of you. As you now frequently hear of the deaths of your friends or acquaintances, so will others hear of your death, and you will be gone into eternity. O God! what will then become of me? When my body is carried to the church, and Mass said over me, where will be my soul? Enable me, O Lord! to do something for Thy service before death overtakes me. How wretched should I be if at this moment it should surprise me!

2. What would you say of a criminal on the way to execution who was looking about him here and there, and attending only to the amusements which happened to be going on? Would you not think him mad, or a man who did not believe his impending fate? Are you not every moment advancing towards death? And what do you think of? You know that you must die, and that you can die only once. You believe that after t his life another awaits you which will never end; and that this eternal life will be happy or miserable according as your accounts are found at the day of your judgment; and how can you believe these truths and attend to anything else than making preparation for a good death? Enlighten me, O my God, and let the thoughts of death, and of the eternity in which I must dwell, be ever present to my mind.

3. Look at the skeletons heaped up in cemeteries: they are silently saying to you, "What has happened to us will soon overtake you." The same is repeated to you by the portraits of your parents who are dead, by the letters of their handwriting, by the rooms, the beds, the clothes which they once possessed and used, but which they have now quitted and left behind for you. All these things remind you of death which is waiting for you. My crucified Jesus, I will not delay to embrace Thee till the moment of my death, when Thy crucified image will be presented to me; but I will embrace Thee now and press Thee to my heart. Hitherto I have frequently expelled Thee from my soul, but now I love Thee more than myself, and am sorry for having despised Thee. For the future I will be always Thine, and Thou shalt be always mine. This is my hope through Thy bitter Passion and death. And this also do I hope for through thy protection, O ever blessed Mary!

Meditation LXI

THE LOVE WITH WHICH GOD RECEIVES THE REPENTANT SINNER

1. The kings of the earth reject from their presence their rebellious subjects when they come to seek for pardon; but Jesus Christ assures us that he will never reject any rebellious sinner that penitently casts himself at his feet: Him that cometh to Me I will not cast out.[1251] He despiseth not the heart that is humble and sorry for having offended him: A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[1252] I do not, O Jesus! deserve Thy pardon for the offences which I have committed against Thee, but Thou knowest that nothing afflicts me so much as the remembrance of my having offended Thee.

2. But how can I be afraid that Thou, my God, wilt cast me off, when Thou invitest me to return to Thee, and offerest me Thy pardon? Return to Me and I will receive thee.[1253] How can I doubt, when Thou promisest to embrace us, when we are converted to Thee? "Turn ye to Me, and I will turn to you."[1254] Do not, then, O Lord! turn Thy back upon me, for I will renounce all things, and turn myself to Thee, my sovereign good. I have offended Thee too long, and will now at least love Thee.

3. Our good God moreover adds that if the sinner repent of the evil which he has done, he is willing to forget all his sins: If the wicked do penance . . . living he shall live, and shall not die. I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done.[1255]

My dear Redeemer! I will never forget my sins, that I may always bewail the evil which I have done against Thee; but I trust and hope that Thou, as Thou hast promised, wilt soon forget them, and that my past iniquities will not hinder Thee from loving me. Hast Thou not said that Thou lovest those who love Thee?[1256] Hitherto I have not loved Thee, and have deserved Thy hatred; but now I will love Thee and hope that Thou wilt no longer reject me; and as Thou forgettest what is past, forgive me, unite me to Thyself, and never suffer me to be again separated from Thee. Mary, assist me by thy holy intercession.

Meditation LXII

TEMPTATIONS TO RELAPSE

1. O Christian! when the devil again tempts you to sin, telling you that "God is merciful," remember that the Lord "showeth mercy towards them that fear him,"[1257] and not to them that despise him."God is merciful," it is true; yet how many does he daily condemn to the torments of hell! "God is merciful," but he is also just. He is merciful to those who repent of their sins, but not to those who abuse his mercy to offend him the more freely. O God, how often have I done this! how often have I offended Thee because Thou wast good and merciful!

2. The devil will say to you, "As he has pardoned you many past sins, so will he pardon you the sin which you are now about to commit." No, you must reply; because he has so often forgiven me, I ought to be the more afraid, that, if I should again offend him, he will no more pardon me, but punish me for all the crimes I have ever committed against him.

Attend to the admonition of the Holy Ghost: Say not, I have sinned and what harm hath befallen me? for the most High is a patient rewarder.[1258] O God! how basely have I corresponded with Thy favours! Thou hast bestowed graces upon me, and I have requited them with injuries; Thou hast loaded me with blessings, and I have insulted and dishonoured Thee. But for the future it shall not be so. The more Thou hast borne with me, so much the more will I love Thee. Do Thou assist my weakness.

3. The devil will say to you: "But do you not see that you cannot now resist this temptation?" Answer him: But if I do not resist now, how shall I be able to resist afterwards, when I shall have become weaker, and the divine assistance will fail me? Am I to be told that in proportion as I multiply the number of my sins, God will multiply the number of his graces towards me? Finally, he will say to you: "But although you were to commit this sin, you may still be saved." Say to him in reply: I may be saved; but is this a reason why I should write my own sentence of condemnation to hell? I may be saved; but I may also be lost, and this is more probable. This is not an affair to be left to the chance of a "may be." But, O Lord! how much hast Thou done for me? I have multiplied my faults, and Thou hast increased Thy graces! The thought of this embitters my sorrow for having so heinously offended Thee. My good God, why have I offended Thee? Oh that I could die of grief! Help me, O Jesus! for I desire to be wholly Thine. Holy Mary, obtain for me perseverance in virtue, and suffer me not any more to live ungrateful to God who has so much loved me.

Meditation LXIII

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY

1. A day will come which will be the last of days, when this world will be no more. Before the coming of the Judge, fire will descend from heaven, and consume everything that is upon the earth: The earth and the works which are in it shall be burnt up.[1259] So that in that day everything upon the earth will be reduced to ashes. O God! what will all the vanities of this world then appear, for which so many now sacrifice the salvation of their souls? What appearance will all the highest dignities of this earth then make, its purple, its crowns, and its sceptres? O the folly of those who shall have loved them! And O the lamentations of those who for the love of such vanities shall have lost their God!

2. The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall rise again.[1260] This trumpet will call all men together from their graves to come to judgment. Oh how beautiful and resplendent will the bodies of the just appear! Then shall the just shine like the sun.[1261] On the contrary, how ugly and deformed will the bodies of the reprobate appear! What a torment will it be to these wretched souls to be again united with their bodies, for whose gratification they have lost heaven and lost their God, to be cast with them forever into hell, there to burn together in eternal flames! Happy will they then be who have denied their bodies all gratifications displeasing to God; and who, in order to hold them in greater subjection, have mortified them by fasting and penance! O Jesus! turn not Thy face away from me,[1262] as I have deserved. How often, for the sake of gratifying my senses, have I renounced Thy friendship! Oh that I had died rather than have thus dishonoured Thee! Have pity on me.

3. All mankind being assembled together, will be summoned by angels to appear in the valley of Josaphat, there to be publicly judged before all: Nations, nations in the valley of destruction.[1263] O my God! and must I appear in that valley? In what place shall I stand there? with the elect in glory, or with the reprobate in chains? My beloved Redeemer, Thy precious blood is my only hope. Woe to me! how often have I deserved to be condemned to dwell forever in hell, far, far from Thee, without being able to love Thee! No, my Jesus! I will love Thee forever, in this life and in the next. Permit me not to be ever again separated from Thee by sin. Thou knowest my weakness; be Thou always my help, O Jesus! and do not abandon me. Mary, my advocate, obtain for me the gift of holy perseverance.

Meditation LXIV

THE LOVE OF GOD IN GIVING US HIS SON

1. So great was God's love for us that, after having loaded us with gifts and graces, he bestowed upon us his own Son: God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son.[1264]

For us poor miserable worms of the earth, the eternal Father sent his beloved Son into this world to lead a poor and despised life, and to undergo the most ignominious and bitter death that any mortal on earth had ever suffered, an accumulation of internal as well as eternal torments, such as to cause him to exclaim when dying, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me."[1265] O eternal God! who but Thyself, who art a God of infinite love, could have bestowed upon us a gift of such infinite value? I love Thee, O infinite goodness! I love Thee, O infinite love!

2. He spared not even His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all.[1266] But, O God eternal! consider that this divine Son, whom Thou dost doom to die, is innocent, and has ever been obedient to Thee in all things. Thou lovest him even as Thyself, how then canst Thou condemn him to death for the expiation of our sins? The eternal Father replies: "It was precisely because he was my Son, because he was innocent, because he was obedient to me in all things, that it was my will he should lay down his life, in order that you might know the greatness of that love which we both bear towards you." May all creatures forever praise Thee, O God! for the excess of bounty through which Thou hast caused Thine own Son to die for the deliverance of us Thy servants. For the love of this Thy Son, have pity on me, pardon me, and save me; and let my salvation be to love Thee forever, both in this world and in the next.

3. But God (who is rich in mercy) for His too great charity wherewith He loved us . . . hath quickened us together in Christ.[1267] Too great, says the Apostle, too great has been the love of God towards us. We by sin were dead, and he raised us to life again by the death of his Son. But no, such love was not too great for the infinite bounty of our God. Being infinite in all perfection, he was infinite in love. But, O Lord! how comes it that after Thou hast shown such love towards men, there are so few who love Thee? How much do I desire to become one of the number of these few! Hitherto I have not known Thee, my sovereign good, but have forsaken Thee; I am sorry for it from the bottom of my heart, and will so love Thee that, though all should leave Thee, I will never forsake Thee, my God, my love, and my all. O Mary! unite, me ever more and more to my dearest Saviour.

Meditation LXV

EARNEST LABOUR TO SECURE ETERNAL SALVATION

1. To be saved it is not sufficient to profess merely to do what is absolutely necessary. If, for example, a person wishes to avoid only mortal sins, without making any account of those which are venial, he will easily fall into mortal sins and lose his soul. He who desires to avoid only such dangers as are absolutely the immediate occasions of sin will most probably one day discover that he has fallen into grievous crimes and is lost. O God! with what attention are the princes of this world served! Everything is avoided that can possibly give them the least offence for fear of losing their favour; but with what carelessness art Thou served! Everything that can endanger the life of the body is shunned with the greatest caution, while the dangers which threaten the life of the soul are not feared! O God! how negligently have I hitherto served Thee? Henceforth I will serve Thee with the greatest attention; be Thou my helper and assist me.

2. O Christian brother! if God should act as sparingly with you as you do with him, what would become of you? If he should grant you only grace barely sufficient, would you be saved? You would be able to obtain salvation, but you would not obtain it; because in this life temptations frequently occur so violent that it is morally impossible not to yield to them without a special assistance from God. But God does not afford his special assistance to those who deal sparingly with him: He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly.[1268] But, O God! Thou hast not dealt sparingly with me: while I have been so ungrateful towards Thee as to repay Thy many favours with offences, Thou, instead of chastising me, hast redoubled Thy graces towards me. No, my God! I will never more be ungrateful to Thee, as I have hitherto been.

3. To obtain salvation is not an easy task, but difficult, and very difficult. We carry about us the rebellious flesh, which allures to the gratification of sense; and we have, moreover, numberless enemies to contend with in the world, in hell, and within our own selves, who are ever tempting us to evil. It is true, the grace of God is never wanting to us; but still this grace requires us to struggle hard to overcome temptations, and to pray fervently to obtain more powerful assistance, as the danger becomes greater. O Jesus! I desire nevermore to be separated from Thee and deprived of Thy love. Hitherto I have been ungrateful to Thee, and have turned my back upon Thee, but will now love Thee with my whole soul, and fear nothing so much as to cease to love Thee. Thou knowest my weakness; assist me, therefore, Thou who art my only hope and confidence. And thou, O ever-blessed Virgin Mary, cease not to intercede for me.

Meditation LXVI

THE APPEARANCE OF THE BODY IMMEDIATELY AFTER DEATH

1. Remember, man, that thou art dust, and into dust thou shalt return. [1269] At present you can see, feel, speak, and move. The day will come when you will no longer see, nor feel, nor speak, nor move. When your soul is separated from your body, your body will be consumed by worms and will moulder into dust; and your soul will go into eternity to be happy or miserable according as you have deserved by the actions of your life. O God! I have deserved only Thy displeasure and the punishments of hell; but Thou wouldst not have me despair, but repent and love Thee, and place all my hopes in Thee.

2. Figure to yourself the body of one whose soul has just departed. Look on his corpse still remaining on the bed: the head fallen upon the chest, the hair in disorder and still bathed in the cold sweat of death, the eyes sunk, the cheeks fallen in, the face of the colour of ashes, the lips and tongue black; so as to be loathsome and frightful to every beholder. See, dear Christian, to what a state your body will shortly be reduced which you now treat with so much indulgence. O my God! I will no longer resist Thy gracious calls. What now remains of the many gratifications with which I have indulged my body, but remorse of conscience which continually torments me? Oh that I had rather died than ever offended Thee!

3. When the body begins to corrupt, it becomes still more horrible. Twenty-four hours have scarcely elapsed since that young person died, and already his corpse begins to be offensive. The windows of the apartment must be opened, and perfumes employed, that the stench may not infect the whole house. His relatives and friends are in haste to commit him to the grave. He may have been a person of high rank, and to what does the pampering of his body now serve? It only hastens its corruption and increases its offensiveness. Dearest Redeemer, although I knew that by sin I should greatly offend Thee, yet did I commit it. To afford myself a short-lived satisfaction, I was willing to forfeit the invaluable treasures of Thy grace. With sorrow do I cast myself prostrate at Thy feet; pardon me through the blood which Thou hast shed for me. Receive me again into Thy favour, and chastise me as Thou pleasest. I will willingly accept every chastisement, provided I be not deprived of Thy love. I love Thee, O God! with my whole heart; I love Thee more than myself. Grant that I may remain faithful to Thee till the end of my life. Mary, my hope, intercede for me.

Meditation LXVII

THE STATE OF THE BODY IN THE GRAVE

1. Consider now, Christian brother, to what a state your body will be reduced in the grave. It will first become livid and then black. Mould of a dirty white colour will be produced over the whole surface of the flesh, from which a rotten humour will begin to ooze and flow upon the ground. In this humour a multitude of maggots will be generated, which will feast themselves upon the putrid flesh. Rats and other vermin will join in the feast and prey upon your poor carcass, some upon the outside, while others will enter into the mouth and others into the bowels. See to what a state that body will be reduced to please which you have so often offended God. No, my God, I will never more offend Thee. Too many already have been my offences. Enlighten me and strengthen me against temptations.

2. Then will your hair, cheeks, and lips fall off from your skull; your ribs will first be laid bare, and soon after your corrupted arms and legs. The worms, after having consumed all your flesh, will at last be consumed themselves. After this, nothing will remain of you but a mouldering skeleton, which in time will all fall to pieces; the head will be separated from the, trunk, and the bones from one another. See then what man is, considered as a mortal being. O Jesus! have pity on me. For how many years past have I deserved to burn in hell! I have forsaken Thee, my God, but Thou hast not yet forsaken me. Pardon me, I beseech Thee, and suffer me not anymore to abandon Thee; and, when temptations assault me, may I ever have recourse to Thee.

3. Behold, finally, that gay young warrior who a little while ago was considered the life and soul of society; where is he now? Enter his house; he dwells there no longer. His bed is occupied by another, and others have already seized and divided his spoils and armour. If you would see him, look into that newly made grave and you will behold a putrid mass of corruption, horrible and offensive. Saints of God, happy indeed are you, who, for the love of God, whom alone you loved in this world, were wise enough to mortify your bodies; now your bones are honoured upon altars, and your souls happy in the enjoyment of God face to face. Your bodies at the last day will again be united with your souls, to be your companions in bliss as they were formerly your companions in suffering. O God! I do not lament, but rejoice, that this my flesh, for which I have so often offended Thee, will one day be given to rottenness and worms: but I do indeed lament the crimes I have committed against Thee, for Thou art infinite goodness. O Jesus! I love Thee, and will never, nevermore offend Thee. Mary, mother of God, pray for me.

Meditation LXVIII

MAN IS SOON FORGOTTEN AFTER DEATH

1. A young person has died early in life. A little while ago he was courted in conversation, and everywhere welcomed by all; but now that he is dead, he is become the horror of those who behold him. His.parents are in haste to get him out of the house, and call in bearers to carry him to the grave. How wretched, if, to satisfy his parents or others of this world, he has lost God! My dear Redeemer, though all may forget me, Thou wilt still remember me, for Thou hast given Thy life for my salvation. Oh that I had never offended Thee!

2. A little while ago the fame of his wit, gracefulness, urbanity, and facetiousness was spread far and wide; but now that he is dead he is almost out of mind and will soon be quite forgotten. Upon hearing the news of his death, some may remark of him, "He did himself great credit;" others may exclaim, "Oh, how sad! What a clever, facetious, and delightful man he was!" Some may grieve for him because he was pleasant or useful to them; while others may perhaps rejoice, because his death may be of advantage to them; but in a short time no one will so much as mention him. Even his parents and nearest relatives do not like to hear him spoken of, that their grief for him may not be renewed; and hence in visits of condolence everything is made the subject of conversation but the person who is dead; and if any one begins to allude to him, he is immediately stopped with an exclamation, "Pray do not mention him to me!" See what becomes of the affection of our parents and friends for us in this world! My God, I am content that Thou alone shouldst love me, and will for the future love only Thee.

3. Your relatives will at first be afflicted at your death, but it will not be long before they will console themselves with the portion of your property which may fall to their lot; and in the same room in which your soul departed and was judged by Jesus Christ, they will feast, jest, dance, and laugh as before, and who knows where your soul will be? Give me, O Lord! time to lament the offences I have committed against Thee before Thou summonest me to judgment. I will no longer resist Thy calls: who knows but that this meditation may be the last call I may receive? I confess that I have deserved hell, and as many hells as I have committed mortal sins; but Thou wilt not despise poor penitent sinners. I am sincerely sorry with my whole soul for having abused Thy infinite goodness by sensual gratifications. Forgive me and grant me grace to obey Thee and to love Thee till the end of my life. O Mary! I place myself under thy protection, and confide in thy holy intercession.

Meditation LXIX

THE APPEARANCE OF ALL MANKIND IN THE VALLEY OF JOSAPHAT

1. The angels shall go out, and shall separate the wicked from among the just.[1270] What would be the confusion of a person who, on entering into a church in the presence of a great concourse of people, should be forcibly expelled as one excommunicated!

Alas! how much greater will the ignominy of the reprobate be to see themselves in the day of judgment expelled from the company of the saints in presence of all mankind! In this life the wicked are honoured equally with the saints, and frequently more. But in that day, when the figure of this world passes away, the elect will be placed on the right hand, and caught up into the air to meet Jesus Christ, advancing to place crowns of glory on their heads, according to the words of the Apostle, Then shall we be taken up together with them in the clouds to meet Christ in the air.[1271] But the wicked, surrounded by their tormentors, the infernal spirits, will be placed on the left hand, waiting for the appearance of the judge coming publicly to condemn them. O foolish worldlings! you who now hold the lives of the saints in derision and contempt, in the valley of Josaphat, you will change your sentiments. There will you acknowledge your folly, but it will be too late.

2. Oh, what a splendid appearance will the saints make, on that day, who have forsaken all for God! How beautiful will be the appearance of the many young persons who, despising the riches and delights of the world, have shut themselves up in deserts or in cloisters, to attend only to their eternal salvation! And of the many martyrs who were so much despised and so cruelly tortured by the tyrants of this world! All these will be proclaimed courtiers of Jesus Christ in his heavenly glory. On the contrary, what a horrible appearance will a Herod make, or a Pilate, a Nero, or many others, who made so great a figure in this world, but died under God's displeasure! O Jesus, I embrace Thy holy cross. What are riches, what are honours, what is the whole world? Besides Thee, what do I desire?

3. Christian, what will be your station at the last day? the right hand or the left? If you would occupy the right, you must walk in the way which conducts thither; it is impossible to keep the way to the left, and at length arrive at the right. O Lamb of God! who didst come into the world to take away our sins, have pity on me. I am sorry for having offended Thee, and will love Thee above all things; suffer me not to offend Thee any more. I seek not worldly goods; give me only Thy grace and Thy love, and I ask for nothing more. O Mary, thou art my refuge and my hope.

Meditation LXX

THE BLINDNESS OF THOSE WHO SAY, IF WE BE LOST WE SHALL NOT BE LOST ALONE

1. What do you say? that if you go to hell you will not go alone? But what consolation will the company of the wicked be to you in hell? Every condemned soul in hell weeps and laments, saying, Although I am condemned to suffer forever, would that I might suffer alone! The wretched company which you will meet with there will increase your torments by their despairing groans and moanings. What a torment to hear even a dog howling all night long, or an infant crying for five or six hours, and not to be able to sleep! And what will it be to hear the yells and howlings of so many wretched souls in despair, who will continually torment one another with their dismal noises, and this, not for one night, nor for many nights only, but for all eternity!

2. Again, your companions will but increase the torments of hell, by the stench of their burning carcasses. Out of their carcasses, saith the prophet Isaias, shall a stench arise.[1272] They are called carcasses, not because they are dead, for they are alive to pain, but because of the stench which they will emit. Your companions will also increase the torments of hell by their numbers; they will be in that pit as grapes in the wine-press of the anger of God: He treadeth, said St. John, the wine-press of the fierceness of the wrath of God the Almighty. [1273] They will be straitened on every side, so as to be unable to move hand or foot so long as God shall be God.

3. O accursed sin! how canst thou so blind men who are gifted with reason? Sinners, who affect to despise damnation, are yet more careful to preserve their goods, their situations, and their health; they do not say, "If I lose my property, my place, my health, I shall not be the only one who will lose such things."Yet when the soul is at stake, they say, "If I be lost, I shall not be lost alone!" He who loses the good things of this world and saves his soul will find a recompense for all he has lost; but he who loses his soul, what indemnity will he find? What shall he give in exchange for his soul?[1274] O my God, enlighten me and do not forsake me. How often have I sold my soul to the devil, and exchanged Thy grace and favour for a wretched transitory indulgence of sense! I am sorry, O God! for having thus dishonoured Thy infinite majesty. My God, I love Thee: suffer me not to lose Thee any more. O Mary, Mother of God! deliver me from hell, and from the guilt of sin by thy holy intercession.

Meditation LXXI

THE MEASURE OF GRACE

1. There is a certain measure beyond which God does not bestow his graces upon us. We should therefore be very much afraid of abusing any of the graces which our Lord dispenses to us. Every grace, every light, every call, may be the last we shall receive from God, and by despising it we may lose our souls. O my God! Thou hast already bestowed too many graces upon me, and too often have I abused them. Have mercy on me, and do not yet abandon me.

2. This measure is not the same for all persons; but for some greater, for others less. Christian brother, think how many graces you have received from God; and if you continue to abuse them, will you be saved? Reflect that the more abundant the graces have been which God has granted you, the more should you fear lest he abandon you in your sins, and the more should you be resolved upon a change of life. It may be that by one more mortal sin you may close against you the gates of mercy, and ruin your soul forever. And it may not be so. But you should very much fear lest it should be so. And miserable are you if you do not thus fear. No, my God, I desire nevermore to lose Thee. When ever the devil shall tempt me, I will have recourse to Thee, my Jesus; I know that Thou art ever ready to assist those who fly to Thee for help.

3. The greater the graces, the greater is the ingratitude of him who abuses them. The graces which you have received should induce you to hope that the Lord will pardon you if you amend your life and remain faithful to him for the future. But they should also make you fear lest God should condemn you to hell, if after so many offences you continue still to provoke him by sin. O God! I give Thee thanks for not having even yet forsaken me. The light which Thou at present impartest to me, the displeasure which I feel for having offended Thee, the desire which I have to love Thee and to continue in Thy grace, are certain signs that Thou hast not yet abandoned me. And since Thou hast not abandoned me after so many sins, I desire nevermore to abandon Thee, who art the God of my soul. I love Thee above all things; and because I love Thee, I am sorry for having despised Thee. Through Thy sacred Passion I beseech Thee, O Jesus! to grant me perseverance. Holy Mary, queen of mercy, take me under thy protection.

Meditation LXXII

LOVING GOD BECAUSE HE HAS DIED FOR US

1. He loved me, saith the Apostle, and delivered Himself for me.[1275] When was a master ever known to lay down his life for the love of his servant? or a king for the love of his slave? And yet it is certainly true that my Creator, the Lord of heaven and earth, the Son of God, has of his own will laid down his life for the love of me his vile and ungrateful creature. St. Bernard says, "He spared not himself that he might spare his servant."[1276] To pardon me, he would not pardon himself, but condemned himself to die in torments upon a cross. I believe, O Jesus! that Thou hast died for me, and how has it been possible for me to have lived so many years without loving Thee?

2. But, my Redeemer, Thou hast given Thy life not only for a vile creature, but for a rebellious and ungrateful creature, who has oftentimes turned his back upon Thee, and for some base gratification renounced Thy grace and Thy love. Thou hast sought by the most endearing motives to make me love Thee; and I have sought to make Thee hate me and condemn me to hell. Nevertheless, that same love which induced Thee to die for me, now induces me to hope that Thou wilt not reject me if I return to Thee. Pardon me, O Jesus! I am sensible of the wrong which I have done Thee; and I know also the wrong I should still do Thee, were I to love Thee only in a slight degree: no, I will love Thee to the utmost of my power; too much hast Thou deserved such a love. Grant me Thy help and assistance.

3. Ah, my Saviour, what more couldst Thou have done to gain my heart than Thou hast done by dying for my sake? What greater love couldst Thou have shown for Thy friend than to die for the love of him? Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends.[1277] Since then, O Word incarnate, Thou canst do nothing more to make me love Thee, shall I continue to be ungrateful to Thee? No, death is approaching, and is perhaps very near me, and I will not die so ungrateful to Thee as I hitherto have been. I love Thee, my beloved Jesus. Thou hast given Thyself entirely to me; I will give myself entirely to Thee. Bind and straighten me with the bonds of Thy love, so that I may live and die in the love of Thy infinite goodness. O sacred Mother Mary! take me under Thy protection, and teach me to burn with the love of thy divine Son, who died on the cross for the love of me.

Meditation LXXIII

THE CARE OF OUR SALVATION

1. The devil makes salvation appear to some too difficult to be accomplished, in order to dishearten them and induce them to abandon themselves to a disorderly life. It is true that if to obtain salvation it were necessary to retire into a desert, or to shut one's self up in a cloister, we ought to do so. But these extraordinary means are not necessary; ordinary means are sufficient, such as the frequentation of the sacraments, the avoiding of dangerous occasions, and the frequently recommending of ourselves by prayer to God. At our death we shall see that these things were easy; hence will our remorse be very great if until then we have neglected them.

2. We should resolve and say, "I will save my soul, cost what it may." Perish alt things else property, friends, and even life itself if I can but only save my soul! Let us never think we can do too much to obtain eternal salvation. Eternity is at stake, the being happy or miserable forever. "No security can be too great," says St. Bernard, "where eternity is at stake."[1278] O God! I am ashamed to appear before Thee; how often for a mere nothing have I turned my back upon Thee! No, I will nevermore forfeit Thy grace, nor wilfully become Thine enemy. In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; let me not be confounded forever.[1279] I would rather a thousand times lose my life than lose Thy friendship.

3. If during the past we have forfeited salvation, we must now endeavour to remedy the evil; we must change our lives, and this without delay. It is to no purpose to say I will do so in a short time. Hell is filled with souls who formerly said the same; but death surprised them, and prevented their proceedings. What a favour would God bestow upon a dying man on the point of breathing his last, were he to grant him one more year, or even one more month! Christian brother, at this very time, God bestows such a favour upon you, and what use do you make of it? Why, O God, do I delay? Do I wait for the period when there will be no more time for me, and when I shall find that I have in reality done nothing for Thee? I have the consolation of being as yet assisted by Thy grace. I love Thee above every good, and desire rather to die than to offend Thee. But Thou knowest my weakness, and the many treasons I have been guilty of against Thee. Help me, O Jesus! in Thee do I place all my hopes; and to Thee, O Mary, Mother of God! do I fly for protection.

Meditation LXXIV

THE LEAVING OF ALL AT DEATH

1. Christians are well aware that they must die, yet for the most part they live as though they were never to die. If after this life there were no other life, if there were neither hell nor heaven, could they think less of death than they now do? If, dear Christian, you desire to live well, endeavour to spend the remainder of your days in the continual remembrance of death. Oh, how correctly does he judge of things, and how rightly does he direct all his actions, who performs them with a view to his departure hence! The remembrance of death destroys in him all affection to the good things of this world, by reminding him that he must soon leave them all behind him. O God! since Thou givest me time to remedy the evil which I have done, make known to me Thy will, and I will do all that Thou requires! of me.

2. If a traveller, on his journey to his own country, were to stop and spend his all in building a palace in a land through which he ought only to pass, and neglect to provide a dwelling for himself in that country in which he was to reside his whole life, he would be thought mad. And must not the Christian be deemed mad who thinks only of gratifying himself in this world, through which he has only to pass during a few days, and heeds not the danger of being miserable in the next, where he must live forever, as long as God shall be God? Woe to me, O God! if Thou hadst called me out of life in my sins! I thank Thee for having borne with me with such great patience. Never suffer me to be again separated from Thee. My God, my sovereign good, I do and will love Thee above all things.

3. Death will rob us of all things. Whatever we may have acquired in this world we must leave all behind us at our death. Nothing will then be allowed us but a coffin and a shroud, which will soon moulder away and become dust with our bodies. We must then leave the house which we now inhabit, and a dismal grave must be the dwelling-place of our bodies until the day of judgment, when they must go either to heaven or to hell, accordingly as our souls have gone before them. All things will therefore end with me in death. Then shall I find that nothing will remain for me but the little which I have done for God. And were I to die this moment, what should I find that I have done for Thee, my Jesus? For what do I delay? that death may come and find me thus miserable? No, my God, I will amend my life. I detest all the offences I have ever committed against Thee. For the future I will not seek to gratify my own inclinations, but solely to do Thy will, who art the God of my soul. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! I love Thee above all things; mercifully grant me Thy grace. And do thou also, Mary, Mother of God, pray to thy divine Son for me.

Meditation LXXV

THE MOMENT OF DEATH

1. Imagine yourself, dear Christian, just now dead, and your soul entered into eternity. If now you had just departed from this world, what would you not wish to have done for life eternal? But what would such wishes avail you, if you had not spent the days of your mortal life in serving God? If you would now prevent that which you have time to prevent, place yourself in imagination frequently for the future in your grave, or rather upon your deathbed; imagine yourself to be dying, on the point of breathing your last, listen to the reproaches of your conscience and delay not to silence them by repentance. Delay not, for you have no time to lose. Ah, my God! enlighten me, make known to me the way in which I should walk, and I will obey Thee in all things.

2. St. Camillus de Lellis, looking at the graves of the dead, was accustomed to say, "If those who are here interred could now return to life again, what would they not do to become saints! And I who have time at my disposal, what do I do for God?" Thus did this saint animate himself to become more and more closely united with his Lord. Know then, dear Christian, that the time which God in his mercy now grants you is of the greatest value. Do not wait for time to labour for your salvation until you are gone into eternity, or until the arrival of that awful moment when it will be said to you, "Depart, Christian soul, out of this world;" make haste to go forth, for there is no more time for you to labour: what is done is done. O Jesus! remember that I am the lost sheep for which Thou hast laid down Thy life. "We beseech Thee, therefore, help Thy servants, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood." Give me light and grace to do that now which I shall wish to have done at the hour of my death.

3. O eternal God! I tremble at the thought of being that unhappy tree of which Thou hast said: Behold for these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig—tree, and I found none. Cut it down therefore: why cumbereth it the ground. [1280] Yet so it is, O Lord! for the many years I have now lived upon this earth, what good have I hitherto done? What fruit have I borne Thee all this time, but sin and bitterness? Alas! how have I deserved to have dwelt long ago in hell! Dearest Redeemer, spare me yet a little longer; I will not be obstinate; death will never find me in the state in which I now am. I will deplore and detest the days which I have spent in offending Thee, and will pass the remainder of my life in loving and honouring Thy infinite goodness. I do and will love Thee, my sovereign good. Take not Thy help away from me. And thou, O Blessed Virgin Mary, deprive me not of thy powerful protection.

Meditation LXXVI

THE EXAMINATION OF OUR SINS AT THE LAST DAY

1. Behold the heavens will open, and the angels and saints will descend to be present at the judgment followed by the Queen of Heaven, the ever blessed Virgin, and after her will appear the eternal Judge of the living and of the dead, encompassed with great power and majesty. The appearance of Jesus will be to the just the greatest consolation; but to the wicked, the indignant countenance of the Son of God will be horror and confusion worse than hell itself. They will say to the mountains: Fall upon us, and hide us from the wrath of the Lamb.[1281] They will desire that the mountains may immediately fall upon them rather than behold the indignant countenance of the Lamb, that is, of the Redeemer, who in their lifetime was as a lamb towards them, in silently bearing with their repeated injuries against him. O Jesus! Thou who wilt one day be my Judge; I am heartily sorry for having so grievously offended Thee. Pardon me my sins, and grant that when Thou appearest as my Judge, I may not behold Thee indignant against me.

2. The judgment sat, and the books were opened.[1282] Then will it be impossible to conceal our sins; Jesus himself, who will be our Judge, having long ago witnessed them, will manifest them to the whole world. He will bring to light the hidden things of darkness.[1283] Even the most secret sins, the most abominable impurities, and cruelties the most horrible, he will make known to all mankind. O my Redeemer! Thou who already knowest all my iniquities, have mercy on me now, before the time of mercy ends.

3. In a word, Jesus Christ will on that day make himself known as the great Lord of all: The Lord shall be known, says the Psalmist, when he executeth judgment.[1284] At present more account is made of some pleasure, of a mere vapour, of a fit of passion, than of God. Hence will the Judge then justly say to the sinner, To whom have ye likened me, or made me equal?[1285] To what have you compared me and postponed me? Have your base inclinations, or a mere caprice, prevailed with you more than my grace? O God! what shall we then answer to such reproaches? Oh, how will our utter confusion close our mouths! But let us now answer and say: O Jesus! I know that Thou wilt one day be my Judge, but now Thou art my Saviour. Remember that Thou hast died for me. I am sorry with my whole heart for having despised Thee, my sovereign good. But if hitherto I have despised Thee, behold I now esteem and love Thee more than myself, and am willing to die for Thy love. O Jesus! pardon me, and never suffer me to live any more deprived of Thy love. Mary, most gracious advocate of sinners, help me now whilst I can yet receive Thy powerful assistance.

Meditation LXVII

THE GREAT LOVE OF GOD FOR OUR SOULS

1. The love which God bears our souls is eternal and infinite. I have loved thee with an everlasting love.[1286] So that God has from all eternity loved every human soul. For the salvation of souls he placed all other creatures in the world: All things for the sake of the elect.[1287] And lastly he sent his only Son into the world, made man for our sake, to die upon the cross for the salvation of our souls. Thou, O God! hast indeed loved me from all eternity, and hast died for me, and how could I ever so grievously offend Thee?

2. The only begotten Son of God, for the love of our souls, came down from heaven to free them from eternal death by his own death upon the cross; and having redeemed them with his blood, he called his angels to rejoice with him for the recovery of his lost sheep: Rejoice with Me, because I have found the sheep that was lost.[1288] Dearest Redeemer, Thou didst come to seek me, and how have I hitherto fled away from Thee. No, my Jesus! I will no more fly from Thee. I will love Thee; and oh! do Thou so bind me to Thee by Thy holy love that I may live and die in Thy sacred embraces.

3. The eternal Father has then given his Son, and the divine Son has given his precious blood and life for the salvation of my soul; and how often have I withdrawn myself from God and sold myself for something worse than nothing to his and my mortal enemy the devil! Verily, my God! Thou hast spared nothing to save me from being lost, while I, for the sake of some paltry gratification, have many, many times renounced Thy friendship and love. Thou hast borne with me, that I might have time to bewail my sins and to love Thee, the God of my soul. I will therefore love Thee, my only good, and will grieve above every evil for having so often offended Thee. Oh! suffer me not to be anymore separated from Thy love. Remind me continually how much Thou hast done for my salvation, and how great has been the love which Thou hast shown me, that I may never cease to love Thee, my treasure, my life, and my all. Grant that I may ever love Thee, and then dispose of me as Thou pleasest. Mary, Mother of God, thy divine Son denies thee nothing; recommend to him, I beseech thee, my sinful soul.

Meditation LXXVIII

THE REMORSE OF THE REPROBATE

1. The condemned soul is tormented with three kinds of remorse. The first arises from reflecting for what a mere trifle it has incurred everlasting misery. For how long does the pleasure of sin last? only for a moment. To a man at the point of death, how long does his past life appear? a mere moment. But to one in hell, what do the fifty or sixty years of his sojourning upon the earth appear, when, in the gulf of eternity, he foresees that after a hundred or a thousand millions of years he will be only beginning eternity? Alas! does he exclaim, for a few moments of indulgence in poisonous pleasures, which I did but just taste, I must forever suffer, lament, and despair in this fiery furnace, abandoned by all, as long as God shall be God. O my God! I give Thee thanks for Thy great mercy to me, and implore Thee still to have mercy on me.

2. The second kind of remorse arises from the reflection of the condemned soul on the little which it need have done to be saved, but did not do it; and that now there is no remedy. Alas! does it say, if I had frequently confessed my sins, given myself to prayer, restored that ill-gotten property, pardoned my enemies, avoided that dangerous occasion, I should not have been lost. What would it have cost me? Although it might have cost me much, yet I ought to have been most willing to do my utmost to be saved. But I did not do it, and now I am lost forever. With how many inspirations did God favour me! How many times did he call me and admonish me that unless I desisted I should certainly be lost! I might then have remedied my past iniquity, but now I have no remedy. Ah! how does this thought afflict the wretched soul, even more than the fire and all the other torments of hell, that it might have been happy forever, but now must be miserable for all eternity! O Jesus! it is now the time of mercy; do Thou mercifully pardon me. I love Thee, my sovereign good, and am exceedingly sorry for having ever despised Thee.

3. The third and most bitter kind of remorse arises from the consciousness of the wretched soul of the great happiness which it has forfeited through its own fault. It recollects that God afforded it abundant means of gaining heaven, that he died for its salvation, permitted it to be born in the bosom of the true Church, and bestowed upon it numberless graces, and it reflects that all have been rendered useless through its own fault. I am lost, it exclaims, and neither the merits of Jesus Christ, nor the intercession of the Mother of God, nor the prayers of the saints, are of any avail to me; every gleam of hope is vanished from me forever. Oh that I had died, my God, rather than ever offended Thee! Receive me now into Thy favour; I love Thee, and will love Thee forever. Mary, most gracious advocate of sinners, intercede for me.

Meditation LXXIX

JESUS, THE KING OF LOVE

1. St. Fulgentius, contemplating the Infant Jesus flying into Egypt from the hands of Herod, who through fear of losing his kingdom sought the infant's life, tenderly exclaims, "Why art thou thus troubled, O Herod? The King who is just now born comes not to overthrow other kings by force of arms, but to subjugate them by dying for them."[1289] As though he had said, The King of heaven is not come to conquer us by war, but by love; he is not come to put us to death, but to rescue us from death by dying for us. Hence it is that Jesus may indeed be styled the King of love. Oh that I had always loved Thee, O Jesus, my sovereign King! and had never offended Thee! Thou didst spend thirty-three years in pain and labour to save me from being lost, and I have wilfully renounced Thee, my sovereign good, for the sake of momentary pleasures. Father of mercy, forgive me, and embrace me with the kiss of peace.

2. Ungrateful Jews! why did you refuse to acknowledge for your king one so lovely and so loving towards you? Why did you exclaim, We have no king but Cæsar?[1290] Cæsar did not love you, nor desire to die for you; while your true King had descended from heaven upon the earth to die for the love of you. O sweet Saviour! if others will not receive Thee as their King, I will have no other King but Thee: "Thou art my King."[1291] I know that Thou alone lovest me; Thou alone hast redeemed me with Thy blood; where then shall I find one who has loved me as Thou hast loved me? I am grieved for having hitherto rejected Thee as my King, by losing my respect for Thee and rebelling against Thee. Pardon me, O Jesus, my King! for Thou hast died to purchase pardon for me.

3. To this end Christ died and arose again; that he might be Lord of the dead and of the living.[1292]

My beloved King, dearest Jesus, since Thou camest upon earth to gain our hearts to Thyself, if hitherto I have resisted Thy loving calls, I will now no longer resist them. Do not disdain to accept me; I now give myself to Thee, I give Thee my whole self. Take, O King! possession of my whole will, and of my whole self; make me faithful to Thee; and grant that I may rather die than betray Thee any more, my King, my love and only good. O Queen, and Mother of my King! O Mary, obtain for me that fidelity which I this day promise to thy divine Son.

Meditation LXXX

THE MISERABLE DEATH OF THE SINNER

1. Poor unhappy being! see how he is oppressed with sorrows! Alas! he is now about to die; a cold sweat is stealing over him, his breath is failing him, and he frequently faints away; and when come to himself, his head is so far gone and so weak that he can attend but to very little, understand but little, and speak but little. But the worst is, although he is drawing near his end, instead of thinking of the account he must shortly render to God, he thinks only of his medical attendants, and of the remedies they may be able to afford him to save him from death. And those who stand around him, instead of exhorting him to unite himself to God, flatter him by telling him that he is better, or say not a word, that they may not disturb him. O my God! deliver me from such an unhappy end.

2. But at last the priest admonishes him of his approaching dissolution, saying to him, "You are now, dear brother, in a state of great danger, and must bid farewell to the world; give yourself then to God, and receive his holy sacraments." On hearing this fatal announcement, how dreadfully is he agitated, what sadness and remorse of conscience overwhelm him, and how dreadful is the conflict which he suffers! All the sins he has committed appear in confusion before him, the inspirations which he has neglected, his broken promises, and the many years of his past life now lost and gone forever, all rush upon his mind. He now opens his eyes to the truths of eternity, of which during his past life he made but very little account. O God! what terror do the thoughts of loss of Thy favour, of death, of judgment, of hell, and of eternity, strike into his unhappy soul! O Jesus! have pity on me and pardon me; do not abandon me. I am sensible of the evil I have done in despising Thee, and would willingly die for Thy love. Assist me, O God! to begin now at least a new life.

3. The dying sinner exclaims, "O what great folly have I been guilty of! How have I squandered away my life! I might have been a saint, and I would not; and now, what can I do? My head wanders, and fears oppress me and will not suffer me to bring my mind to any one good work! In a few moments what will become of me? Dying in this manner, how can I be saved?" He wishes for time to make his peace effectually with God, but time is no longer his. "Alas!" he cries out, "this cold sweat is a sure symptom of the near approach of death;

I begin to lose my sight and my breath; I can no longer move, I can hardly speak." And thus, in the midst of so much confusion, despondency, and fear, his soul departs from his body and appears before Jesus Christ. O my Jesus! Thy death is my hope. I love Thee above every good, and because I love Thee, I am sorry for having offended Thee. Mary, Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me.

Meditation LXXXI

THE HAPPY DEATH OF THE JUST

1. To the just man death is not a punishment, but a reward; it is not dreaded by him, but desired. How can it be dreadful to him if it is to terminate all his pains, afflictions, and conflicts, and all danger of losing God? Those words, "Depart, Christian soul, out of this world,"[1293] which strike such terror into the soul of the sinner, fill the soul that loves God with joy. The just man is not afflicted at leaving the good things of this world, because God has always been his only good; not at leaving honours, because he has always regarded them as smoke; not at being separated from his friends and relatives, because he has always loved them in God and for God. Hence, as in life he frequently exclaimed, "My God and my all!" he now repeats the same in death, with ecstasies of delight; the time being at hand for him to return to his God who made him, to love him face to face forever and ever in heaven.

2. The sorrows of death do not afflict him; he even rejoices to sacrifice the last remnants of his life as a testimony of his love for God, uniting the sufferings of his death to the sufferings of Jesus when dying on the cross. The thought that the time of sin and the danger of losing God are now past overwhelms him with delight. The devil fails not to suggest to his mind thoughts of despondency at the recollection of his past sins; but as he has for many years bewailed them, and loved Jesus Christ with his whole heart, he is not dismayed, but comforted. O Jesus! how good and faithful art Thou to a soul that seeks and loves Thee!

3. As the sinner who dies in mortal sin experiences, in the internal troubles and rage which he suffers in death, a foretaste of hell; so does the just man experience in death a foretaste of heaven. His acts of confidence and of the love of God, and his ardent desire to see God, afford him a beginning of that happiness which is soon to be completed for him in heaven. With what gladness does he welcome the holy Viaticum when brought into his chamber! He exclaims like St. Philip Neri when he was on his death-bed, "Because I have offended Thee, my God, I will say to Thee, with St. Bernard, "Thy wounds are my merits." O my God! if I am in Thy grace, as I hope I am, grant me soon to die, that I may presently behold and love Thee face to face, and be secure of nevermore losing Thee. Mary, my Mother, obtain for me a holy death."

Meditation LXXXII

AT THE POINT OF DEATH

1. If now you were at the point of death, already in your agony and almost breathing your last, and about to appear before the divine tribunal, what would you not wish to have done for God? And what would you not give for a little more time to make your salvation more secure? Woe to me, if I do not make use of the light that is now given me, and amend my life! He hath called against me the time.[1294] The time which is now granted me by the mercy of God will be a great torment and a subject of bitter remorse to me at the hour of death, when time for me will be no more. O Jesus! Thou didst spend Thy whole life for my salvation, and I have been many years in the world, and yet what have I hitherto done for Thee? Alas! all that I have done gives me only pain and remorse of conscience.

2. Christian, God now gives Thee time, be then resolved: in what will you spend it? What do you wait for? Do you wait to see that light which will show you your wretched neglect, when there will be no remedy? Do you wait to hear that "Go forth" which must be obeyed without demur? O my God! I will no longer abuse the light which Thou affordest me; but which I have hitherto so much abused. I thank Thee for this fresh admonition, which, may be the last Thou wilt ever give me. But since at present Thou thus enlightenest me, it is a mark that Thou hast not yet abandoned me, and art desirous of showing me mercy. My beloved Saviour, I am sorry above all things for having so often despised Thy graces and neglected Thy calls and inspirations. I promise with Thy help nevermore to offend Thee.

3. O God! how many Christians die in the greatest uncertainty as to their salvation, and tormented with the thought that they have had time to serve Thee, and are now arrived at the end of their life, when no more time is left them for any good works! They are sensible that now all that remains to them is to render a strict account of the many graces and inspirations bestowed upon them by God, and know not what to answer. O Lord! I will not die under such a torment. Say what Thou requirest of me, make known to me the way of life in which I should walk, and I will obey Thee in all things. Hitherto I have despised Thy commands, but I am now sorry for it with my whole heart, and love Thee above all things. O Mary, refuge of sinners! recommend my soul to thy divine Son.

Meditation LXXXIII

THE RASHNESS OF THE SINNER IN COMMITTING MORTAL SIN

1. God cannot but hate mortal sin, because mortal sin is directly opposed to his divine will: "Sin," says St. Bernard, "would destroy the divine will."[1295] As he cannot but hate mortal sin, so he cannot but hate the sinner who identifies himself with sin and rebels against his God: To God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike.[1296] How great then is the rashness of the sinner in committing sin, when he knows that by so doing he will bring upon himself the hatred of God! O my God! have mercy on me; Thou hast distinguished me with many graces, and I have repaid Thee with numerous offences; no one has so grievously offended Thee as I have done. Grant me, for Thy mercy's sake, contrition for my sins.

2. God is that all-powerful being who by a single act of his will created all things: He commanded and they were made.[1297] And he can in like manner, by a single act of his will, destroy all that he has created, whenever he pleases: At a beck he can utterly destroy the whole world.[1298] And will the sinner have the hardihood to put himself in opposition to this omnipotent God and make him his enemy? He hath stretched out his hand, says holy Job, against God, and hath strengthened himself against the Almighty.[1299] What should we think of an ant pretending to fight against an armed soldier? And what ought to be said of me, O eternal God! who have so often dared to oppose myself to Thee, making no account of Thy power, and sensible that I was drawing down Thy anger upon me? But Thy holy Passion, O Jesus, gives me confidence to hope in Thee for pardon, who didst die to obtain forgiveness for me.

3. The rashness of the sinner increases when we reflect that he offends God before his own eyes: He provoketh Me to anger before My face.[1300] What subject had ever the audacity to break the laws in the presence of the king himself? But the sinner knows that God beholds him, and yet he does not hesitate to commit sin before him. My dear Redeemer, I am that audacious being who has dared to despise Thy holy precepts before Thy face. I have therefore deserved hell; but Thou art my Saviour, who earnest to take away the sins of the world and to save poor sinners: The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.[1301] How much am I grieved for having offended Thee! Thou hast given me many proofs of Thy love, and I have returned Thee as many injuries. O Jesus! put an end to my sins, and replenish me with Thy love. I love Thee, O infinite love! and tremble at the thought of being ever again deprived of Thy love, Permit it not, O God! rather let me die. O Mary, thou obtainest whatever thou askest of God; obtain for me the gift of holy perseverance.

Meditation LXXXIV

THE PARABLE OF THE PRODIGAL SON

1. St. Luke writes (chap, xv.) that an ungrateful son, disdaining to remain in subjection to his father, went one day to demand from him his inheritance, that he might live as he pleased; and having obtained it, turned his back upon his father and went his way to live in vice in a far distant country, This prodigal son is a figure of the sinner, who, abusing the liberty which God has granted him, forsakes God, and lives in iniquity far away from him. O my Lord, and my Father! this is what I have done, when to satisfy my capricious desires I have so often forsaken Thee, to live at a distance from Thee deprived of Thy grace.

2. But as it happened to the prodigal son, that, having left his father, he was reduced to so great misery that he was unable to satisfy himself with the husks which the swine refused to eat; so does it happen to the sinner. When he forsakes God, he can nowhere find contentment nor peace; because, at a distance from God, all the pleasures of the earth cannot satisfy his heart. The prodigal son, seeing himself reduced to such a state of misery, said within himself, I will arise and go to my father.[1302] Do Thou, Christian, in like manner, arise from the filth of sin and return to your heavenly Father, who will not reject you. Yes, my God, my Father, I confess that I have done evil in forsaking Thee; I am sorry for it and repent of it with my whole heart. Oh, do not cast me off now that I return to Thee penitent, and resolved nevermore to depart from before Thy feet. My dear Father, forgive me, pardon me, give me the kiss of peace and receive me into Thy favour.

3. The prodigal son, on his return, cast himself with humility at his father's feet and said, Father, I am not worthy to be called thy son.[1303] Upon which his father embraced him with tenderness, and, forgetting all his past ingratitude, welcomed him with the greatest affection, and was overjoyed at regaining his son who was lost. Most tender Father, suffer me to cast myself with sorrow at Thy feet, for my multiplied offences against Thee. I am not worthy to be called Thy son, having so many times forsaken and despised Thee; but I know that Thou art so good a parent that Thou wilt not reject a repentant child. If hitherto I have not loved Thee, I will now love Thee above all things, and will willingly undergo any suffering for Thy love. Assist me with Thy holy grace, that I may ever remain faithful to Thee. O Mary, God is my Father, thou art my Mother; be not forgetful of me.

Meditation LXXXV

THE EVIL OF LUKEWARMNESS

1. Great indeed is the evil which tepidity occasions in the souls of those who, while they have a dread of being in a state of mortal sin, make but little account of deliberate venial sins, and take no pains to avoid them. God threatens the lukewarm to vomit them out of his mouth: Because thou art lukewarm I will begin to vomit thee out of My mouth.[1304] This means rejection on the part of God; and what is once rejected, in the way here mentioned, is never received again. The tepid Christian dishonours God, by showing in his conduct that he does not consider God deserving of being served with the greatest attention. Yes, my God! I have indeed hitherto dishonoured Thee in this manner, but I will now amend my life; do Thou help and support me.

2. St. Teresa never fell into any grievous sin, as is related in the Bull of her canonization; yet it was revealed to her that a place was prepared for her in hell, if she did not shake off her tepidity. How was this? since it is only mortal sin that is punished in hell. The Holy Spirit supplies the answer, when he says, He that despiseth small things shall fall by little and little.[1305] He who makes no account of deliberate venial sins will easily fall into "those which are mortal; because by habitually offending Almighty God in small things he will not have much dread of sometimes offending him in great things; and because by continually withdrawing himself from God, he provokes God not to afford him those special helps without which he will easily be overcome by powerful temptations. Abandon me not, O Lord, to such a misfortune; grant that I may rather die; have pity on me.

3. He who soweth sparingly, shall also reap sparingly.[1306] With justice does God withhold his graces from the soul that loves and serves him slothfully. Hence saith the prophet, Cursed is he who doeth the work of God deceitfully.[1307] He therefore who serves God deceitfully, must commit a great evil, since God curses him. The grievous sinner, conscious of his crimes, confesses them; but the tepid Christian, deeming himself to be better than others because he is not guilty of great sins, lives on in the mire of his defects, and does not humble himself. O my God! I have by my tepidity closed up the avenue of those graces which Thou wast willing to bestow upon me. Help me, O Lord! for I am resolved to amend my life. There is no reason why I should be sparing with Thee, who hast given Thy life for me. Holy Mary, Mother of God, help me; in thy patronage I confide.

Meditation LXXXVI

THE GIVING OF OURSELVES TO GOD WITHOUT RESERVE

1. God has declared that he loves all those who love him: I love them that love Me.[1308] But it is not to be supposed that God will give himself entirely to one who loves anything in the world equally with God. At one time St. Teresa was in this state, keeping up an affection, not indeed an impure affection, but an inordinate one, for a certain relative. When, however, she divested her self of this attachment, God was pleased to say to her in a vision, "Now that thou art wholly mine, I am wholly thine." O my God! when will the day arrive when I shall be wholly Thine? Consume within me, I beseech Thee, by the flames of Thy divine love, all those earthly affections which hinder me from belonging entirely to Thee. When shall I be able to say to Thee with truth, My God, Thee only do I desire, and besides Thee there is nothing that I wish for?

2. One is my dove, my perfect one is but one.[1309] God so loves the soul that gives itself entirely to him that he seems to love no other; and hence he calls it his only dove. St. Teresa after her death revealed to one of her sisters that God has greater love for one soul that aspires to perfection than for a thousand others that are in a state of grace, but are tepid and imperfect. O my God, for how many years hast Thou invited me to become entirely Thine, and I have refused! Death is already approaching, and shall I die as imperfect as I have hitherto lived? No, I hope that death will not find me as ungrateful as I have hitherto been. Help me; for I desire to leave all things to become entirely Thine.

3. Jesus Christ, through the love which he has for us, has given his whole self to us. He hath loved us, and hath delivered Himself for us.[1310] "If then," says St. Chrysostom, "God has given himself entirely to you without reserve, if he has given you all, and nothing more remains for him to give you, as indeed he has done in his Passion and in the Holy Eucharist, reason requires that you also should give yourself without reserve to him." St. Francis de Sales says, "The heart is too little to love our bountiful Redeemer, who has loved us even to the laying down his life for us."[1311] Oh, what ingratitude, what injustice, to divide our hearts, and not to give them wholly to God! Let us then say with the spouse in the Canticles, My beloved to Me, and I to My beloved.[1312] Thou, my God, hast given all to me, I will give all to Thee. I love Thee, my sovereign good. "My God and my all."[1313] Thou desirest that I should be all Thine, and such do I desire to be. O Mary, my mother, pray for me, that I may not love anything but God.

Meditation LXXXVII

THE TROUBLE AND CONFUSION OF THE HOUR OF DEATH

1. Be ye always ready: for at what hour you think not, the Son of man will come.[1314] "Be ye always ready." Our blessed Saviour does not tell us to begin to prepare ourselves when death has arrived, but to prepare ourselves beforehand; because the time of death will be a time of confusion, when it will be morally impossible to prepare ourselves in a proper manner to appear for judgment, and to obtain a favourable sentence. "It is a just punishment," says St. Augustine, "upon him who, having it in his power to do good, will not do it, not to be able to do it afterwards when he desires to do it."[1315] No, my God! I will not wait until that time to begin a change of life. Make known to me what I must now do to please Thee, for I desire to do without reserve whatever Thou requirest of me.

2. The time of death is the time of night, when nothing can be done. The night cometh on, when no man can work.[1316] The fatal news of the disease being mortal, the grief and pains which accompany it, the disordered state of the head, and, above all, remorse of conscience, will cast the poor sick man into such a state of distress and confusion as to hinder him from knowing what he is doing. He will anxiously desire to escape damnation, but will not find the means, for the time of chastisement will be at hand. I will repay them in due time, that their foot may slide.[1317] O my God! I give Thee thanks for allowing me time to amend, now that it is the time of mercy and not of punishment. I would rather lose all things than forfeit Thy grace. My sovereign good, I love Thee above all things.

3. Imagine yourself in a vessel overtaken by a storm in the midst of the sea, already struck upon a rock and on the point of sinking; think how great would be your confusion, and that you would not know what to do to escape death. And hence imagine how great will be the confusion of the sinner, who at his death finds himself in a bad state of conscience. His will, his relatives, the last sacraments, restitutions to be made, the calls of God which he despised, oh, what a tempest will all these things create in the soul of the poor dying sinner! Go then, go now and put your troubled conscience in order. O my God! let not Thy blood be shed for me in vain. Thou hast promised pardon to him that repents, wherefore do I grie ve from the bottom of my heart for the many offences I have committed against Thee. I love Thee, O Lord! above all things, and will nevermore offend Thee. How is it possible I should ever again, after so many mercies, offend Thee? No, my God! I will rather die. Holy Mary, pray for me to thy divine Son, that I may never more offend him.

Meditation LXXXVIII

THE PROVOKING OF GOD BY SIN TO DEPART FROM US

1. Every soul that loves God is loved by him in return; and God dwells within it and leaves it not until he is expelled by sin: "He forsakes not, unless he be forsaken,"[1318] says the Council of Trent. When the soul deliberately consents to mortal sin, it expels God, and as it were says to him, Leave me, O Lord! for I desire to possess Thee no longer. The wicked have said to God, Depart from us.[1319] O my God! I have then had the audacity, when I committed sin, to expel Thee from my soul and to desire to have Thee no longer with me! But Thou wouldst not have me despair, but repent and love Thee. Yes, my Jesus, I do repent for having offended Thee, and love Thee above all things.

2. The sinner must be sensible that God cannot dwell in a soul together with sin. When therefore sin enters the soul God must depart from it. So that the sinner, by admitting sin, says to God, As Thou canst not remain any longer with me, unless I renounce sin, depart from me; it is better to lose Thee than the pleasure of committing sin. At the same time that the soul expels God it gives possession to the devil. Thus does the sinner eject his God who loves him, and makes himself the slave of a tyrant who hates him. This, O Lord! is what I have hitherto done. Oh, give me some share of that abhorrence for my sins which Thou didst experience in the garden of Gethsemane. Dearest Redeemer, would that I had never offended Thee!

3. When an infant is baptized, the priest commands the devil to depart from its soul: "Go forth, unclean spirit, and give place to the Holy Ghost."[1320] On the contrary, when man falls from a state of grace into mortal sin, he says to God, "Go forth from me, O Lord, and give place to the devil."[1321] Such is the foul ingratitude, O Lord! with which I have frequently repaid Thy great love towards me. Thou didst come down from heaven to seek me, the lost sheep; and I have fled from Thee and expelled Thee from my soul. But no, I will now embrace Thy sacred feet and will nevermore leave Thee, my beloved Lord. Help me with Thy holy grace. And, O blessed Mary, most holy Queen! do not abandon me.

Meditation LXXXIX

THE ABUSE OF GRACE

1. The graces which God bestows on us, his lights, his calls, and the good thoughts with which he inspires us, have all been purchased for us by the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. To the end that man might be able to receive them, it was necessary that the Son of God should die, and by his merits render him capable of such divine favours. He, therefore, who despises the divine graces, by abusing them, despises the blood and death of Jesus Christ. Such abuse has caused the eternal destruction of numberless Christians, who are now bewailing their sins in hell without hope or remedy. O my God! how often have I deserved to become one of their number! I thank Thee that Thou now allowest me time to bewail my past crimes, and hope that Thou wilt pardon me.

2. O God! what an eternal torment must it be to the souls in hell, to call to mind the many graces they received from Thee in this world, now that they know the value of them and the evil which they have done by despising them! My beloved Redeemer, give me light and grace to know my obligation to love Thee, for having, instead of chastising me for my ingratitude, and abandoning me to my sins, increased Thy lights and redoubled Thy calls upon me. Behold, since Thou now callest me, I will become entirely Thine, and forever.

3. Reflect, Christian, that if God had bestowed the same graces upon an infidel which he has upon you, that infidel would now most probably be a saint. And what have you done? God has multiplied his graces, and you have multiplied your offences against him. If you continue in your sins, how will it be possible for God to bear longer with you and not to abandon you? Put en end, without delay, to your ingratitude, and tremble, lest, if you should not now avail yourself of the graces which he bestows upon you, no more lights nor graces should be conferred upon you. Yes, my God, Thou hast already borne with me too long; I will nevermore despise Thee. And why should I delay? That Thou mayest really abandon me? Cast me not away from Thy face.[1322] Reject me not, O Lord; from henceforth I will love Thee with my whole soul. Thou, indeed art most worthy of all love; and I will endeavour to please and love Thee in all things. Strengthen me and make me faithful. Mary, Mother of God, help me with thy prayers.

Meditation XC

DIVINE LOVE VICTORIOUS OVER GOD HIMSELF

1. Our God is omnipotent: who then will ever overcome and conquer him? But no, says St. Bernard, love towards man has conquered and triumphed over him:[1323] for this his love has caused him to die in torments upon a disgraceful cross to secure man's salvation. O infinite love! unhappy the soul that loves Thee not.

2. What man, passing by Calvary on that day when Jesus was dying upon the cross, if, on inquiring who that criminal was, crucified in such a mangled state, he had been told that it was the Son of God, true God, equal with his Father, had he not been a believer, would not have said with the Gentiles that to believe such things was folly? "It appeared folly," says St. Gregory, "that the author of life should die for men."[1324] If it would have appeared folly to suppose that a king would become a worm for the love of a worm; greater still would have appeared the folly of believing that God had become man for the love of man, to die for man. This led St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi to say, concerning this immense love of God, "My Jesus, Thou lovest us to infatuation." And, alas! I, a miserable sinner, have not loved God, but have many times offended him!

3. Christian, lift up your eyes, and behold that afflicted one upon the cross, oppressed with grief and torments, struggling in his agony, on the point of expiring, dying for the pure love of you. Know you who he is? He is your God. And if you believe that he is thy God, ask who has reduced him to such a miserable condition. "What has done this?"[1325] says St. Bernard. "Love has done it, regardless of its own dignity."[1326] It was love, which refuses no pain, nor disgrace, when it would make itself known and exert itself for its beloved. O Jesus! it was because Thou didst so much love me, that Thou didst suffer so much for me: if Thou hadst loved me less Thou wouldst have suffered less. I love Thee, my dear Redeemer, with my whole heart. And how can I refuse God my whole love, when he has not refused me his precious blood, his life? I love Thee, O Jesus, my love, my all! Holy Mary, Virgin of virgins, help me by thy prayers faithfully to love Jesus.

Meditation XCI

THE SENTENCE OF THE WICKED AT THE LAST JUDGMENT

1. Consider how great the rage of the wicked will be, to behold on the last day, the just, shining with glory, waiting with joyful eagerness for that Come, ye blessed,[1327] with which Jesus Christ will invite them into heaven; and how great the shame and confusion of the wicked will be to behold themselves surrounded by devils, and trembling with expectation of that Depart from me, ye cursed,[1328] with which Jesus Christ will pronounce their condemnation before the whole world. O my dear Redeemer! suffer not Thy death, which Thou didst undergo with so much love, to become of no avail to me.

2. Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.[1329] Such will be the sentence of condemnation, such the unhappy doom, which will fall upon the wicked: to burn forever in the flames of hell, accursed of God and separated from him. Do Christians believe that there is a hell? How comes it, then, that so many voluntarily expose themselves to its terrible torments? O my God! who knows but that I also may be of their number at the last day? I hope through Thy precious blood that so dreadful an evil will not befall me; but who will make me certain of this? Enlighten me, O Lord! and make known to me what I must do to escape Thy wrath, which I have hitherto so often provoked; take Thou pity on me and forgive me.

3. At last, in the midst of the valley of Josaphat, the earth will open and swallow up the wicked, together with the devil and all his evil spirits; who will all hear those gates shut over them which will never again be opened for all eternity. O accursed sin, to what a miserable end wilt thou one day conduct innumerable souls! Unhappy they for whom is reserved such a lamentable doom for all eternity! O my God! what will my lot be? The fire of hell does not terrify me so much as the thought of being forever separated and at a distance from Thee, my only good. My dear Redeemer, if hitherto I have despised Thee, I now love Thee above all things and with my whole heart. I know that the punishment of remaining forever separated from Thee will not befall those who love Thee; grant therefore that I may love Thee forever; bind me and unite me closely to Thee; unite me daily more and more to Thee, that I may never be separated from Thee, and then do with me whatever else Thou pleasest. Holy Mary, advocate of sinners, never cease to protect me.

Meditation XCII

THE SENTENCE OF THE ELECT

1. Come, ye blessed of my Father.[1330] Such will be the glorious sentence which in the day of triumph will be pronounced in favour of those who have loved God. St. Francis of Assisi, having had it revealed to him that he was one of the predestinate, almost died of the consolation which such a revelation afforded him; what then will be the joy of the elect when they hear Jesus Christ inviting them, Come, ye blessed children, come and possess the inheritance of your divine Father; come and reign with him forever in heaven! How often, O God! have I through my own fault forfeited Thy blessed kingdom! But, O Jesus! Thy precious merits encourage me to hope that I shall regain it. My dear Redeemer, I trust in Thee and love Thee.

2. Oh, how will the blessed congratulate one another when they behold themselves placed upon thrones and united in the enjoyment of God for all eternity, without the least fear of ever being again separated from him! What joy and glory will be theirs to enter on that day crowned into heaven, singing together songs of gladness and the sweet praises of God! Happy souls, that are destined to such a blessed lot! O God of my soul! bind me to Thee with the sweet bonds of Thy holy love, that in that day I may enter into Thy kingdom and praise and love Thee forever. The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever.[1331]

3. Let us arouse our slumbering faith. It is certain that we shall one day be judged, and that we shall receive sentence either of eternal life or of eternal death. If we be not secure of obtaining the sentence of life, let us endeavour to make it certain. Let us fly from all those occasions which might expose us to the loss of our souls; and unite ourselves to Jesus Christ by frequently approaching the sacraments, by pious meditations, by spiritual reading and continual prayer. The adoption or neglect of these means will be the sign of our salvation or of our perdition. My beloved Jesus, and my Judge, I hope through Thy precious blood that Thou wilt on that day bless me; and hence do Thou bless me now, and pardon me all the offences I have committed against Thee. Grant me to hear the same consoling words that Thou didst address to Magdalen, Thy sins are forg iven thee.[1332] I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended Thee; pardon me, and at the same time give me grace always to love Thee. I love Thee, my sovereign good; I love Thee more than myself, my treasure, my love, my all. Thou art the God of my heart, and my portion forever.[1333] O my God! Thee only do I desire. Holy Mary, by thy powerful intercession thou canst procure my salvation, and thou desirest it; in thee do I confide.

Meditation XCIII

THE DISHONOURING OF GOD BY SIN

1. By transgression of the law thou dishonourest God.[1334] Take notice, sinner, what the Apostle says, and consider what you do when you break the divine law; you dishonour God. Yes, the sinner dishonours God when he loses all respect for him before his face, and declares by his actions that it is not a great evil to disobey God and to make no account of his law. Behold, O God! prostrate at Thy feet an ungrateful sinner, who, after having been so loved and favoured by Thee, has many times dishonoured Thee by breaking Thy precepts. I have deserved a thousand hells, but remember that Thou didst die in order to save me from hell.

2. The sinner dishonours God by preferring a miserable gratification, a wretched worldly gain, or a mere caprice to the grace of God; for by giving his consent to sin he declares that such things are more precious to him than the friendship of God. Thus is God dishonoured and affronted by the sinner, who by his actions pronounces him to be viler than some wretched gratification, for which he turns his back upon him. O my God! Thou art an infinite good; and how could I, a miserable worm, prefer any corrupt inclinations and passions to Thee? If I did not know that Thou hast promised pardon to those who repent, I should not dare to crave Thy mercy. I am sorry, O infinite goodness! for having offended Thee.

3. God is our last end, for he has created us to serve and love him in this world, that we may be happy with him forever in the next. But when man prefers a vile pleasure to divine grace, he makes his pleasure his last end, he makes it his God. What a dishonour must it be to God, who is infinitely good, to see himself exchanged for something so vile and wretched! My beloved Redeemer, I have offended Thee; but Thou wouldst not have me despair Thy mercy; although Thou knowest my ingratitude, yet dost Thou love me and desire my salvation. I am sensible of the evil I have done by offending Thee, and I am sorry for it with my whole heart. I am resolved rather to die than again incur Thy displeasure. I fear my own weakness, but I hope, in Thy goodness, that Thou wilt enable me to be faithful to Thee till death. O Jesus! Thou art my hope and my love. Holy Mary, intercede for me, that I may obtain salvation.

Meditation XCIV

THE JOY OF JESUS CHRIST AT FINDING THE LOST SHEEP

1. Our blessed Saviour says of. himself, in St. Luke (chap, xv.), that he is the affectionate shepherd, who, having lost one of his hundred sheep, leaves the ninety-nine in the desert, and goes in search of the one that is lost; and finding it, receives it with joy, takes it on his shoulders, and returning home calls together his neighbours to rejoice with him, saying, Rejoice with me, because I have found my sheep that was lost.[1335] O divine shepherd! I have been that lost sheep, but Thou hast sought me until, as I hope, Thou hast found me. Thou hast found me and I have found Thee. How shall I ever again stray away from Thee, my beloved Lord? And yet such a misfortune may happen to me. Oh, permit it not; never suffer me, O Jesus! to leave Thee and to lose Thee again.

2. But why, O Jesus! dost Thou call together Thy friends to rejoice with Thee for having found the lost sheep? Shouldst Thou not rather bid them rejoice with the lost sheep for having again found Thee, its God? But so great is Thy love for my poor soul that Thou esteemest it Thy happiness to have found it! My dearest Redeemer, since Thou hast found me, bind me to Thee with the blessed bonds of Thy holy love, that I may always love Thee and may nevermore depart from Thee.

3. God, says the prophet, no sooner hears the voice of the penitent sinner crying to him for mercy, than he immediately answers and forgives him. At the voice of thy cry, as soon as he shall hear, he will answer thee. [1336] Behold me then at Thy sacred feet, O God! grieved from the bottom of my heart for having so often offended Thee, and craving Thy compassion and pardon. I can no longer endure to behold myself at a distance from Thee and deprived of Thy love. Thou art infinite goodness, and most worthy of infinite love. If hitherto I have despised Thy grace, I now value it above all the kingdoms of the earth. And because I have offended Thee, I beseech Thee to avenge thyself upon me, not indeed by casting me away from Thy face, but by giving me such a sorrow for my sins as may cause me to lament my guilt before Thee, all the days of my life. Lord, I love Thee with my whole heart, and as I cannot trust that I shall continue faithful to Thy love, be Thou my help and my succour. And do thou, O holy Virgin! help me with thy holy intercession.

Meditation XCV

JESUS SUFFERING THE PUNISHMENT DUE TO OUR SINS

1. Surely he hath borne our infirmities, and carried our sorrows.[1337] Who could believe this, if divine faith did not assure us of it: "Surely he hath borne our infirmities!" Man sins, and the Son of God makes satisfaction for him, O Jesus! I have sinned, and hast Thou made satisfaction for me? Yes, I have deserved hell, and Thou, in order to deliver me from eternal death, hast been pleased to be condemned to death upon the cross! In a word, in order to pardon me Thou wouldst not pardon Thyself, and shall I ever be so base as to offend Thee again during the remainder of my life? No, my Saviour, I owe Thee too much, I am too much obliged to love Thee. Behold I am Thine, do with me what Thou pleasest; I will endeavour to please Thee in all things.

2. He was wounded for our iniquities, he was bruised for our sins.[1338] Behold, my soul, behold your God scourged at a pillar in Pilatēs hall, crowned with thorns, wounded from head to foot, and his whole body mangled and streaming with blood; hear how he lovingly says to you, My son, see what you have cost me. Ah, my sweet Saviour! Thou hast suffered so much for me, and how could I have repaid all Thy love with so many offences! Thou, to save me from being lost, hast suffered so many torments, and I have lost Thee for a mere nothing! O accursed sinful pleasures! I hate and detest you; you have been the cause of all the sufferings of my Saviour for me.

3. St. Margaret of Cortona, when she meditated on the sufferings of Christ, could not restrain herself from excessively bewailing her sins. One day her confessor said to her, "Margaret, cease to weep; for God has pardoned thee." But hear what the penitent sinner answered: "Ah, Father, how can I think of no longer bewailing my sins, while I remember that they afflicted my dear Redeemer during the whole of his life?" My beloved Jesus, I also must have afflicted Thee during Thy life by my sins. St. Margaret knew how to bewail her sins and to love Thee; but when shall I begin really to bewail mine, when shall I begin really to love Thee? I am sorry, my sovereign good, for having afflic ted Thee. I love Thee, my dear Redeemer, more than myself. Oh, draw my whole heart to Thee, and inflame it entirely with Thy holy love; suffer me not to live any more ungrateful for the many graces which Thou hast bestowed upon me. Holy Mary, thou canst powerfully assist me by thy holy intercession to become holy; do this, I beseech thee, for the love of Jesus Christ.

Meditation XCVI

THE HAPPINESS OF POSSESSING THE GRACE OF GOD, AND THE MISERY OF BEING DEPRIVED OF IT

1. Man knows not the value of divine grace,[1339] and hence he exchanges it for a mere nothing. It is a treasure of infinite value.[1340] The Gentiles said it was impossible for a creature to become the friend of God. But, no; divine grace induces God to call the soul that possesses it his friend:[1341] You are My friends.[1342] said our Blessed Saviour to his disciples. When, therefore, O God! my soul was in the state of grace, it was Thy friend; but by sin it became the slave of the devil, and Thine enemy. I give Thee thanks for affording me time to recover Thy grace. I am sorry, O Lord! with my whole heart, for having lost it; in Thy pity, restore it to me, and suffer me not to lose it any more.

2. How fortunate should that man esteem himself who becomes the friend of his king! It would be presumption for a vassal to expect that his prince should make him his friend; but it is not presumption for the soul to aspire to be the friend of God. "If I would be come a friend of Cæsar," said a certain courtier, as St. Augustine relates, "I should have great difficulty in becoming such; but if I would become the friend of God, I am already his friend."[1343] An act of contrition and of love makes us the friends of God. St. Peter of Alcantara said, "No tongue can express the greatness of the love of Jesus for a soul in the state of his grace." O my God! am I in Thy grace or not? I certainly know that at one time I had lost it, and who knows whether I have regained it? O Lord! I love Thee, and am sorry for having offended Thee; make haste to pardon me.

3. Oh, how great, on the contrary, is the misery of a soul that is fallen from the state of grace! It is separated from the sovereign good. It belongs no more to God, and God belongs no more to it. It is no longer loved by God, but hated and abhorred by him. Before, he blessed it as his child; but now, he curses it as his enemy. Such is the unhappy state in which I was, O God! when I had forfeited Thy grace. I hope I have arisen from my unhappy condition, but if I have not, hasten, O Jesus! to rescue me from it. Thou hast promised to love those who love Thee.[1344] I love Thee, my sovereign good; do Thou love me; and may I never again be deprived of Thy love. Holy Mary, succour me, thy humble client; I commend myself to thy patronage.

Meditation XCVII

CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

1. The first effect of love is the union of will. The most high God, because he loves us, would have us love him, and hence he demands our hearts, that is, our wills: My son, give me thy heart.[1345] Our whole life and salvation depend upon uniting our wills to the will of God, which is the only rule of what is just and perfect: "Life," says the Psalmist, "is in his will."[1346] He who is united with the will of God lives and is saved; but he, who separates himself from it dies and is lost. No, my God, I will never more separate myself from whatever Thou desirest of me. Give me grace to love Thee, and dispose of me as Thou pleasest.

2. This is the great object of all those who love God, to conform themselves at all times to his divine will. And this is what Jesus taught us to pray for, that we may be able to fulfil the will of God here upon earth, with as much perfection as the blessed do in heaven. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.[1347] St. Teresa made an offering of her will to God, at least fifty times everyday; in this imitating David, who said, My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready.[1348] Ah! how effectually does one perfect act of conformity to the will of God change the sinner into a saint, as it happened to St. Paul, who by only saying to God, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do.[1349] from a persecutor of the Church was changed into an apostle and vessel of election. O my God! I will never more lament the tribulations which Thou mayest send me. I know that all will be for my good. I will say always, Lord, may thy holy will be ever accomplished. As Thou willest, so do I will. Thy will be done. As it hath pleased the Lord, so be it done.[1350]

3. The most certain sign that the soul loves God is its peaceful conformity to the will of God in all adverse occurrences, such as poverty, sickness, losses, and ruin. In the afflictions which happen to us from the malice of men, we should consider not the stone which strikes us, but the hand of God who casts it. God does not will the sin of those who deprive us of our goods, reputation, or life; but that we should accept such afflictions as coming from his hands, and should say as Job did when his goods were taken from him, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord, so it is done; blessed be the name of the Lord[1351] O my God! I have not acted in this manner; how often, to follow my own will have I despised Thine! But then I did not love Thee; now I do love Thee more than myself; I embrace all Thy divine appointments, and desire to do whatever Thou pleasest. But Thou knowest my weakness, enable me therefore by Thy assistance to accomplish what I now resolve. O holy will of God! thou shalt be from henceforward my whole love. Holy Mary, obtain for me the grace ever to do the will of God during the remainder of my life.

PART II

Pious Reflections on Different Points of Spirituality to Guide Souls that Desire to Advance in the Love of God[1352]

I

THE THOUGHT OF ETERNITY

SAINT AUGUSTINE called the thought of eternity the great thought: Magna cogitatio. This thought has brought the saints to count all the treasures and greatness of this life as nothing more than straw, dust, smoke, and refuse. This thought has sent many anchorites to hide themselves in deserts and caves, and so many noble youths, and even kings and emperors, to shut themselves up in cloisters. This thought has given courage to so many martyrs to endure the torture of piercing nails and heated irons, and even of being burnt in the fire.

No; we are not created for this earth: the end for which God has placed us in the world is this, that with our good deeds we may inherit eternal life. The end is eternal life.[1353] And, therefore, St. Eucherius said that the only affair that we should attend to in this life is eternity; that is, that we should win a happy eternity, and escape a miserable one. The object for which we struggle is eternity.[1354] If assured of this end, we are forever blessed; if we fail of it, we are forever miserable. Happy he who lives ever with eternity in view, with a lively faith that he must speedily die, and enter upon eternity. The just man lives by faith.[1355] It is faith that makes the just to live in the sight of God, and which gives light to their souls, by withdrawing them from earthly affections, and placing before their thoughts the eternal blessings which God promises to them that love him. St. Teresa said that all sins had their origin in a want of faith. Therefore, in order to overcome our passions and temptations, we ought constantly to revive our faith by saying: I believe the life everlasting.[1356] I believe that after this life, which will soon be ended, there is an eternal life, either full of joys, or full of pains, which will befall me, according to my merits or demerits. St. Augustine also said that a man who believes in eternity, and yet is not converted to God, has either lost his senses or his faith. "O eternity!" (these are his words), "he that meditates upon thee, and repents not, either has not faith, or he has no heart."[1357] In reference to this, St. John Chrysostom relates that the Gentiles, when they saw Christians sinning, thought them either liars or fools. If you believe not (they said) what you say you believe, you are liars; if you believe in eternity and sin, you are fools.[1358] "Woe to sinners who enter upon eternity without having known it, because they would not think upon it!" exclaims St. Cæsarius; and then he adds, "But oh, double woe! They enter upon it, and they never come forth."[1359]

St. Teresa said constantly to her disciples, "My children, there is one soul, one eternity." By which she meant to say, My children, we have one soul, and when that is lost, all is lost; and, once lost, it is lost forever. In a word, upon that last breath which we breathe in dying, it depends whether we are forever blessed, or in despair. If the eternity of the next life, if paradise, if hell, were mere fictions of literary men, and things of doubtful reality, even then we ought to bestow all our care to live well, and not to risk our soul forever. But no; these things are not doubtful; they are sure things, they are things of faith; they more surely exist than those things which we see with our bodily sight. Let us, then, pray to our Lord, Increase our faith;[1360] for, if we are not strong in faith, we may become worse than Luther or Calvin. On the other hand, one thought of living faith upon the eternity that awaits us may make us saints. St. Gregory wrote that they who meditate on eternity are neither puffed up by prosperity, nor cast down by adversity; for they desire nothing and they fear nothing in this world.[1361]

When it happens to us to suffer any infirmities or persecutions, let us think of the hell which we have deserved through our sins. When we do this, every cross will seem light, and we shall thank the Lord, and say, It is the mercy of the Lord that we are not consumed.[1362] We shall say, with David, Unless the Lord had been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in hell.[1363] Through myself I was already lost; Thou hast done this, O God of mercy! that Thou hast stretched forth Thy hand, and drawn me forth from hell: Thou hast delivered my soul, that it should not perish.[1364] O my God! Thou knowest how often I have deserved hell; but, notwithstanding, Thou biddest me hope, and I desire to hope. My sins terrify me; but Thy death giveth me courage, and Thy promise of pardon to him that repenteth. A contrite and humbled heart, O God! Thou wilt not despise. I have dishonoured Thee for the time that is past, but now I love Thee above all things; and I grieve more than for any other evil, that I have offended Thee. O my Jesus! have mercy upon me. Mary, Mother of God, pray for me.

II

WE ARE PILGRIMS ON EARTH

While we live in this life, we are so many pilgrims who wander up and down upon the earth, far from our country, which is heaven, where the Lord awaits us, that we may rejoice forever in his glorious countenance. While we are in the body, writes the apostle, we are absent from the Lord.[1365]

If, then, we love God, we ought to have a continual desire to leave this place of exile, by being separated from the body, that we may go and see him. It was for this that St. Paul ever sighed, as he said, We are confident, and have a good will to be absent rather from the body, and to be present with the Lord.[1366] Before the common redemption of us miserable sons of Adam, the way of approach to God was closed up; but Jesus Christ, by his death, has obtained for us the grace of having it in our power to become the sons of God;[1367] and thus has opened to us the gates by which we can have access, as children, to our Father, Almighty God. [1368] On this account St. Paul says, Now therefore you are no more strangers and foreigners; but you are fellow-citizens with the saints and the domestics of God.[1369] Thus, so long as we are in the grace of God, we enjoy the citizenship of paradise, and belong to the family of God, St. Augustine says, "Nature corrupted with sin produces citizens of an earthly city; but grace, which frees our nature from sin, makes us citizens of a heavenly country, and vessels of mercy." [1370] This made David say, I am a stranger on earth; hide not Thy commandments from me.[1371] O Lord! I am a pilgrim upon this earth, teach me to keep Thy precepts, which are the road by which I may reach my country in heaven.

It is not wonderful that the wicked should wish to live forever in this world, for they justly fear that they shall pass from the pains of this life to the eternal and infinitely more terrible pains of hell; but how can he who loves God, and has a moral certainty that he is in a state of grace, desire to go on living in this vale of tears, in continual bitterness, in straits of conscience, in peril of perishing? How can he help sighing to depart at once to unite himself to God in a blessed eternity, where there is no danger of his destroying himself? Oh, how souls that love God groan continually while they live, and cry out with David, Woe is me, for my banishment is prolonged! [1372] Unhappy is he who must continue to live a long time in this world, in the midst of so many perils to his salvation! Therefore it is that the saints have continually had this prayer upon their lips, Thy kingdom come.[1373] Quickly, O Lord! quickly carry us to Thy kingdom. Let us make speed, then, as the apostle exhorts us, to enter that kingdom, where we shall find perfect peace and contentment: Let us hasten to enter into that rest.[1374] Let us hasten, I say, with desire, and not cease to walk onwards till we come to that blessed harbour which God prepares for them that love him. "He that runs," says St. John Chrysostom, "pays not heed to the spectators, but to the crown of victory; he stands not, but hastens on his course."[1375] Therefore the saint argues that the longer has been our life, the more we should hasten with good works to win the palm. Thus, our one constant prayer for the relief of the troubles and trials which we endure in this life ought to be this: Thy kingdom come.[1376] Lord, may Thy kingdom speedily come, where, united eternally with Thee, and seeing Thee face to face with all our powers, we shall no longer know fear, or danger of falling away.

And when we find ourselves afflicted with the labours or dishonours of the world, let us comfort ourselves with the great reward that God prepares for those who suffer for the love of him: Rejoice in that day, and be glad; for behold, your reward is great in heaven. [1377] St. Cyprian said that with good reason our Lord wills that we should rejoice in labours and persecutions, because then the true soldiers of God are proved, and crowns are distributed to the faithful.[1378] Behold, O my God! my heart is ready;[1379] behold me prepared for every cross that Thou givest me to endure. No, I desire not delights or pleasures in this life; he who has offended Thee and deserves hell, deserves not pleasures. I am ready to suffer all the infirmities and adversities that Thou sendest me; I am ready to embrace all the slights of men; I am content, if it pleases Thee to deprive me of all bodily and spiritual consolations; it is enough that Thou dost not deprive me of Thyself, and of the eternal love of Thee. This I deserve not, but I hope for it, through the blood that Thou hast shed for me. I love Thee, O my God, my love, my all! I shall live forever, and I shall love Thee forever, as I hope; and my paradise will ever be to rejoice in Thy infinite joy., which Thou dost truly merit, through Thine infinite goodness.

III

GOD DESERVES TO BE LOVED ABOVE EVERYTHING

St. Teresa said that it was a great favour that God should call a soul to love him. Let us, then, love him, since we are called to this love, and let us love him as he desires to be loved. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart.[1380] The Venerable Louis da Ponte felt ashamed at saying to God, "O Lord, I love Thee above everything; I love Thee more than all creatures, than all riches, than all honours, than all earthly pleasures;" for it seemed to him that it was equivalent to saying, "My God, I love Thee more than straw, and smoke, and dust." But God is satisfied that we should love him above all things. Therefore, at least, let us say, "Yea, O Lord! I love Thee more than all the honours of the world, more than all its riches, more than all my kindred and friends; I love Thee more than health, more than my good name, more than science, more than all my comforts; I love Thee more Than everything I possess, more than myself." And let us still further say: "O Lord! I value Thy graces and Thy gifts; but more Than all Thy gifts, I love Thyself, who alone art infinite goodness, and a good worthy of infinite love, which exceeds every other good thing. And, therefore, O my God! whatever Thou mayest give me short of Thyself, which is not Thyself, is not sufficient for me; if Thou givest me Thyself, Thou alone art sufficient for me. Let others seek what they will, I will seek nothing but Thee alone, my love, my all.

In Thee alone I receive all that I can find or desire."

The sacred Spouse said, that among all things, she had chosen to love her beloved: My beloved is fair and ruddy, and chosen out of thousands.[1381] And whom shall we choose to love? Among all our friends of this world, where can we find a friend more worthy of love and more faithful than God, and who has loved us more than God? Let us pray, then, and let us pray constantly, "O Lord! draw me after Thee; for if Thou dost not draw me after Thee, I cannot come to Thee."[1382] O Jesus! my Saviour, when will it be that, stripped of any other affection, I may ask and seek for none but Thee! I fain would detach myself from everything; but constantly some importunate affections enter my heart, and draw me away from Thee. Separate me, then, with Thy powerful hand, and make Thyself the one object of all my affections and all my thoughts. St. Augustine said that he who has God has everything, and he who has not God has nothing.[1383] What does it profit a rich man that he possesses many treasures of gold and jewels, if he lives apart from God? What does it profit a monarch to extend his dominions, if he has not the grace of God? What does it profit a man of letters to understand many sciences and languages, if he knows not how to love his God? What does it profit a general to command an army, if he lives the slave of the devil, and far from God? While David was yet king, but in a state of sin, he walked in his gardens, he went to his sports and all other pleasures; but these creatures seemed to say, Where is thy God?[1384]

Wouldst thou seek in us thy happiness? Go seek God, whom thou hast left, for he alone can give thee rest. And thus David confessed that, in the midst of all his delights, he found not peace, and mourned night and day, considering that he was without God. Tears were my bread night and day, while they daily said to me, Where is thy God?[1385] In the midst of the miseries and toils of this world, who can console us better than Jesus Christ? He alone says, Come to me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you. [1386] O folly of the worldly! One single tear shed for our sins, one cry, "My God!" uttered in love, by a soul in a state of grace, is worth more than a thousand festivals, a thousand plays, a thousand banquets, in giving contentment to a heart in love with the world. I say again, O folly! and a folly, too, which none can remedy when there comes that, death, when it is night, as the Gospel says, The night cometh, in which no man can work. Wherefore our Lord warns us "to walk while the light favours us; for the night will come, when no m[1387]an can walk."[1388] Let God alone, then, be all our treasure, all our love; and let all our desire be to please God, who will not suffer us to conquer him in love. He rewards a hundred-fold everything that we do to give him pleasure. O my God, and all my good! be Thou the ruling power in my soul; and, as I would choose to love Thee above all things, so do Thou grant that in all things I may prefer Thy will to my own pleasure. O my Jesus! I trust in Thy blood, that, through all my life that remains, I may love none but Thee upon this earth, in order that I may come one day to possess Thee forever in the kingdom of the blessed. O holy Virgin! aid me with thy powerful prayers, and carry me to kiss thy feet in paradise.

IV

IN ORDER THAT A SOUL MAY BECOME HOLY, IT MUST GIVE ITSELF TO GOD WITHOUT RESERVE

St. Philip Neri said that so much of our love as we fix upon creatures we take away from God; and, therefore, our Saviour, as St. Jerome wrote, is jealous of our hearts.[1389] As he himself has loved us so abundantly, he desires to reign alone in our heart?, and to have no companions there, who may rob him of a portion of that love which he desires to have wholly to himself; and, therefore, it displeases him to see us attached to any affection which is not for him. And does our Saviour ask too much; after having given his own blood and life, dying for us upon a cross? Does he not deserve to be loved by us with all our hearts, and without reserve? St. John of the Cross said, that every attachment to creatures hinders us from belonging wholly to God. Who will give me the wings of a dove, that I may flee away and be at rest?[1390] says the Psalmist. There are souls that are called by God to become saints, but that, coming to him with reserve, and not giving him their whole love, retain some affection for earthly things, and thus never become, and never will become, holy. They fain would fly, but being held down by some attachment, they cannot, but remain fixed upon earth. We must, therefore, strip ourselves of everything. Every thread, says the same St. John, whether great or small, hinders the soul from flying to God.

St. Gertrude once prayed to the Lord that he would teach her what he would have her to do. The Lord answered, I desire nothing from thee but a devoted heart.[1391] And it was this which David sought from God, Create in me a clean heart, O God![1392] O my God! give me a pure heart; that is, emptied and stripped of every earthly affection. "All for all,"[1393] wrote Thomas a Kempis. To gain all, we must give all. To possess God, we must leave all that is not God. Then the soul can say to the Lord, "My Jesus, I have left all for Thee; now give Thyself wholly to me." To attain this, we must not cease to beg of God that he would fill us with his holy love. Love is that mighty fire that burns up in our hearts every affection that is not for God. St. Francis de Sales said that when a house is in flames, we throw all the furniture out of the windows;[1394] by which he meant that when a soul is inflamed, and the divine love takes possession of it, it has no need of sermons or spiritual directors to detach it from the world; the love of God itself will cleanse the heart, and despoil it of every impure desire. Holy love is introduced in the Canticles under the symbol of a cellar of wine: The king brought me into the wine-cellar; he created love within me.[1395]

In this blessed cell the souls that are the brides of Christ, inebriated with the wine of holy love, lose all sense for the things of the world, admire God alone, in all things seek God alone, speak only of God, and desire to think only of God; and when they hear others speak of riches, dignities, pleasures, they turn to God and say to him, with a burning sigh, My God, and my all![1396] What a world, what pleasures, what honours! Be Thou all my joy, all my contentment. St. Teresa wrote, when speaking of the prayer of union with God, that this union consi sts in dying to all worldly things, in order to possess nothing but God.[1397] That a soul may give itself wholly to God, three means are especially necessary: 1. The avoidance of all defects, even the very least, accompanied with conquests over every inordinate desire, such as an abstinence from observing such and such an object of sight or hearing, from certain little pleasures of sense, from certain witty or unnecessary conversations, and suchlike; 2. Among things whi ch are good, the constant choice of those that are the best and the most pleasing to God; and 3. The receiving with peace of mind and thanksgiving, from the divine hands, all things that are displeasing to our self—love. O my Jesus, my love, my all! how can I see Thee dying upon a shameful cross, despised by all, and consumed by anguish, and then go and seek earthly pleasures and lories? I would be wholly Thine. Forget the offences I have committed against Thee, and receive me. Teach me to know from what th ings I ought to separate myself, and what I must do to please Thee all this I desire to do. Give me strength to follow Thy will, and to be faithful to Thee. O my beloved Redeemer! Thou willest that I should give myself to Thee without reserve, that I may unite myself wholly to Thy heart. Behold, this day I give myself wholly to Thee, without reserve, everything that I am; from Thee I hope for grace to be faithful even to death. O Mother of God, and my own Mother Mary! obtain for me the grace of holy perseverance.

THE TWO GREAT MEANS FOR BECOMING HOLY DESIRE AND RESOLUTION

1. All holiness consists in loving God, The love of God is that infinite treasure in which we gain the friendship of God.[1398] God is ready to give this treasure of his holy love, but he wills that we earnestly desire it. He that faintly desires any good thing takes little trouble to gain it. On the other hand, St. Laurence Justinian said that an earnest desire lightens all toil, and gives us strength.[1399] And thus, he who little desires to advance in divine love, instead of becoming more ardent in the way of perfection, ever becomes more and more lukewarm; and thus is ever in imminent peril of falling headlong down some precipice. And, on the other hand, whoever aspires with fervent desire after perfection, and strengthens himself daily to advance in its path, little by little, with time will attain it. St. Teresa said, "God never gives many favours, except to those who earnestly desire his love." And again, "God leaves no good desire with out its reward."[1400] And therefore the saint advises everyone not to suffer his desires to slacken, because, trusting in God, and strengthening ourselves little by little, we shall reach that point which all the saints have reached. It is a deceit of the devil, according to the opinion of the same saint, which makes us think that it is a mark of pride to desire to become saints. It would be pride and presumption, if we trusted in our own works or intentions; but if we hope for all from God, he will give us that strength which we have not.

Let us, then, desire, with a very great desire, to attain to a lofty height of divine love; and let us say, with courage, I can do all things through Him that strengtheneth me.[1401] And if we do not find that we possess this great desire, at least let us ask it urgently of Jesus Christ, that he may give it to us.

2. We will now pass on to the second means resolution. Good desires must be accompanied by a determined spirit to strengthen ourselves in the attainment of the desired blessing. Many desire perfection, but take no right means to gain it; they want to live in a desert, to accomplish great works of penance and prayer, to endure martyrdom; but such desires are nothing better than mere fancies, which, instead of benefiting them, do them great harm. These are the desires which slay the slothful man:[1402] Such a person, feeding himself upon these fruitless desires, pays no heed to the cure of his defects, the mortification of his appetites, and patience in suffering contempt and crosses. He would do great things, but such as are incompatible with his present condition, and therefore his imperfections increase; in every time of adversity he is agitated, every infirmity makes him impatient; and thus he lives imperfect, and imperfect he dies. If, then, we truly desire to become saints, let us resolve:

1. To avoid every venial sin, however slight.
2. To detach ourselves from every earthly desire.
3. Let us not cease our accustomed exercises of prayer and mortification, however great may be the weariness and dryness we feel in them.
4. Let us meditate daily on the Passion of Jesus Christ, which inflames with divine love every heart that meditates upon it.
5. Let us resign ourselves in peace to the will of God in all things that trouble us, as Father Balthazar Alvarez said, "He that in troubles resigns himself to the divine will, runs to God as swift as by a post."
6. Let us continually beg of God the gift of his holy love.

Resolution, resolution, said St. Teresa: "The devil has no dread of irresolute souls."[1403] On the contrary, he who resolves to give himself truly to God will overcome even what seemed impossible. A resolved will conquers everything. Let us study to redeem the time that is lost; the time that remains, let us give it all to God. All time that is not devoted to God is lost. Do we not fear lest God should abandon us to our lukewarmness, which may lead us to utter ruin? Let us take courage, and live from this day forth upon the holy maxim, "We must please God even to death." Souls thus resolute are assisted by the Lord to fly in the way of perfection. He that would belong wholly to God must resolve:

1. Not to commit even the slightest venial sin.

2. To give himself to God without reserve, and therefore to neglect nothing which may be pleasing to God, always with the approbation of his director.

3. Out of all good things, to choose that which is most pleasing to God.

4. Not to wait for the morrow, but whatever can be done to-day, to do it.

5. To pray daily to God, that he may increase in his love. With love everything can be done; without love, nothing. To gain everything, we must give everything. Jesus has given himself wholly to us, that we may be wholly his.

O miserable being that I am! O Thou God of my soul! for so many years I have lived upon earth, and what progress have I made in Thy love? My progress has been in my faulty in self-love, in sins. And shall I live this life even unto death? No; Jesus, my Saviour, help me I would no longer be so ungrateful as I have been till now. I would truly love Thee, and would leave all to please Thee. Give me Thy hand, O Jesus! Thou who hast poured forth all Thy blood, that Thou mightest see me Thine. Such I would be, with Thy grace. Even till death, aid me, and strip me of everything which may hinder me from belonging wholly to Thee, who hast so much loved me. Grant it me through Thy merits; from Thee I hope it. And I hope it also from thee, O my Mother Mary. With thy prayers, which can obtain everything from God, obtain for me the grace of belonging wholly to him.

VI

THE SCIENCE OF THE SAINTS

There are two kinds of sciences upon earth, one heavenly, the other worldly. The heavenly is that which leads us to please God, and makes us great in heaven. The worldly is that which moves us to please ourselves, and to become great in the world. But this worldly science is folly and madness in the sight of God. The wisdom of the world is foolishness with God.[1404] It is folly, for it makes fools of those who cultivate it; it makes them fools, and like the brutes, for it teaches them to gratify their carnal appetites like the beasts. St. John Chrysostom wrote, "We call him a man who preserves complete the image of a man; and what is the image of a man? to be rational."[1405] Hence it is that if a brute were ever to act according to reason, we should say that such a brute acted like a man; so we say that a man who acts upon sensual appetites and contrary to reason acts like a brute.

But to return to the human and natural knowledge of earthly things, what do men know of all things which they have studied? What are we but so many blind moles, who, besides the truths which we know by faith, know only by means of our senses, or by conjecture; so that everything is uncertain and fallible. What writers on such subjects, however applauded by many, have escaped the criticism of others? But the evil is that the knowledge of the world puffs us up,[1406] and makes us proud and prone to despise others a pernicious fault, for, as St. James says, God resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble.[1407] Oh that they would be wise and understand, and know the latter end![1408] Oh, if men would act by reason and the divine law, and thus would learn to provide, not so much for a temporal existence, which speedily ends, as for eternity, they would assuredly not occupy themselves in the attainment of any knowledge, except such as aids them in the obtaining eternal happiness and avoiding eternal pains. St. John Chrysostom advises us to walk among the tombs of the dead, in order to learn the knowledge of salvation. Oh, what a school of truth are the sepulchres for learning the vanity of the world! "Let us go to the tombs; there," said the saint, there I see nothing but corruption, bones, and worms. "[1409]

From all these skeletons which I see, I cannot tell which belonged to the ignorant and which to the learned; I only see that with death all the glories of the world were finished for them. What remained to a Cicero, a Demosthenes, an Ulpian? They have slept their sleep, and have found nothing in their hands.[1410] Blessed is he who has received from God the science of the saints.[1411] The science of the saints is to know the love of God. How many in the world are well versed in literature, in mathematics, in foreign and ancient languages! But what will all this profit them, if they know not the love of God? Blessed is he, said St. Augustine, who knows God, even if he knows nothing else.[1412] He that knows God and loves him, though he be ignorant of what others know, is more learned than the learned who know not how to love God. "Let the unlearned arise, and seize upon heaven!"[1413] cried the same Augustine. How learned were St. Francis of Assisi, St. Pascal, St. John of God! ignorant in worldly knowledge, but well skilled in that which is divine. Thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them to babes.[1414] By the wise, we are here to understand the worldly-wise, who labour for the possessions and glories of the world, and think little of eternal joys. And by babes we are to understand simple souls (like those of children), who know little of worldly wisdom, but devote all their care to pleasing God.

Let us not, then, envy those who know many things; let us only envy those who know how to love Jesus Christ; and let us imitate St. Paul, who said that he desired to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Happy are we if we attain to the knowledge of the love which Jesus crucified had for us, and from this book of love attain to the love of him. O Thou who art my true and perfect lover, where shall I find one who has so loved me as Thou hast! During my life that is past, I have lost my time in attaining the knowledge of many things which have profited my soul nothing, and I have thought nothing of knowing how to love Thee. I see that my life has been lost. I perceive that Thou callest me to Thy holy love; behold, I leave all; from this day forth, my one thought shall be to please Thee, my highest good. I give myself wholly to Thee; accept me; give me help to be faithful to Thee; I desire to be no longer my own, but all, all Thine. O mother of God! do thou also help me with thy prayers.

Permit me here to express the great consolation which I derived a few days since from information connected with the subject of the preceding considerations the science of the saints. I have been assured that, after having received so much applause from all Europe for his poetic compositions, which are as noxious as they are beautiful (I mean those only which treat of profane love), for the more tender his expressions, the more they are calculated to kindle in the breasts of young persons the pernicious flames of impure affections, the celebrated Signore Peter Metastasio has published a little book in prose, in which he expresses his detestation of his writings on profane love, and declares that, were it in his power, he would retract them and make them disappear from the world, even at the cost of his blood. And I am informed that his poetic compositions are now confined to some pieces on moral or spiritual subjects, which he writes in order to comply with his obligation as poet to the imperial court. He lives retired in his own house, leading a life of prayer. This information has given me unspeakable consolation; because his public declaration and his most laudable example will help to undeceive many young persons who seek to acquire a great name by similar compositions on profane love. It is certain that, by his retraction, Signore Metastasio has deserved more encomiums than he would by the publication of a thousand poetic works; for these he might be praised by men, but now he is praised by God. Hence, as I formerly detested his vanity in prizing himself for such compositions (I do not speak of his sacred pieces, which are excellent and deserving of all praise), so now I shall never cease to praise him; and were I permitted, I would kiss his feet, seeing that he has voluntarily become the censor of his own works, and that he now desires to see them banished from the whole world, at the expense, as he says, even of his own blood.

VII

OUR ETERNAL SAFETY CONSISTS IN PRAYER

Prayer is not only useful, but necessary for salvation; and therefore God, who desires that we should be saved, has enjoined it as a precept, Seek, and it shall be given you.[1415] It was an error of Wickliff, condemned by the Council of Constance, to say that prayer was a subject of divine counsel to us, and not of command. It is necessary, not, it is advisable or fitting, always to pray.[1416] Wherefore Doctors of the Church always say that he cannot be held innocent of grievous sin who neglects to recommend himself to God, at least once in a month, and at all times when he finds himself assaulted by severe temptation. The reason of this necessity of recommending our selves often to God arises from our inability to do any good work, or to entertain any good thoughts, of our selves: Without Me ye can do nothing.[1417] We are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything of ourselves.[1418]

Therefore, St. Philip Neri said that he despaired of himself. On the other hand, St. Augustine wrote that God desires to bestow his graces, but only on those who beg them.[1419] And, especially, said the saint, God only gives the grace of perseverance to those who seek it.[1420] It is a fact that the devil never ceases to go about to devour us, and therefore we need ever to defend ourselves by prayer. "Continual prayer is necessary for man," said St. Thomas.[1421] And Jesus Christ first taught us, We must always pray, and not faint.[1422] Otherwise, how can we resist the perpetual temptations of the world and the devil? It was the error of Jansenius, condemned by the Church, that the observance of certain precepts was impossible, and that sometimes grace itself fails to render it possible to us. God is faithful, said St. Paul, who does not suffer us to be tempted above our strength.[1423] Yet he desires that, when we are tried, we should have recourse to him for help to resist. St. Augustine wrote: "The law is given, that grace may be sought; grace is given, that the law may be fulfilled."[1424] Granting that the law cannot be obeyed by us without grace, God has yet given us the law, in order that we may seek the grace to fulfil it; and, therefore, he gives the grace that we may fulfil it. All this was well expressed by the Council of Trent, in these words: "God does not command things that are impossible, but, in commanding us, he counsels thee both to do what thou canst, and seek for aid for what thou canst not do, and he helps thee that thou mayst be able to do it."[1425]

Thus, the Lord is ever ready to give us his help, in order that we may not be overcome by temptation; but he only gives this help to those who fly to him in the time of trial, and especially in temptations against chastity, as the Wise Man wrote: Because I knew that thus only could I preserve continence, if God should grant it, therefore I went to the Lord and besought Him.[1426] Let us rest assured that we can never overcome our carnal appetites, if God does not give us help, and this help we cannot have without prayer; but if we pray, we shall assuredly have power to resist the devil in everything, and the strength of God, who strengthens us; as St. Paul says, I can do all things, through God who strengthens me.[1427] It is also most useful to us, in order to obtain the divine grace, that we should have recourse to the intercession of the saints, who have great power with God, especially for the benefit of those who have a particular devotion to them. And this is not a mere devotion dependent upon our private fancy, but it is a duty, as St. Thomas writes,[1428] that the divine law requires that we mortals should receive the aid which is necessary for our salvation, through the prayers of the saints. Especially this aid comes through the intercession of Mary, whose prayers are of more value than those of all the saints; so much so, indeed, as St. Bernard says, that it is through her intercession that we have access to Jesus Christ our Mediator and Saviour. "Through thee we have access to the Son, O thou giver of grace, and Mother of our salvation! that through thee he may receive us, who through thee was given for us."[1429]

This, indeed, I have sufficiently proved in my book called "The Glories of Mary;"[1430] and, so in my work "On Prayer,";[1431] chap, I, I have brought forward the opinion of many saints, especially St. Bernard, and many theologians, as, for example, Father di Alessandro and Father Contenson, that through Mary we receive all the graces which we receive from God. Hence, also, St. Bernard says, "Let us seek for grace, and let us seek it through Mary; for he that seeks finds, and cannot be deceived."[1432] The same was said by St. Peter Damian, St. Bonaventure, St. Bernardine of Sienna, St. Antoninus, and others. Let us then pray, and pray with confidence, says the Apostle. Let us go boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help us in time of need.[1433] Jesus Christ now sits on the throne of grace to comfort all who fly to him, and says, Seek, and it shall be given to you.[1434] On the day of judgment he will also sit upon his throne, but it will be a throne of judgment; what madness, then, it is in those who, having it in their power to be delivered from their miseries by going to Jesus, now that he sits on his throne of grace, wait till he becomes their judge, and will not avail themselves of his mercy. Now he says to us that whatever we ask of him, if we have confidence, he will give us all. And what more can one friend do to another to show his love than say, "Seek what thou wilt, and I will give it thee."[1435]

St. James adds more, and says, If any man need wisdom, let him ask it of God, who gives to all men liberally, and reproaches not, and it shall be given him.[1436] By "wisdom" is here meant the knowledge of the salvation of the soul; to have this wisdom, we must seek of God the graces necessary to bring us to salvation. And will God give them? Most assuredly he will give them, and in still greater abundance than we ask them. Let us observe also the words, " He does not reproach us." If the sinner repents of his sins, and asks salvation from God, God does not that which men do, who reproach the ungrateful with their ingratitude, and deny them what they ask; but he gives it to them willingly, and even more than they beg for. If, then, we would be saved, we must have our lips ever opened to pray, and say, "My God, help me; my God; have mercy; Mary, have mercy." When we cease to pray, we are lost. Let us pray for ourselves: let us pray for sinners, for this is most pleasing to God. Let us pray also daily for holy souls in purgatory; those holy prisoners are most grateful to all who pray for them. Whensoever we pray, let us seek grace of God through the merits of Jesus Christ, for he himself assures us that whatever we ask in his name, he will give it to us.[1437] O my God! this is the grace which, above all others, I ask through the merits of Jesus Christ: grant that throughout my life, and especially in time of temptation, I may recommend myself to Thee, and hope for Thy help through the love of Jesus and Mary. O holy Virgin! obtain for me this grace on which depends my salvation.

VIII

I MUST ONE DAY DIE

It is a most useful thought for salvation to say often to ourselves, "I must one day die." The Church every year on Ash-Wednesday brings this remembrance to the faithful. O man, remember that thou art dust, and to dust shalt thou return.[1438] And this certainty of death is brought to our recollection many times in the year; sometimes by the burial-grounds which we pass upon the road, sometimes by the graves which we behold in churches, sometimes by the dead who are carried to burial. The most precious furniture that was carried by the anchorites to their caves was a—cross and a skull; the cross to remind them of the love which Jesus Christ has had for us, and the skull to remind them of the day of their own death. And thus they persevered in penitential works till the end of their days; and thus, dying in poverty in the desert, they died more content than if they had died as kings in their palaces. The end is at hand; the end is at hand.[1439] In this life, one man lives a longer, another a shorter time; but for every one, sooner or later, the end comes; and when that end is here, nothing will comfort us at the point of death but that we have loved Jesus Christ, and have endured with patience the labours of this life for the love of him. Then not the riches we have gained, nor the honours we have obtained, nor the pleasures we have enjoyed, will console us. All the greatness of the world cannot comfort a dying man; it rather adds to his pains; and the more he has gained of it, the more does he suffer. It was said by Sister Margaret of St. Anne, a nun of the Barefooted Carmelites, and daughter of the Emperor Rodolph II.: "What profit is a kingdom in the hour of death?"

Oh, how many worldly persons are there to whom, at the very moment when they are busy in seeking for gain, power, and office, the word of death comes: Set thy house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live.[1440] Why, O man! hast thou neglected to make thy will till the hour when thou art in sickness? O my God! what pain is suffered by him who is on the point of gaining some lawsuit, or of taking possession of some palace or property, who hears it said by the priest who has come to pray for his soul, "Depart, Christian soul, from this world.[1441] Depart from this world, and render thy account to Jesus Christ." "But now," lie cries, "I am not well prepared." What matters that? Thou must now depart. O my God! give me light, give me strength to spend the rest of my life in serving and loving Thee. If now I should die, I should not die content; I should die disturbed. What, then, do I wait for? That death should seize me at a moment of the greatest peril to my soul? O Lord! if I have been mad for the past, I would not be so for the time to come. Now I give myself wholly to Thee; receive me, and help me with Thy grace. In a word, to every one the end comes, and with the end comes that decisive moment on which depends a happy or a wretched eternity. Oh, what a moment, on which eternity depends![1442] Oh, that all would think upon that moment, and the account they must give to their judge of their whole life! Oh, that they were wise, and would understand, and would consider their last end![1443]

Truly, they would not then devote themselves to amassing riches, or labour to become great in this perishing world; they would think how to become saints, and to be great in that life which never ends. If, then, we have faith, let us believe that there is a death, a judgment, an eternity, and labour for the rest of our life to live only for God. And, therefore, let us take care to live as pilgrims in this earth, remembering that we must speedily leave it. Let us live ever with death before our eyes; and, in all the affairs of life, let us take care to act precisely as we should act at the point of death. All things upon earth either leave us, or we leave them. Let us hear Jesus Christ, who says, Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroy.[1444] Let us despise the treasures of earth, which cannot content us, and speedily end; and let us gain those heavenly treasures which will make us happy, and never be ended.

Miserable I am, O Lord! in that I have so often, for the sake of the goods of this life, turned my back upon Thee, who art the infinite good! I see my folly in having sought for a great name, and for making my fortune in the world. I see what my true happiness is: it is henceforth to love Thee, and in everything to fulfil Thy will. O my Jesus! take from me the desire of gain; make me love neglect and an humble life. Give me strength to deny myself in everything that displeases Thee. Make me embrace, with a calm mind, infirmities, persecutions, desolations, and all the crosses that Thou mayest send me. Oh, that I could die for the love of Thee, abandoned by all, as Thou didst die for me! Holy Virgin, thy prayers can enable me to find my true happiness, which is to love earnestly thy Son. Oh, pray for me; in thee I trust.

IX

PREPARATION FOR DEATH

Death is certain. "It is appointed to all men once to die."[1445] On the other hand, the time and manner of our death are uncertain. Therefore, Jesus Christ exhorts us, "Be ye ready, for ye know not the hour when the Son of man cometh." He says, "Be ye ready;" and, there fore, it is necessary not only to prepare for death when death comes, but we must be ready to embrace it in whatever manner and in whatever circumstances it may come to us. It is accordingly very desirable that everyone, at least once a month, should make the following acts of devotion: Behold, O my God! I am ready to embrace that death which Thou dost destine for me. From this time I embrace it, and I sacrifice my life in honour of Thy Majesty, and also in penance for my sins; being satisfied that this flesh, to please which I have so often offended Thee, should be devoured by worms, and be reduced to dust. O my Jesus! I unite the pains and agonies which I must then suffer to the pains and agonies which Thou, my Saviour j didst suffer in Thy death. I accept death with all the circumstances Thou mayest appoint; I accept its time, whether it be near or distant; I accept the manner, whether in bed or out of it, whether sudden or not, and from that more or less painful illness which may please Thee. In everything I resign myself to Thy holy will. Give me strength to suffer all with patience. What shall I render to the Lord for all the benefits He hath given to me?[1446]

I thank Thee, O my God! first for the gift of faith, declaring that I desire to die a son of the holy Catholic Church. I thank Thee for not having caused me to die when I was in sin, and for having so often pardoned me with so much mercy. I thank Thee for so many lights of grace with which Thou hast sought to draw me to Thy love. I pray Thee to grant me to die after receiving the holy Viaticum, that, united with Thee, I may present myself at Thy tribunal. I do not deserve to hear from Thy mouth, Well done, good and faithful servant; because thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will set thee over many things; enter into the joy of thy Lord.[1447] I do not deserve it, for in nothing have I been perfectly faithful to Thee; but Thy death gives me hope that I shall be admitted to heaven, to love Thee there eternally, and with all my powers. O my crucified Love! have mercy upon me; look upon me with that love with which Thou didst look upon me from the cross when dying for me. Remember not the sins of my youth and my ignorance, O Lord.[1448] My sins terrify me, but I am comforted by that cross, on which I see Thee dead through the love of me. "Behold the wood of the cross, on which hung the salvation of the world."![1449] I desire to end my life, that I may cease to offend Thee; by the blood that was shed for me, pardon me all my sins before death comes upon me. "O blood of the Innocent, wash away the stains of the guilty."[1450] My Jesus, I embrace Thy cross, and kiss the wounds of Thy holy feet, before which I desire to breathe my soul away. Leave me not at that last hour; "We pray Thee save Thy servants, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood."[1451]

I love Thee with all my heart, I love Thee more than myself, and I repent with all my soul that I have displeased Thee. O Lord! I was lost, but Thou in Thy goodness hast delivered me from the world; receive, then, my soul from this hour, until that hour when it leaves the world. Therefore, I pray with St. Agatha, "Lord, Thou who hast taken from me the love of this world, receive my soul."[1452] In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever; Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth![1453] O holy Virgin! help me at the moment of my death; O holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for me a sinner, now and at the hour of my death; in thee, O Lady! have I hoped, I shall not be confounded forever. St. Joseph, my protector, obtain for me a holy death. My guardian angel, St. Michael the Archangel, defend me from the evil one in that last conflict. My holy patrons, and all saints in Paradise, succour me in that last hour. Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, be in my company at the hour of my death.

X

HE THAT LOVES GOD MUST LOVE AND NOT ABHOR DEATH

How can he ever abhor death who is in the grace of God? He that abideth in love dwelleth in God, and God in Him.[1454] He, therefore, that loves God is secure of his grace, and, thus dying, he is sure of going to rejoice forever in the kingdom of the blessed; and shall such a one fear death?

David truly said, Enter not into judgment with Thy servant, for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified.[1455] This means that no man may presume to be saved by his own merits; for no one but Jesus and Mary can say that he has been without sin throughout his life. But he ought not to fear death, if, with true repentance for his sins, he trusts in the merits of Jesus Christ, who came on earth to save sinners. The Son of man came to save that which was lost.[1456] And for this end he died, and poured forth his blood to save sinners. The blood of Christ Jesus, says the Apostle, speaks more in favour of sinners than the blood of Abel spoke against Cain, who slew him.[1457] It is true that, without a divine revelation, no man can possess an infallible certainty of his own salvation; but he that has given himself with a true heart to God, and is ready to lose everything, even life itself, rather than lose the divine grace, has a moral certainty that he will be saved. This certainty is founded on the divine promises; no man, says the Scripture, ever trusted in God and was confounded.[1458] Almighty God declares in many passages that he does not desire the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live. Is it My will that a sinner should die, saith the Lord God, and not that he should be converted from his ways, and live?[1459] In another place he makes the same declaration, and adds an oath: As I live, saith the Lord God, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from h is way and live.[1460]

And, in the same chapter, God laments over those obstinate sinners who choose to perish because they will not leave their sins, and says, Why will you die, O house of Israel.[1461] And to those who repent of their sins he promises to forget all their iniquities. If the wicked do penance for all his sins which he hath committed he shall live, . . . I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done.[1462] When a sinner also hates the sins he has committed, it is a certain sign that he has been pardoned. A holy Father[1463] says that whoever can say, with truth, "I hate and abhor my iniquities,"[1464] may be certain that they are forgiven. We have another sign of pardon when we recover grace and persevere in a good life for a considerable time after having sinned. It is also a sure sign to the same effect when we have a fixed resolution to die rather than lose the friendship of God, as also when we earnestly desire to love him, and to see him loved by others, and when we feel distress at seeing him offended. How is it, then, that certain great saints, after having given themselves wholly to God, and after a life of mortification and detachment from all earthly things, at the hour of death have felt great terror at the thought of appearing before Christ their judge? I reply that those great saints who have suffered these fears at the moment of death have been very few, and that it was the will of God that they should thus purge away the remains of their sins before entering on eternal blessedness; but that, ordinarily speaking, all the saints have died in remarkable peace, and with earnest desires to depart to the presence of God.

And for the rest, this is the very difference between sinners and saints at the hour of death, that sinners from fear pass on to despair, and saints from fear pass on to confidence, and thus die in peace. Therefore, every one who has a hope that he is in the grace of God ought to desire death, repeating the prayer which Christ Jesus has taught us, "Thy kingdom come;" and he ought to embrace death with joy when it comes that he may thus be freed from sin, and leave this world where no one lives without imperfections, and go to behold God, face to face, and love him with all his powers in the kingdom of love. O my beloved Jesus and my judge! when Thou dost judge me, for Thy mercy condemn me not to hell. In hell I cannot love Thee, but must hate Thee forever; and how can I hate Thee who art so worthy of love, and ho hast so loved me? If Thou wilt condemn me to hell, at least grant me grace to be able to love Thee there with all my heart. This grace I do not deserve, through my sins; but if I do not deserve it, Thou hast purchased it for me with the blood which Thou didst shed with such anguish for me upon the cross. O my Judge! inflict on me every pain, but deprive me not of the power of loving Thee. O Mother of God! behold the peril in which I stand of being condemned to be unable to love thy Son, who deserves an infinite love; help me; have pity on me.

XI

OUR SALVATION IS IN THE CROSS

"Behold the wood of the cross, on which hung the salvation of the world!"[1465] So sings the holy Church on Good Friday. In the cross is our salvation, our strength against temptations, our detachment from early pleasures; in the cross is found the true love of God. We must, therefore, resolve to bear with patience that cross which Jesus Christ sends us, and to die upon it for the sake of Jesus Christ, as he died upon his cross for the love of us. There is no other way to enter heaven but to resign ourselves to tribulations until death. And thus may we find peace, even in suffering. When the cross comes, what means is there for not loving peace, except the uniting of ourselves to the divine will? If we do not take this means, let us go where we will, let us do what we may, we shall never fly from the weight of the cross. On the other hand, if we carry it with good-will, it will bear us to heaven, and give us peace upon earth.

What does he gain who refuses the cross? He increases its weight. But he who embraces it, and bears it with patience, lightens its weight, and the weight itself becomes a consolation; for God abounds with grace to all those who carry the cross with good-will in order to please him. By the law of nature there is no pleasure in suffering; but divine love, when it reigns in a heart, makes it take delight in its sufferings. Oh, that we would consider the happy condition we shall enjoy in Paradise, if we be faithful to God, in enduring toils without lamenting; if we do not complain against God, who commands us to suffer, but say with Job, Let this be my comfort, that he should not spare in afflicting me, nor contradict the words of the Holy One.[1466] If we are sinners and have deserved hell, this should be our comfort in the tribulations which befall us, that we should be chastised in this life; because this is the sure sign that God will deliver us from eternal chastisement. Miserable is that sinner who prospers in this world! Whoever suffers a bitter trial, let him cast a glance at the hell which he has deserved, and thus the pains he endures will seem light.

If, then, we have committed sins, this ought to be our continual prayer to God, "O Lord, spare not pains, but give me, I pray Thee, strength to endure them with patience, that I may not oppose myself to Thy holy will. I will not oppose the words of the Holy One; in everything I unite myself to that which Thou wilt appoint for me, saying always, with Jesus Christ, Even so, Father; for so hath it seemed good to Thee.[1467] The soul which is governed by divine love seeks only God. When a man has given all the substance of his house for love, he will despise it as nothing.[1468] He that loves God despises and renounces everything that does not help him to love God; and in all the good works that he does, in his penitential acts and his labours for the glory of God, he seeks not consolations and sweetnesses of spirit; it is enough for him to know that he pleases God. In a word, he ever strives in all things to deny himself, renouncing every pleasure of his own; and then he boasts of nothing and is puffed up with nothing; but calls himself an unprofitable servant, and, setting himself in the lowest place, he abandons himself to the divine will and mercy We must change our tastes in order to become saints. If we do not arrive at a state in which bitter appears sweet, and sweet bitter, we shall never attain to a perfect union with God. In this consist all our security and perfection: in suffering with resignation all things that are contrary to our inclinations, as they happen to us day by day, whether they are small or great. And we must suffer them for those purposes for which the Lord desires that we should endure them: (1) to purify our selves from the sins we have committed; (2) to merit eternal life; (3) to please God, which is the chief and most noble end at which we can aim in all our doings.

Let us, then, ever offer ourselves to God, to suffer every cross that he may send us; and let us take care to be ever ready to endure every toil for the love of him, in order that, when it comes we may be ready to embrace it, saying, as Jesus Christ said to Peter when he was taken in the garden by the Jews to be led to death, The cup which My Father Hath given Me, shall I not drink it?[1469] God hath given me this cross for my good, and shall I say to him that I will not receive it? And whenever the weight of any cross seems very heavy, let us immediately have recourse to prayer, and God will give us strength to endure it meritoriously. And let us then recollect what St. Paul said, that no tribulation of this world, however grievous it may be, can be compared with the glory which God prepares for us in the world to come.[1470] Let us, therefore, reanimate our faith whenever tribulations afflict us; let us first cast our eyes upon the crucified One, who was in agonies for us upon the cross, and let us look also at Paradise, and on the blessings that God prepares for those who suffer for his love; and thus we shall not be faint-hearted, but shall thank him for the pains he gives us to suffer, and shall desire that he may give us more to suffer. Oh, how the saints rejoice in heaven, not that they have possessed honours and pleasures upon earth, but that they have suffered for Jesus Christ! Everything that passes is trifling; that only is great which is eternal, and never passes away. O my Jesus! how comforting is that which Thou sayest to me, Turn unto Me, and I will turn to you.[1471] For the sake of creatures, and of my own miserable tastes, I have left Thee; now I leave all, and turn to Thee; and I am confident that Thou wilt not reject me, if I desire to love Thee; for Thou hast told me that Thou art ready to embrace me. Receive me, then, into Thy grace; make me know the great good that Thou art, and the love that Thou hast borne to me, that I may no more leave Thee. O my Jesus! pardon me; O my beloved! pardon me the offences I have committed against Thee. Give me the love of Thee, and then do with me what Thou wilt. Chastise me as much as Thou wilt; deprive me of everything, but deprive me not of Thyself. Were the whole world to come and offer me all its blessings, I declare that I desire Thee alone, and nothing more. O my Mother! recommend me to thy Son he giveth thee whatever thou askest; in thee I trust.

HOW MUCH IT PLEASES JESUS CHRIST THAT WE SUFFER FOR THE LOVE OF HIM

If anyone will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow Me.[1472] It will be useful to make a few reflections on these words of Jesus Christ. He says, "If any one will come after Me;" he does not say, "to me," but, "after me." The Lord desires that we should come close after him; we must therefore walk in the same road of thorns and sufferings in which he walked. He goes before, and does not rest until he reaches Calvary, where he dies; therefore, if we love him, we must follow him even to death. And thus it is necessary that every one should deny himself; that is, that he should deny himself everything that self-love demands, but that is not pleasing to Jesus Christ.

Our Lord says further, "Let him take up his cross daily, and follow Me." Let us consider these last words one by one. Let him take up; it avails little to carry the cross by compulsion; all sinners bear it, but without merit; to bear it with merit, we must embrace it voluntarily. His cross; under this word is implied every kind of tribulation, which is called a "cross" by Jesus Christ, in order that the name may render it sweet, from the thought that he died on the cross for love of us. He also says, "his cross." Some persons when they receive spiritual consolations, offer themselves to suffer as great things as were endured by the martyrs, hot irons, piercing nails, and tortures; but then they cannot endure a headache, the carelessness of a friend, the ill temper of a relative. My brother, my sister, God does not ask you to endure hot irons, piercing nails, and tortures; but he desires that you should suffer patiently this pain, this annoyance, this contempt.

A certain nun would fain go to suffer in a desert; she would perform great acts of penance; but yet she cannot endure such a one for her Superior, or such a one for her companion in her duties; but God desires that she should bear that cross which he gives her to suffer, and not that which she would herself choose. He says daily. Some persons embrace the cross at the beginning, when it reaches them; but when it lasts long, they say, "Now I can bear no more." Yet God wills that we should go on to endure it with patience, and even that we should bear it continually, even till death. See, then, that salvation and perfection consist in these three words, let him deny; we must deny to our self-love whatever is not right: let him take up; we must embrace the cross that God gives us: let him follow we must follow the footsteps of Jesus Christ even to death. Let us be persuaded that for this end God keeps us in the world, that we may bear the crosses he sends us; and in this consists the merit of our life. Therefore our Saviour, because he loves us, came into this world, not for enjoyment, but to suffer, in order that we might follow in his steps. To this end you were called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving you an example that you should follow his steps.[1473]

Let us watch him, as he goes before with his cross, to point out the road by which we must follow him, if we would be saved Oh, what a joy it is, in every trouble that befalls us, to say to Jesus Christ, "Lord, is it Thy will that I should endure this cross? I accept it, and will endure it as long as it pleases Thee." Many persons are delighted to hear one speak of prayer, of peace, of love to Jesus Christ; but they find little pleasure in hearing one speak of crosses or of suffering. These are satisfied so long as the wind breathes with spiritual delights, but if it ceases, and there comes some adversity or desolation, in which the Lord hides himself in order to prove them, and deprives them of their usual comfort, they leave off prayer, Communion, and mortifications, and abandon themselves to ill-humour and lukewarmness, seeking their pleasure from earthly things. But these souls love themselves more than Jesus Christ; while they who do not love him with an interested love, for the sake of consolations, but with a pure love, and only because he is worthy of hove, do not leave their usual devout exercises for any dryness or weariness which they experience, being content to please God; and they offer themselves to suffer this desolation even till death, and through all eternity, if God so will it. Jesus Christ, says St. Francis de Sales, is as kind in desolation as in consolation. Souls that love God find their comfort and sweetness in suffering; in recollecting that they suffer for his love, and say, "How sweet it is, O my Lord! to those who love Thee to suffer for Thee! Oh, that I might die for the love of Thee, my Jesus, who hast died for me!"

All this, and still more, is claimed from us by Jesus Christ, who chose a life of pains, and a bitter death, without the slightest relief, for love of us; in order to teach us that if we would love him, we must love him as he loved us. Oh, how dear to Jesus Christ is a soul which suffers and loves! O divine gift! gift, above every other gift; to love in suffering, and to suffer in loving! O my Jesus! Thou alone hast been able to teach us these maxims of salvation, all contrary to the maxims of the world; and Thou alone canst give us strength to suffer crosses with patience. I do not pray Thee to exempt me from suffering; I only pray Thee to give me strength to suffer with patience and resignation. O Eternal Father, Thy Son has promised that whatever we ask Thee in his name, Thou wilt give it us.[1474] Behold, we ask this of Thee: give us grace to endure with patience the pains of this life; hear us for the love of Jesus Christ. And Thou, O my Jesus! pardon me all the offences I have committed against Thee, in that I have not been willing to suffer with patience the troubles Thou hast sent me. Give me Thy love, that it may give me strength to suffer all for love of Thee. Deprive me of everything, of every earthly good, of relatives, friends, health of body, of every comfort; deprive me even of life; but not of Thy love. Give me Thyself, and I ask no more. O most holy Virgin! obtain for me an enduring love for Jesus Christ, even till death.

DIVINE LOVE CONQUERS ALL THINGS

Love is strong as death.[1475] As death separates us from all the good things of the world, from riches, honours, kindred, friends, and all earthly pleasures, so the love of God, when it reigns in a heart, strips it of all affection for these perishing advantages. Therefore the saints have thought fit to strip themselves of everything the world offered them, to renounce their possessions, their posts of honour, and all they had, and to fly to deserts or cloisters, to think upon and to love God alone. The soul cannot exist without loving either the Creator or its creatures. Grant that a soul is weaned from every other love, and you will find it filled with love divine. Would we know whether we have given ourselves wholly to God? Let us examine ourselves whether we are weaned from every earthly thing. Some persons lament that in all their devotions, prayers, communions, visits to the Blessed Sacrament, they do not find God. To such St. Teresa says, "Detach thy heart from creatures, and then go seek God, and thou shalt find him." Thou wilt not find a continual spiritual sweetness which God does not give without interruption to those who love him in this life, but only from time to time, to make them fly onwards towards those boundless delights which he prepares for them in paradise; but yet he gives them that inward peace which excels all sensual delights; that peace of God which passes all sense.[1476] And what greater delight can be enjoyed by a soul that loves God than to be able to say, with true affection, "My God and my all?" St. . Francis of Assisi continued a whole night in an ecstasy of paradise, continually repeating these words, "My God and my all."

"Love is as strong as death." If a dying man were to give a sign of moving towards any earthly thing, we should then know that he was not dead; death deprives us of everything. He that would give himself altogether to God must leave everything. If he reserves any one thing, he gives a sign that his love for God is not strong, but weak. Divine love strips us of everything. Father Segneri, the. younger, an eminent servant of God (whose life was written by Muratori), said: "Love to God is a beloved thief, which robs us of every earthly thing." Another servant of God, when he had given to the poor all his possessions, and was asked what had reduced him to such poverty, took the book of the Gospels out of his pocket, and said, "This has robbed me of everything." In a word, Jesus Christ will possess our whole heart, and he will have no companion there. St. Augustine writes that the Roman senate refused to allow adoration to be paid to Jesus Christ because he was a haughty God who claimed to be honoured alone; and truly as he is our only Lord, he has the right to be adored and loved with our unmingled love. St, Francis de Sales said that the pure love of God consumes everything that is not God. When, then, we see in our heart any affection for anything that is not God,, or not for the sake of God, we must instantly banish it, saying, "Depart, there is no place for thee." In this consists that complete renunciation which our Lord recommends, if we would be wholly his. It must be complete; that is, of everything, and especially of our friends and kindred. How many, for the sake of men, have never become saints! David said that they who please men are despised by God.[1477]

But, above all, we must renounce ourselves by conquering self-love. Cursed is self-love, which thrusts itself into everything, even our most holy actions, by placing before us our own love of pleasure! How many preachers, how many writers, have thus lost all their labours! Constantly, even in prayer, in spiritual reading, in the Holy Communion, there enters some end not pure, either the desire of being noticed, or of obtaining mere spiritual pleasures. We must, therefore, strive to conquer this enemy, who would ruin our best deeds. We must deprive ourselves, as far as possible, of everything that pleases us; we must deprive ourselves of this pleasure, for the very reason that it is agreeable; we must do a service to this ungrateful person, because he is ungrateful; we must take this bitter medicine, because it is bitter. Self-love makes it appear that nothing is good in which we do not find our own personal satisfaction; but he that would wholly belong to God must do force to himself whenever he is employed in anything that is according to his own pleasure, and say always, "Let me lose everything, so that I please God." For the rest, no one is more contented with the world than he who despises all the good things of the world. The more he strips himself of such good things, the richer he becomes in divine grace. Thus does the Lord know how to reward those who love him faithfully. But, O my Jesus! Thou knowest my weakness; Thou hast promised to help those who trust in Thee. Lord, I love Thee; in Thee I trust; give me strength, and make me wholly Thine. In thee also I trust, O my sweet advocate, Mary!

XIV

THE NECESSITY OF MENTAL PRAYER

Mental prayer is, in the first place, necessary, in order that we may have light to go on the journey to eternity. Eternal truths are spiritual things that are not seen with the eyes of the body, but only by the reflection of the mind. He that does not meditate, does not see them; and thus he advances with difficulty along the way of salvation. And, further, he does not meditate, does not know his own failings, and thus, says St. Bernard, [1478] he does not detest them; so, also, he does not see the perils of his state, and therefore does not think of avoiding them. But when we meditate, our failings and perils quickly present themselves; and when we see them we seek to remedy them. St. Bernard said that meditation regulates our affections, directs our actions, and corrects our defects. [1479] In the second place, without meditation we have no strength for resisting temptations and practising virtues. St. Teresa said that when a man leaves off meditation, the devil has no need of carrying him to hell, for he throws himself into it. And the reason is, that without meditation there is no prayer. God has every willingness to give us his graces; but St. Gregory said that before giving them he desires to be asked, and that he is, as it were, compelled to give them through our prayers. [1480] But without prayer we shall have no strength to resist our enemies, and thus shall not obtain perseverance in what is good. Palafox, in his note upon the tenth letter of St. Teresa, wrote thus: "How will the Lord give us perseverance if we do not ask for it? and how shall we ask it without meditation?" While he who practises meditation is like a tree planted by the water-side. [1481]

And, further, meditation is the happy furnace in which souls are inflamed with divine love; "in my meditation a fire shall flame out." [1482] St. Catherine of Bologna said, "Meditation is the bond which binds the soul to God; the king brought me into the wine-cellar, he fixed his love upon me." [1483] This wine-cellar is meditation, in which the soul becomes so inebriated with divine love that it loses, as it were, its sense for the things of the world; it sees only that which pleases its beloved; it speaks only of the beloved; it would only hear of the beloved; every other discourse wearies and troubles it. In meditation, the soul, retiring to converse alone with God, rests upon itself: He shall sit solitary and hold his peace; because he hath taken it upon himself. [1484] When the soul sits, that is, shuts itself up in meditation to consider how worthy is God of love, and how great is the love he bears to it, it thus tastes of God, and fills itself with holy thoughts, and detaches itself from earthly affections, and conceives great desires for becoming holy, and finally resolves to give itself wholly to God. And where but in meditation have the saints made their most generous resolutions, which have lifted them up to the highest point of perfection? Let us hear what St. John of the Cross said, speaking of mental prayer: "Here we open our heart, here we learn sweet doctrine, and make ourselves wholly to belong to God, reserving nothing, and espousing ourselves to him." And St. Aloysius Gonzaga said that no one will ever attain a high degree of perfection who is not much given to meditation. Let us, then, earnestly apply ourselves to it, and not leave it for any weariness that we may experience; this weariness which we endure for God will be abundantly recompensed by him.

Pardon me, O my God, my slothfulness; what treasures of grace have I lost in so often neglecting to meditate! For the future give me grace to be faithful through life in conversing with Thee, with whom I hope to converse forever in heaven. I do not ask Thee to delight me here with Thy consolations; I do not deserve it; it is enough that Thou dost suffer me to approach Thy feet to recommend to Thee my poor soul, which is thus miserable because it has separated itself from Thee. Here, O my crucified Jesus! the sole memory of Thy Passion shall keep me detached from earth, and united with Thee. O holy Virgin Mary! aid me with thy prayers.

XV

THE OBJECT OF MENTAL PRAYER

In order to practise mental prayer, or meditation, well, and to make it truly profitable to the soul, we must well ascertain the ends for which we attempt it. First, we must meditate in order to unite ourselves more completely to God. It is not so much good thoughts in the intelligence, as good acts of the will, or holy desires, that unite us to God; and such are the acts that we perform in meditation, acts of humility, confidence, self-sacrifice, resignation, and especially of love and of repentance for our sins. Acts of love, says St. Teresa, are those that keep the soul inflamed with holy love. Secondly, we must meditate in order to obtain from God, by prayer, the graces that are necessary in order to enable us to advance in the way of salvation, to avoid sin, and to take the means that will lead us to perfection. The best fruit, then, that comes from meditation is the exercise of prayer. Almighty God, ordinarily speaking, does not give grace to any but those who pray.

St. Gregory writes, "God desires to be entreated, he desires to be constrained, he desires to be, as it were, conquered by importunity." [1485] Observe his words, "to be conquered by importunity." At times, in order to obtain graces of special value, it is not enough simply to pray; we must pray urgently, and, as it were, compel God, by our prayers, to give them. It is true that at all times the Lord is ready to hear us; but at the time of meditation, when we are most truly in converse with God, he is most bountiful in giving us his aid. Above all, we must apply to meditation, in order to obtain perseverance and the holy love of God. Final perseverance is not a single grace, but a chain of graces, to which must correspond the chain of our prayers; if we cease to pray, God will cease to give us his help, and we shall perish. He who does not practise meditation will find the greatest difficulty in persevering in grace till death. Palafox, in his notes on St. Teresās letters, writes thus: "How will the Lord give us perseverance, if we do not ask it? And how shall we ask for it without meditation? Without meditation there is no communion with God." Thus must we be urgent with prayers to obtain from God his holy love. St. Francis de Sales said that all virtues come in union with holy love. All good things came to me together with her.[1486] Let our prayer for perseverance and love, therefore, be continual; and, in order to pray with greater confidence, let us ever bear in mind the promise made us by Jesus Christ, that whatever we seek from God through the merits of his Son, he will give it us.[1487] Let us, then, pray; and pray always, if we would that God should make us bound in every blessing.

Let us pray for ourselves, and, if we have zeal for the glory of God, let us pray also for others. It is a thing most pleasing to God to be entreated for unbelievers and heretics, and all sinners. Let the people confess to Thee, O God! let all the people confess to Thee.[1488] Let us say, O Lord! make them know Thee, make them love Thee. We read in the lives of St. Teresa and St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi how God inspired these holy women to pray for sinners. And to prayer for sinners let us also add prayers for the holy souls in purgatory.

Thirdly: we must apply ourselves to meditation, not for the sake of spiritual consolations, but chiefly in order to learn what is the will of God concerning us. Speak, Lord, said Samuel to God, for Thy servant heareth.[1489] Lord, make me to know what Thou wilt, that I may do it. Some persons continue meditation as long as consolations continue; but when these cease, they leave off meditation. It is true that God is accustomed to comfort his beloved souls at the time of meditation, and to give them some foretaste of the delights he prepares in heaven for those who love him, These are things which the lovers of the world do not comprehend; they who have no taste except for earthly delights despise those that are celestial. Oh, if they were wise, how surely would they leave their pleasures to shut themselves in their closets, to speak alone with God! Meditation is nothing more than a converse between the soul and God; the soul pours forth to him its affections, its desires, its fears, its requests, and God speaks to the heart, causing it to know his goodness, and the love which he bears it, and what it must do to please him. I will lead her into solitude, and speak to her heart.[1490]

But these delights are not constant, and, for the most part, holy souls experience much dryness of spirit in meditation. "With dryness and temptations," says St. Teresa, "the Lord makes proof of those wh o love him." And she adds, "Even if this dryness lasts through life, let not the soul leave off meditation; the time will come when all will be well rewarded." The time of dryness is the time for gaining the greatest rewards; and when we find ourselves apparently without fervour, without good desires, and, as it were, unable to do a good act, let us humble ourselves, and resign ourselves, for this very meditation will be more fruitful than others. It is enough then to say, if we can say nothing more, "O Lord! help me, have mercy on me, abandon me not!" Let us also have recourse to our comforter, the most holy Mary. Happy he who does not leave off meditation in the hour of desolation. God will make him abound in graces; and therefore let him say:

"O my God, how can I expect to be comforted by Thee! I, who, until this hour, have deserved to be in hell, forever separated from Thee, and deprived of the power of loving Thee any more! I do not therefore grieve, O my God! that Thou deprivest me of Thy consolations; I do not deserve them; I do not pretend to them. It is enough for me to know that Thou wilt never repel a soul that loves Thee. Deprive me not of the power of loving Thee, and then do with me what Thou wilt. If thou wilt that I continue thus afflicted and desolate even till death, and through all eternity, I am content; it is enough that I can say with truth, O my God, I love Thee, I love Thee! Mary, Mother of God, have pity on me!"

XVI

THE MERCY OF GOD

So great is the desire which God has to give us his graces that, as St. Augustine says, he has more desire to give them to us than we have to receive them from him.[1491] And the reason is, that goodness, as the philosophers say, is of its own nature diffusive; it is compelled by itself to pour itself forth in benefits to others. God, therefore, being infinite goodness, possesses an infinite desire to communicate himself to us, his creatures, and to make us share his gifts. Hence flows the boundless pity which the Lord has for our miseries. David said that the earth is full of the divine mercy.[1492] It is not full of the divine justice, inasmuch as God does not exercise his justice in punishing evil-doers, except when it is necessary; and he is, as it were, compelled to call it into operation. On the other hand, he is bounteous and liberal in showing forth his mercy to all, and at all times; whence St. James says, Mercy is exalted over justice.[1493] Mercy herself frequently stays the strokes which are prepared for sinners by the hand of justice, and obtains their pardon. Therefore the prophet calls God by the very name of mercy: My God, my mercy![1494] And for the same reason he says, For Thy name's sake, O Lord, be merciful to my sin: Lord, pardon me for Thy name's sake, for it is mercy itself.[1495]

Isaias said that chastisement is a work which is not dear to the heart of God, but alien and foreign to it, as if he would say that it was far from his inclinations: The Lord shall be angry, as in the valley which is in Gabaon; that he may do His work, His strange work; that He may perform His work, His work is strange to Him.[1496] His mercy it was that brought him to send his own Son on earth to be made man, and to die upon a cross to deliver us from eternal death. Therefore, Zacharias exclaimed, Through the bowels of the mercy of our God, when the day star visited us from on high.[1497] The expression the "bowels of the mercy of God" implies a mercy which proceeds from the depth of the heart of God, through which he preferred that his own Son should die, rather than we should perish. In order to see how great is the goodness of God towards us, and the desire he has to give us his blessings, it is enough to read these few words of the Gospel: Seek, and it shall be given you.[1498] Who could say more to a friend to show him his affection? Yet this is what God says to every one of us. Seeing our misery, he invites us to come to him, and promises to relieve us: Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you.[1499] The Jews, on one occasion, complained of God, and said they would no longer go and seek his graces; wherefore he said to Jeremias, Why will not My people come to Me? am I become a desert, or a land slow of produce, which yields no fruit, or yields it out of season?[1500]

At the same time the Lord was willing to explain the wrong which the Jews did to him, while He is ever ready to comfort every one who comes to him, as he said by Isaias, As soon as He shall hear, He will answer thee.[1501] Art thou a sinner, and wilt thou have pardon? "Doubt not," said St. John Chrysostom, "that God has more desire to pardon thee than thou hast to be pardoned."[1502] If, then, God sees any one obstinate in his sin, he waits in order to shower mercy upon him.[1503] And therefore he points out the torment that awaits him, in order that he may learn wisdom. Thou Hast given a warning to them that fear Thee, that they may flee from before the bow.[1504] Now he stands and knocks at the door of our hearts, that we may open to him: Behold, I stand at the door, and knock.[1505] And again he urges his people, saying, Why will ye die, O house of Israel.?[1506] As if he were saying, in compassion, "O my son, why wilt thou perish?" St. Dionysius the Areopagite writes: "God even entreats those who turn from him as a lover, and entreats them not to perish."[1507] And this very thing was written before by the Apostle, when he entreated sinners, on the part of Jesus Christ, to be reconciled with God;[1508] on which Chrysostom remarks, "Christ himself is beseeching you, and what is it that he prays you? that ye would be reconciled to God."[1509]

If, then, some determine to continue obstinate, what more can God do? He makes all understand that whosoever he sees come to him in penitence he will not cast away: Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.[1510] He says that he is ready to embrace every one who turns to him: Turn unto Me, and I will turn unto you.[1511] He promises to every ungodly man that if he repents he will pardon him, and forget his sins: If the wicked do penance, he shall live; I will forget all his iniquity that he hath committed.[1512] He even says, Come, and let us reason together; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow.[1513] As though he would say, "Come, penitent, unto me, and if I embrace you not, rebuke me as one who has failed in his word." No; the Lord knoweth not how to despise a contrite heart. A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[1514] We read in St. Luke[1515] with what joy he embraced—the lost sheep, and with what love he welcomed the prodigal son when he returned to his feet. And God himself says that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons.[1516] St. Gregory explains the reason of this by saying that very often sinners, when pardoned, are most fervent in loving God, while those who have not thus fallen grow lukewarm in their security.[1517]

O my Jesus! as Thou hast had so great patience with me in waiting for me, and so great love in pardoning me, as I trust I would love Thee with all my heart; but this love Thou must give me. Give it me! O my Lord! and little honour is it to Thee that I, a sinner so favoured by Thee, should love Thee in some little degree. O my Jesus! when shall I begin to be grateful to Thee, as Thou hast been gracious to me? For the past, instead of being grateful to Thee, I have offended Thee, and despised Thee. Shall I, then, hereafter ever live thus turned away from Thee, who hast spared nothing to gain my love? No, my Saviour! I would love Thee with all my heart I would never displease Thee. Thou commandest me to love Thee, and I desire nothing but to love Thee. Thou seekest me, and I seek nothing but Thee. Give me Thy help, without which I can do nothing. O Mary, O Mother of Mercy! draw me altogether to God.

XVII

CONFIDENCE IN JESUS CHRIST

Wonderfully great, as has been said, is the mercy of Jesus Christ to us; but for our greater good he desires that we should put our trust in his mercy, with a lively confidence, trusting in his merits and his promises. Therefore, St. Paul recommends us to preserve this confidence, saying that it has a great reward from God.[1518] And therefore, when a fear of the divine judgment seems to diminish this confidence in us, we ought to chase it away, and say to ourselves, as the learned Dr. Saverio Mattel writes in his excellent version of the Psalms, on Psalm xli.:[1519] "My heart, dost thou tremble? knowest thou not how to hope? Banish thy fear, and tremble not. Why wilt thou trouble me? Hope in the Lord, that we may one day sing his praise and glory."

The Lord revealed to St. Gertrude that our confidence so constrains him that he cannot possibly refuse to hear us in everything we seek of him. The same thing was said by St. Climachus: "Prayer exerts a holy violence upon God."[1520] Every prayer offered with confidence, as it were, forces God; but this force is acceptable and pleasing to him. Therefore, St. Bernard writes that the divine mercy is like a vast fountain, from which whosoever brings a larger vessel of confidence carries away a larger abundance of graces. And this is according to what the Psalmist wrote, Let Thy mercy be upon us, O Lord, according as we have put our trust in Thee.[1521] God has declared that he protects and saves all who trust in him.[1522] Let them, then, rejoice. David said, "All who hope in Thee, my God, shall be blessed forever, and Thou wilt ever dwell in them."[1523] The same prophet said, Mercy is round about all who trust in God.[1524] He that trusts in God shall be ever so circled and guarded around, that he is safe from all danger of perishing. Oh, what great promises the Holy Scriptures make to those who trust in God! Are we lost through our sins? Behold the remedy at hand! Let us go with confidence, says the Apostle, to the feet of Jesus Christ, and there shall we find pardon.[1525] Let us not wait to go to Jesus Christ until he sits upon his throne of judgment; let us hasten at once, while he sits on his throne of grace.

But, says the sinner, I do not deserve to be heard, if I beg for pardon. But I reply, though he has not deserved, his confidence in the divine mercy will obtain grace for him; for this pardon is not dependent upon his merits, but upon the divine promise to pardon those who repent; and this it is which Jesus Christ says, Every one that seeketh, receiveth.[1526] The author of a certain incomplete work says, commenting on the words "everyone," that they mean every one, whether just or unjust: it is sufficient that they pray with confidence. Let us, then, hear from the lips of Jesus Christ himself how great things are done by confidence: Whatsoever things ye seek, when ye pray, believe that ye shall receive them, and they shall be given to you.[1527] Whosoever, then, fears that through infirmity he shall fall again into his old sins, let him trust in God, and he shall not fall; as the prophet assures us, All that hope in Him shall not fail.[1528] Isaias says that they who hope in the Lord renew their strength.[1529] Let us, then, be strong in not wavering in our confidence, because God has promised, as St. Paul says, to protect all who hope in him; and when anything seems especially difficult to overcome, then let us say, I can do all things through Him that comforteth me.[1530] And who that ever trusted in God was confounded?[1531] Yet, let us not go about seeking some constant sensible confidence, palpable to our feelings; it is enough if we have the will to trust.

This is true confidence, the will to trust in God, because he is good, and desirous to help us, and powerful, and can help us, and faithful, and has promised to help us. Above all, let us strengthen ourselves with the promise made by Jesus Christ, Amen, amen, I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name, He will give it you.[1532] Thus let us seek grace from God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, and we shall obtain what we will. O eternal God! I know that I am poor in all things; I can do nothing, I have nothing, save what comes to me from Thy hands; all I can say to Thee is, Lord, have mercy upon me. My misery is, that to my poverty I have added the sin of having answered Thy graces with the sins I have committed against Thee. But, notwithstanding, I would hope from Thy mercy this twofold blessing: first, that Thou wouldst pardon my sins; and then that Thou wouldst give me perseverance together with Thy holy love, and with grace to pray to Thee constantly to help me even till death. I ask it all of Thee, I hope for it, through the merits of Thy Son Jesus, and the blessed Virgin Mary. O my chief advocate! help me with thy prayers.

In a previous paragraph I mentioned the work of Signer Mattel on the Psalms, a work worthy of general approbation. But I beg him to permit me to express here my regret at the e ulogies that he lavishes upon the poetical compositions of his celebrated friend, Signor Pietro Metastasio. He should have excepted the pieces that treat of profane love, and that merit no praise but blame; for the more beautiful they are, as I said in Cha p. 6, the more hurtful they are to youth. He should have frankly avowed that his worthy friend should have made a better use of the talent that God had given him, in employing it in works that would edify the people, not in the composition of verses that would indeed secure to him the applause of worldlings, but not of good people, and much less of God. In my writings I have always avoided censuring any one, whoever he might be, even those who have heaped injury upon me; but, under the present circumstances, I do not hesitate to disapprove of the erotic poems of Metastasio; and in this I am fully in accord with him, since at present, as I have mentioned above, he detests with horror, and in an edifying manner, his own works that the world applauds. I know very well that this censure will be blamed by the admirers of Metastasio; but let them reflect that in boasting of his pernicious productions they but displease him who now repents of having composed them, and displease God who wishes that books injurious to souls should not be praised, but should be blamed as they deserve to be, in order to open the eyes of the imprudent youth that read them. It is true that in the poetry of Metastasio there is nothing immodest, that in it we find none of the obscenities that sully the impious works of Marini and the like; however, we must admit that his expressions are too tender, and are capable of inflaming the heart with impure love. Who does not see in this passionate language the source of grave disorder? This can easily be seen in the pestilential work entitled Il Pastor fido, a work justly condemned by the Church, as I have been told; and if it is not condemned, it deserves to be a thousand times. Earthly and carnal love is a fire that leads sooner or later to the fire of hell. Ah! ask the multitude of those wretched people who did not take care to protect themselves from the impure flame that has perverted them, mind and heart at the same time. Signer Mattei ought to thank God for having inspired him with the happy thought of consecrating his fine talent and his acquirements to a work so erudite, so useful, and so pious.

SALVATION ALONE IS NECESSARY

One thing is needful.[1533] It is not necessary that in this world we should be honoured with dignities, favoured with riches, with good health, and earthly pleasures; but it is necessary that we should be saved; for there is no middle course, we must either be saved or be damned. After this short life, we shall be either eternally happyin heaven, or eternally wretched in hell. O my God! what is it that will befall me? Shall I be saved or be lost? One lot or the other must be mine. I hope to be saved; but who shall assure me of it? I know that I have repeatedly deserved hell. Yes, my Saviour, Thy death is my hope.

How many worldly persons there are who were for a time loaded with riches and honours, and lifted up to high positions, and even to thrones, and who now find themselves in hell, where all their fortune in this world serves only to increase their pains and despair. This is what the Lord warned us of: Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth destroy. [1534] Every acquisition of earthly goods perishes with death; but the acquisition of spiritual goods is an unrivalled treasure, and is eternal. God has taught us that he wills the salvation of all.[1535] And to all he gives the power of being saved. Miserable he who is lost; it is all his own deed: Thou art thy destruction, O Israel; in Me alone is thy help.[1536] And this will be the greatest pain of the damned, the thought that they were lost through their own fault. Fire and the worm (that is, the remorse of conscience) will be the torturers of the damned, in punishment for their sins;[1537] but the worm will torment them forever more terribly than the flame. How much pain we suffer in this world from the loss of any object of value, a diamond, a clock, a purse of money, when it happens through our own carelessness! We cannot eat or sleep, for thinking of our loss, so long as there is a hope of repairing it in some other way. What, then, will be the torment of one who is lost, in that, through his own fault, he has lost God and paradise, without a hope of ever recovering them!

We have gone astray. [1538] This will be the eternal complaint of the miserable damned ones: we have gone astray, destroying ourselves of our own accord, and there is no remedy for our error. In all the misfortunes that occur to most persons in this life, a remedy comes with time, or with a change of state, or, at least, through a holy resignation to the will of God. But none of these remedies will be for us when we have reached eternity, if we have wandered from the path to heaven. Therefore, the Apostle St. Paul exhorts us to labour for eternal salvation with a continual fear of losing it: Work out your salvation with fear and trembling.[1539] This fear will cause us to walk in it with caution, and to avoid occasions of evil; it will aid us continually to recommend ourselves to God, and thus we shall be saved. Let us pray the Lord that he will fix this thought in our hearts, that upon that last opening of the lips, which will be our act before death, depends the question whether we shall be eternally blessed, or eternally miserable, without hope of remedy. My God, many times have I despised Thy grace; I deserve no mercy; but Thy prophet teaches me that Thou showest mercy to all who seek Thee. [1540] For the past I have fled from Thee; but now I seek nothing, I ask nothing, I love nothing, but Thee. In Thy goodness, despise me not; remember the blood Thou hast shed for me. This blood, and thy intercession, O Mary, Mother of God! are my only hope.

PERFECT RESIGNATION TO THE DIVINE WILL

My meat is to do his will.[1541] So said Jesus Christ, speaking of himself. In this mortal life, meat is that which preserves our life; and, therefore, our Lord said that it was his meat to do the will of the Father. This also ought to be the meat of our souls: Life is in his will.[1542] Our life consists in doing the divine will; he that does not fulfil it is dead. The wise man writes: They that are faithful in love shall rest in Him.[1543] They who are little faithful in loving God will desire that he should agree with them, that he should conform himself to their pleasure, and do whatever they desire; but they who love God agree with him. and unite their wills to his will, and are satisfied with everything that God does with them, and with all their circumstances; and in every adversity that afflicts them, whether sickness, dishonour, weariness, loss of property or of kindred, they ever have on their lips and in their heart these words, "Thy will be done," which are the constant expression of saints. God only desires that which is best for us, which is our sanctification.[1544]

Let us take care, therefore, to quiet our own will, uniting it ever to the will of God; and thus we shall be able, also, to quiet our intellect, recollecting that everything that God does is the best thing that can befall us. Whoever does not this will never find true peace. All the perfection that can be attained in this world, which is a place of purification, and consequently a place of pains and troubles, consists in suffering patiently those things that are opposed to our self-love; and, in order to suffer with patience, there is no more efficacious means than a willingness to suffer, in order to do the will of God. Submit thyself, then, to Him, and be at peace.[1545] He that agrees with the divine will in everything is always at peace, and nothing that happens to him can make him miserable. It will not make the just man sad, whatever shall befall him.[1546] But why is the just man never miserable under any circumstances? Because he knows well that whatever happens in the world, happens through the will of God. The divine will (so to say) draws out all the thorns and bitterness of the tribulations that come upon us in this world. The hymn which speaks of the divine will thus sings: " Thou changest crosses into joys; Thou makest even death to be sweet; he that can unite himself to Thee knows neither cross nor fear. Oh, how worthy art Thou of love, O Thou will of God!" Behold the excellent counsel of St. Peter, in order to find a perfect peace in the midst of the toils of this present life, Casting all your care upon Him; for He has care for you:[1547] And if it is God who thus gives thought for our good, why should we weary ourselves with so many anxieties, as if our happiness depended on our own cares, and not rather abandon ourselves into the hands of God, upon whom all depends?

Cast thy care upon the Lord, says David, and He shall nourish thee.[1548] Let us strive to obey God in everything he commands us and advises us, and then let us leave to him the care of our salvation, and he will take care to give us all the means that are necessary, in order that we may be saved: Thy soul shall be saved, because thou hast had confidence in Me.[1549] Whosoever places his whole confidence in God is sure of eternal salvation. In a word, whoever does the will of God enters into paradise; and he that does it not, enters not. Some people trust their eternal salvation to certain devotions, or to certain outward works of piety, and yet do not the will of God. But Jesus Christ says: Not every one that saith to Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father, he shall enter into the kingdom of heaven.[1550] Thus, if we desire to be saved, and to acquire a perfect union with God, let us take care to be ever offering up the prayer of David: Teach me, O Lord, to do Thy will.[1551] And for this purpose, let us strip ourselves of our own will, and give it wholly to God, without reserve. When we give to God our property in alms, our food in fastings, our blood in scourgings, we give him what we possess; but when we give him our will, we give him altogether ourselves; wherefore he that gives to God all his will is able to say, Lord, having given Thee all my will, I have nothing more to give Thee.

The sacrifice of our own will is the most acceptable sacrifice we can make to God; and God pours fourth his graces abundantly upon him who makes it. This sacrifice, however, in order to be perfect, must have two conditions: it must be without reserve, and it must be constant. Some persons give to God their will, but with a certain reserve; and little does this, gift please God. Others give him their will, but speedily they take it back again; and such persons place themselves in great peril of being abandoned by God; so that it is necessary that all our strength, and desires, and prayers, should be directed to obtain from God perseverance in doing nothing but what he wills. Let us, then, day by day, renew to God our total renunciation of our own will, and constantly take care to seek and ask for nothing which is not according to the will of God. And thus will cease within us passions, desires, fears, and all inordinate affections. Sister Margaret of the Cross, a daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, and a Bare-footed Nun of St. Clare, when she became quite blind, was wont to say, "How can I desire to see, when God wills it not?"

Receive, O God of my soul I receive the sacrifice of my whole will and my whole liberty. I see that I have deserved that Thou shouldst turn Thy back upon me, and refuse this gift of mine, so often have I been unfaithful to Thee; but I learn that Thou dost again command me to love Thee with all my heart, and, therefore, I am sure Thou wilt receive it. I resign myself, then, wholly to Thy will; make me to know what Thou wilt, that I may be able to accomplish it all. Make me love Thee, and then dispose of me and all my affairs as it pleases Thee. I am in Thy hands; do what Thou knowest to be most expedient for my eternal salvation; while I declare that I desire Thee alone, and nothing more. O mother of God! do thou obtain for me the gift of holy perseverance.

XX

HAPPY IS HE WHO IS FAITHFUL TO GOD IN ADVERSITY

The faithfulness of soldiers is tried, not in repose, but in battle. This earth is our battle-field, where everyone is placed to fight, and to conquer, in order to be saved: if he conquers not, he is lost forever. Therefore said holy Job, Every day I now fight; I wait until my change cometh.[1552] Job suffered in struggling with many a foe, but he comforted himself with the hope that, in conquering and rising from the dead, he should change all his state. Of this change St. Paul spoke, and rejoiced in speaking of it: The dead shall be raised incorrupt. and we shall be changed.[1553] Our estate is changed in heaven, which is no place of toil, but of rest; not of fear, but of security; not of sorrow or weariness, but of gladness and joy eternal. With the hope, then, of so great joy, let us inspire ourselves, and fight until death, and never give ourselves up conquered to our enemies until our change comes;[1554] until the end of our struggle is attained, and we possess a blessed eternity. "The patient man will endure for the time, and then shall gladness be restored to him." Blessed is he who suffers for God in this life; he suffers "for the time," but his joy will be eternal in the country of the blessed. This will end the persecutions, the temptations, the infirmities, the annoyances, and all the miseries of this life; and God will give us a life full of satisfaction, which will never end. Now is the time for pruning the vine, and for cutting off everything that hinders its growth towards the promised land of heaven.

But the cutting off produces pain, so that we have need of patience; and then is the restoration of gladness, when the more we have suffered, the more shall we be filled with consolations. God is faithful; and to him who suffers on earth for his love's sake, with resignation, he promises that he himself will be his reward; a reward in finitely greater than all our sufferings: Behold, I am thy exceeding great reward. [1555] Nevertheless, before we receive the crown of eternal life, the Lord wills that we should be tried with sufferings. Blessed is the man that suffereth temptation; for, when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which God hath promised to them that love Him. [1556] Blessed, then, is he who is faithful to God in adversity. Some people think they are beloved of God when all their affairs go prosperously, and they have no troubles; but they complain because God does not try the patience and faithfulness of his servants by prosperity, but by adversity, in order to give them that crown which fadeth not away, as all the crowns of this life do fade away. This will be a crown of eternal glory, as St. Peter writes: Ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.[1557] To whom, then, is this crown promised? St. James says, God has promised it to those who love Him.[1558] God has promised it again and again to those who love him, because divine love makes us fight with courage and win the victory. To the love of God we must also join humility.

The Preacher says, Gold and silver are tried in the fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation. [1559] It is in humiliation that saints are discovered, in which it is made known whether they are gold or lead. Such a one has been counted a saint; but when he receives an injury from another, he is all in an agitation; he complains of it to every one; he say he will make him repent of it. This is a sign of what he is; it is a sign that he is lead. The Lord said, In thy humility have patience.[1560] The proud man, whatever humiliation he receives, considers it a great injustice, and, therefore, cannot endure it; but the humble man, accounting himself deserving of every evil treatment, suffers all with patience. Let him who has committed a mortal sin cast a glance upon the hell that he has deserved, and thus he will suffer with patience every contempt and every pain. Let us, then, love God, and be humble; and whatever we do, let us do it, not to please ourselves, but only to please God. O cursed self-love! which intrudes itself in all our works. Even in our spiritual exercises, in meditation, in works of penance, and in all our pious works, it goes about seeking its own interests. Few are the devout souls who do not fall into this defect: Who shall find a valiant woman? Far, and from the uttermost coasts, is the price of her. [1561] Where shall we find a soul so brave that, despoiled of every passion, and of every love for its own interests, goes on to love Jesus Christ in the midst of slights, pains, desolations of spirit, and wearinesses of life? Solomon said that these are gems of great price; they come from the last ends of the world, and therefore are most rare.

O my crucified Jesus! I am one who, even in my devotions, have gone about seeking my own pleasure, and my own satisfaction; all unlike to Thee, who, through love of me, hast passed a life of trouble, deprived of every alleviation. Give me Thy help, that henceforth I may seek only Thy pleasure and Thy glory. I would love Thee without any other reward; but I am weak, Thou must give me the strength to accomplish it. Behold me; I am Thine; dispose of me as it pleases Thee; make me love Thee, and I ask for nothing more, O Mary, my Mother! obtain for me faithfulness to God, through thy intercession.

XXI

HE THAT LOVES JESUS CHRIST OUGHT TO HATE THE WORLD

Whosoever loves Jesus Christ with true love, let him greatly rejoice when he sees himself treated by the world as Jesus Christ was treated, who was hated, scorned, and persecuted by the world, even to an agonizing death upon a shameful cross. The world is all against Jesus Christ; and therefore, hating Jesus Christ, it hates all his servants. Therefore the Lord encouraged his disciples to surfer in peace all the persecutions of the world, saying to them that, having given up the world, they could not but be hated by the world. Ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you. [1562] And as the lovers of God are hateful to the world, thus the world ought to be hateful to him who loves God. St. Paul said, God forbid that I should glory, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me.[1563]

The Apostle was an odious thing to the world, as a man condemned and dead upon a cross is odious; and thus, in return, the world was odious to St. Paul: The world is crucified unto me. Jesus Christ chose to die upon the cross for our sins, for this end, that he might deliver us from this evil world.[1564] Our Lord, having called us to the love of him, desires that we should become superior to the promises and threats of the world. He desires that we should no longer take account of its censures or its praises. We must pray God to make us utterly forget the world, and to make us rejoice when we see the world reject us. It is not enough, in order to belong wholly to God, that we should abandon the world; we must desire that the world should abandon us, and utterly condemn us. Some people leave the world, but they do not cease to wish to be praised by it, at least for having abandoned it; in such persons the desire of worldly estimation causes the world still to live in them. Thus, then, the world hates the servants of God, and therefore it hates their good examples and holy maxims; and therefore it is necessary that we should hate all the maxims of the world. The wisdom of the flesh is an enemy to God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither can it be.[1565] The Apostle says it cannot be, for this reason, that the world has no other object but its own interest or pleasure; and thus it cannot agree with those who seek only to please God.

Yea, O Jesus! who wast crucified, and died for me, Thee alone I desire to please. What is the world, what are riches, wh at are honours? I desire that Thou, my Redeemer, shouldst be all my treasure; to love Thee is my riches. If Thou wilt have me poor, I desire to be poor; if Thou wilt have me humbled and despised by all, I embrace all, and receive it from Thy hands; Thy will shall ever be my comforter. This is the grace that I seek of Thee, that in every event I may not depart a moment from Thy holy will.

THE WORDS OF A DYING MAN TO JESUS CRUCIFIED

Jesus, my Redeemer! who within a few moments wilt be my judge, have mercy upon me before the moment comes when Thou wilt judge me. No, my sins do not terrify me, nor the rigors of Thy judgment, while I see Thee dead upon this cross to save me. Yet, cease not to comfort me in the agony to which I am come: my enemies would terrify me by saying that there is no salvation for me: Many say unto my soul, there is no salvation for him in his God.[1566] But I will never cease to trust in Thy goodness, and say, Thou, O Lord! art my lifter up.[1567] Do Thou comfort me; do Thou make me feel that Thou art my salvation; Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.[1568] Oh, let not all those pangs, those insults endured, that blood poured forth by Thee, be lost unto me. "Thou hast redeemed me, dying upon the cross; let not so great labour be in vain." Especially, I pray Thee, through that bitterness Thou didst feel when Thy blessed soul was separated from Thy most holy body, have mercy upon my soul when it departs from my body. It is true that through my sins I have continually despised Thee; but now I love Thee above everything, I love Thee more than myself; and I grieve with all my heart for all the offences that I have committed against Thee; I detest them, I hate them above every evil.

I see that through the offences I have been guilty of, I have deserved a thousand hells; but the bitter death which Thou hast been willing to endure for me, and the great mercies Thou hast already shown me, make me confidently hope that when I appear before Thee, Thou wilt welcome me with the kiss of peace. Trusting all in Thy goodness, O my God! I abandon myself into Thy loving arms. In Thee, O Lord! I have hoped: I shall not be confounded forever.[1569] Through the sins I have committed, I have again and again deserved hell; but I hope in Thy blood, that Thou hast not pardoned me; and I hope that I shall come to heaven to praise Thy mercies forever: The mercies of God I will sing forever.[1570] I willingly accept all the pains Thou dost destine for me in purgatory: it is just that the fire should purge away the wrongs I have done Thee. O holy prison, when shall I find myself shut up in thee, secure from being able ever to lose my God! O holy fire, when wilt thou purge away my vileness, and make me worthy to enter the kingdom of the blessed! O eternal Father! through the merits of the death of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, make me to die in Thy grace, and in Thy love, that I may come to love Thee throughout eternity. I thank Thee for all the graces Thou hast given me through my life, and especially for the great grace of Thy holy faith, and for having caused me to receive, in these my last days, all the holy sacraments. Thou willest that I should die, and I desire to die to please Thee. It is little, O Jesus, my Saviour! that I should die for Thee, who hast died for me. I am satisfied to say to Thee, with St. Francis, "Let me die for love of Thee, who hast vouchsafed to die for love of me."

I receive death with peace, and also the pains that I must endure so long as I breathe; give me strength to suffer with a perfect conformity to Thy will. I offer them all to Thy glory, uniting them to the pains that Thou didst suffer in Thy Passion. O eternal Father! I sacrifice to Thee my life, and all my being; and I pray Thee to accept this my sacrifice, through the merits of the great sacrifice that Jesus Thy Son offered up of himself upon the cross. O Mother of God, and my Mother Mary! thou hast obtained many graces from God for me during my life; I thank thee with all my heart. Oh, abandon me not in this hour of my death, in which I have greater need of thy prayers. Pray to Jesus for me, and increase thy prayers; obtain for me sorrow for my sins, and more love for God, that I may come to love him forever, in company with Thee, and with all my powers, in heaven. "In thee, O Lady! I have hoped: I shall not be confounded forever." Mary, my hope, in thee I trust.

ACTS OF Devotion FOR THE TIME OF DEATH

It was revealed to St. Lidwina by an angel that the crown of merits and glory that awaited her in heaven could only be completed through the sufferings which she was to endure in the days which would immediately precede her death. The same thing happens to all devout souls when they depart from this world. It is certain that all good acts, and especially those of resignation in accepting death, performed with the view of pleasing God, are of great merit to everyone who dies in the grace of God. Let us here set down certain acts of devotion, which may be very acceptable to the Lord at the time of death.

O my God! I offer Thee my life, and I am prepared to die at any hour that may be pleasing to Thy holy will. "Thy will be done;" ever, ever, may Thy will be done. O Lord! if Thou willest to leave me in life for some time longer, blessed be Thy name; but I desire not life, except to spend it all in loving Thee and giving Thee pleasure. If Thou wilt that I should die of this sickness, still blessed art Thou. I embrace death to do Thy will, and I repeat, "Thy will, Thy will be done;" I only beg Thee to help all through this hour. "Have mercy on me, O God! according to Thy great mercy." If, then, Thou wilt that I should leave this earth, I declare that I desire to die, because thus Thou wilt have it. I desire also to die, in order that, by the pain and bitterness of my death, I may satisfy Thy divine justice for all my sins, through which I have offended Thee and deserved hell. I desire also to die, that I may nevermore offend Thee, or cause Thee displeasure in this life. I also desire to die in acknowledgment of the gratitude which I owe Thee for all the benefits and gifts that Thou hast given me, contrary to all my own deserts. I desire to die, that I may show that I love Thy will more than my life. I desire, if it pleases Thee, to die now, at a time when I trust I am in Thy grace, in order to be assured that I shall praise and bless Thee forever. I desire, above all, to die, in order that I may come to love Thee eternally, and with all my powers, in heaven; where, through Thy blood, O my Redeemer! I hope to come, and to be sure of never ceasing to love Thee through all eternity. O my Jesus! Thou didst accept the death of the cross through love of me; I accept death, and all the pains that await me, through love of Thee. Therefore I say with St. Francis, "May I die, O Lord! through love of Thee, who, through love of me, didst not disdain to die."[1571]

I pray Thee, O my Saviour, my love, and my only good! by Thy holy wounds and Thy bitter death, make me to die in Thy grace, and through Thy blood suffer me not to perish. O sweetest Jesus! suffer me not to be separated from Thee. Lord! drive me not away from Thy face. I confess that, through my sins, I have deserved hell, and I mourn for them more than for any evil; and I hope to come to heaven to praise forever the great mercies Thou hast shown to me. "The mercies of the Lord I shall sing forever." I adore Thee, O my God! who hast created me. I believe in Thee, O Eternal Truth! I hope in Thee, O Infinite Mercy! I love Thee, O Supreme Goodness! I love Thee above everything; I love Thee more than myself, for Thou art worthy of being loved. And because I love Thee, I repent with all my heart for having despised Thy grace. I promise Thee to suffer every kind of death, and a thousand deaths, rather than displease Thee. O Jesus! Son of God, who didst die for me, have pity upon me! My Saviour, save me; and let it be my salvation to praise Thee through eternity. O Mary, Mother of God! pray to Jesus for me; now it is the time for thee to aid me. Mary, Mother of grace, Mother of mercy, do thou defend us from the enemy, and receive us in the hour of de ath. To thy protection we fly, O holy Mother of God! O Mary, holy Mother of God! pray for us sinners. St. Joseph, my patron and father, help me in this hour. St. Michael the Archangel, deliver me from the devils who lie in wait for my soul. O my holy advocates, and ye saints of paradise, pray to God for me. And Thou, my Jesus crucified, at the moment when I must breathe my last breath, receive my soul in Thy arms; to Thee I recommend it; remember that Thou hast redeemed me with Thy blood. "We therefore pray Thee, help Thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood."[1572] O my crucified Jesus! my love and my hope, whether I live or die, I declare that I desire Thee alone, and nothing more. Thou art my God an d my all, and what else can I desire but Thee! "What have I in heaven or upon earth! Thou art the God of my heart and my portion forever."[1573] Thou art the love of my heart; Thou art all my riches! To Thee, then, I recommend my soul; to Thee, who hast redeemed it with Thy death, Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit:[1574] Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth! Trusting in Thy mercy, I therefore say, In Thee, O Lord! have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever. O Mary, thou art my hope; to thee, therefore,

I say again, In thee, O Lady! have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever.[1575]

XXIV

THE HOUSE OF ETERNITY

A man shall go to the house of his eternity.[1576] We err in calling this our habitation in which we now dwell; the habitation of our body in a little while will be a grave, in which it must rest until the day of judgment; and the habitation of the soul will be either paradise or hell, according as it has deserved, and there will it continue through all eternity. At our burial our corpses do not go to the grave of themselves, they are carried thither by others; but the soul goes itself to the place which awaits it, either of eternal joy or eternal woe. A man shall go to the house of his eternity. According as a man lives well or ill, so he departs himself to his habitation, in paradise or in hell, which he shall never change.

Those who live on this earth often change their home, either to please themselves, or because they are compelled. In eternity the habitation is never changed; where we enter the first time, there we abide forever. If the tree fall to the south or to the north, in whatever place it shall fall, there shall it be. He that enters into the south, which is heaven, will be ever happy; he that enters the north, which is hell, will be ever miserable. He, then, who enters heaven, will be always united with God, always in company with the saints, always in the profoundest peace, always abundantly contented; because every blessed soul is filled and satisfied with joy, nor will he ever know the fear of losing it. If fear of losing their happiness could enter among the blessed, they would be no longer blessed; for the mere thought of losing the joy they possess would disturb the peace they enjoy. On the other hand, whoever enters into hell will be forever far from God: he will ever suffer in the fire of the damned. Let us not think that the pains of hell will be like those of earth, where, through the force of habit, a trouble continually grows less; for, as in paradise, the delights never cause weariness, but seem ever new, as though they were for the first time enjoyed (which is implied by the expression of " the new canticle," which the blessed are ever singing); so, in hell, the pains never grow less through all eternity; long custom will never diminish their torment. The miserable beings who are damned will feel the same anguish through eternity that they feel the first moment they experience its pangs.

St. Augustine said that he who believes in eternity and is not converted to God, has either lost his sense or his faith. Woe, cries St. Cæsarius, woe to sinners who enter eternity without knowing it, through having neglected to think upon it! And then he adds, "But, O double woe! they enter it, and they never come forth." It is a double woe, the first of which will be to fall into that abyss of fire; the second, that he who falls into it will never come out: the door of hell opens only to those who enter, not to those who would depart. No; the saints did not do too much when they went to hide themselves in caves and deserts, to eat herbs, and to sleep on the ground, in order to save their souls. "They did not do too much," says St. Bernard, "because, where eternity is in question, no certainty can be too great." When, then, God visits us with any cross of infirmity, poverty, or any evil, let us think of the hell we have deserved, and thus every sorrow will appear light. Let us say, with Job, I have sinned, and truly gone astray, and I have not received in accordance with my deserts.[1577] O Lord, I have offended Thee, and many times betrayed Thee, and I have not been punished as I deserved; how, then, can I lament if Thou sendest me any tribulation? I, who have deserved hell! O my Jesus! send me not to hell, to the hell in which I could no longer love Thee, but must hate Thee forever. Deprive me of everything, of property, health, life; but deprive me not of Thyself. Grant that I may love Thee and praise Thee forever; and then chastise me, and do with me what Thou wilt. O Mother of God! pray to Jesus for me.

SOULS WHO LOVE GOD DESIRE TO GO TO SEE HIM IN HEAVEN

While we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord. [1578] Souls that, in this life, love nothing but God are like noble pilgrims, destined, according to their present state, to be the eternal bride of the King of heaven, but who now live far away without seeing him; wherefore they do nothing but sigh to depart to the country of the blessed, where they know that their Spouse awaits them. They know, indeed, that their Beloved is ever present with them, but that he is, as it were, hidden by a veil, and does not show himself. Or, to speak more correctly, he is like the sun behind clouds, which, from time to time, sends forth some ray of its splendour, but displays not itself openly. These beloved brides have a bandage before their eyes, which prevents them from seeing him whom they love. They live, nevertheless, contented, uniting themselves to the will of the Lord, who chooses to keep them in exile, and far away from himself; but with all this, they cannot but continually sigh to know him face to face, in order to be more inflamed with love towards him.

Therefore, everyone of them often sweetly laments with their beloved Spouse, because he shows himself not; and they say, "O Thou only love of my heart, since Thou hast so loved me, and hast stricken me with Thy holy love, why hidest Thou Thyself, and makest me not to see Thee? I know that Thou art an infinite beauty, I love Thee more than myself, though I have never yet beheld Thee; open to me Thy fair countenance; I would know Thee all revealed, in order that I may no more look to myself nor to any creature, and may think only of loving Thee, my highest good."

When to these souls thus filled with love for God there appears any ray of the divine goodness, and of the love which God bears them, they would be dissolved and fade away for desire of him; and though for them the sun is still hidden behind the clouds, and his fair face is covered by a veil, and their own eyes are bandaged, so that they cannot gaze on him face to face; yet what shall be their joy when the clouds disperse, and the gate opens, and the bandage is taken from their eyes, and the fair countenance of their Beloved appears without a veil, so that in the clear light of day they look upon his beauty, his goodness, his greatness, and the love which he bears to them! O death, why dost thou so delay to come? If thou comest not, I cannot depart to behold my God. It is thou that must open to me the gate, that I may enter into the palace of my Lord. O blessed country, when will the day be here when I shall find myself beneath thy eternal tabernacles? O beloved of my soul, my Jesus, my treasure, my love, my all! when will that happy moment come, when, leaving this earth, I shall see myself all united with Thee? I deserve not this happiness; but the love which Thou hast shown me, and, still more, Thy infinite goodness, make me hope that I shall be one day joined to those happy souls, who, being wholly united with Thee, love Thee, and will love Thee with a perfect love through all eternity. O my Jesus! Thou seest the alternative in which I am placed, of being either ever united with Thee, or ever far from Thee; have mercy upon me; Thy blood is my hope; and thy intercession, O my Mother Mary! is my comfort and my joy.

XXVI

JESUS IS THE GOOD SHEPHERD

Thus spoke he himself: I am the good Shepherd.[1579] The work of a good shepherd is nothing but this, to guide his flock to good pastures, and to guard them from wolves; but what shepherd, O sweet Redeemer! ever had the mercy, like Thee, to give his life to save his flocks, which flocks are we, to deliver them from the punishment they had deserved? He Himself hath borne our sins in His own body on the tree, that, being dead to sin, we should live to justice; by whose stripes we were healed.[1580] To heal us of our sicknesses this good Shepherd took upon himself all our debts, and paid them with his own body, dying with agony upon a cross. It was this excess of love towards us, his sheep, which made St. Ignatius the martyr burn with desire to give his life for Jesus Christ, saying, "My Love is crucified;"[1581] as—he wrote in his letter, saying, "What! has my God been willing to die on a cross for me, and cannot I desire to die for him?" And, in truth, was it a great thing the martyrs did in giving their lives for Jesus Christ, when he died for love of them? Oh, how the death endured for them by Jesus Christ made sweet to them all their torments, stripes, piercing nails, fiery plates of iron, and most tormenting deaths! But the love of this good Shepherd was not satisfied in giving his life for his sheep; he desires, also, after his death, to leave them his body itself, first sacrificed upon the cross, that it might be the food and pasture of their souls.

"The burning love which he bore to us," says John Chrysostom, "induced him to unite himself and make himself one thing with us."[1582] When this good Shepherd sees a sheep lost, what does he not do, what means does he not take, to recover it? and he does not cease to seek it till he finds it. If he lose one of them, he goeth after that which was lost until he finds it. 2 And when he has found it, rejoicingly he places it upon his shoulders, that it may be lost no more; and, calling to him his friends and neighbours, i.e., the angels and saints, he invites them to rejoice with him for having found the sheep that was lost. Who, then, will not love with all his affections this good Lord, who shows himself thus loving to sinners who have turned their backs upon him, and destroyed themselves of their own accord? O my Saviour, worthy of all love, behold at Thy feet a sheep that was lost! I had left Thee, but Thou hast not abandoned me; Thou hast left no means untried to recover me. What would have become of me, if Thou hadst not thought of seeking me? Woe is me! how long a time have I lived far from Thee! Now, through Thy mercy, I trust that I am in Thy grace; and as I first fled from Thee, now I desire nothing but to love Thee, and to live and die embracing Thy feet. But while I live, I am in danger of leaving Thee; oh, bind me, chain me with the bond of Thy holy love, and cease not to seek for me so long as I live on this earth. I have gone astray like a sheep that was lost; oh, seek Thy servant?[1583] O thou advocate of sinners, obtain for me a holy perseverance.

XXVII

THE AFFAIR OF ETERNAL SALVATION

The business of our eternal salvation is for us that affair which is not only the most important, but the only thing that ought to trouble us; because, if this goes wrong, all is lost. One thought upon eternity, well weighed, is enough to make a saint. The great servant of God, F. Vincenzo Carafa, was wont to say that if all men thought with a living faith upon the eternity of another life, the world would become a desert, for no one would attend any more to the affairs of this life. Oh, that all had ever before their eyes the great truth taught us by Jesus Christ! What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?[1584] This truth has taught many a man to leave the world; many noble virgins, and even those of royal blood, to shut themselves up in a cloister; many anchorites to live in deserts, and many martyrs to give their lives for the faith; because they considered that if they lost their souls, all the good things of the world would profit them nothing in the eternal state. Therefore the Apostle wrote to his disciples: We entreat you, brethren, that ye attend to your own business.[1585] And of what business did St. Paul speak? He spoke of that business which, if it fail, implies that we lose the eternal kingdom of Paradise, and are cast into an abyss of torments that never end. It is an affair of eternal punishments, and of the loss of the heavenly kingdom, says St. John Chrysostom.[1586]

St. Philip Neri, therefore, had good reason for calling all those persons mad who bestow pains in this life for gaining riches and honours, and give little heed to the salvation of the soul. "All such," said the venerable John Avila, "deserve to be shut up in an asylum for lunatics." How can this be? This great servant of God meant to say, "You believe that there is an eternity of joys for those who love God, and an eternity of pains for those who offend him; and do you offend him?" Every loss of property, of reputation, of relatives, of health, can be repaired in this life, at least by a good death, and by the acquisition of eternal life, as it happened to the holy martyrs; but for what good things of the world, with fortune even the greatest, can be given the loss of the soul? What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?[1587] He that dies in the wrath of God, and loses his soul, loses with this every hope of repairing his ruin. To the wicked, when he is dead, there is no hope more?[1588] O God! if the doctrine of eternal life were but a simple, doubtful opinion of divines, we ought surely to give all our care for gaining a happy eternity, and avoiding a miserable one. But no; it is not a doubtful thing; it is certain, it is of faith, that we must come to one or the other. But what do we see? Every one who has faith, and thinks upon this truth, says, "So it is we must attend to the salvation of the soul;" but few are they who truly give heed to it. They devote themselves with all their energies to win this cause, or to obtain this situation, but lay aside the care of eternal salvation. "Truly, it is the greatest of errors to neglect the business of eternal salvation,"[1589] said St. Eucherius; it is an error that exceeds all others; for to lose the soul is a mistake without a remedy.

Oh, that they would be wise, and would understand, and consider the last things! Miserable are those learned men who labour at many things, and know not how to take forethought for their souls, that they may obtain a favourable sentence in the day of judgment! O my Redeemer! Thou hast given Thy blood to purchase my soul, and I have so often lost it, and given it to destruction! I give Thee thanks that Thou hast given me time to recover it, by recovering Thy grace. O my God! would that I had died before I had offended Thee! It comforts me to know that Thou knowest not how to despise a heart that humbles itself and repents of its sins. O Mary, refuge of sinners! help me a sinner, who recommends himself to thee, and trusts in thee.

XXVIII

WHAT WILL BE THE JOY OF THE BLESSED

"Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord"[1590] When the soul enters the kingdom of the blessed, and the barrier which hinders its sight is taken away, it will see openly and without a veil the infinite beauty of God; and this will be the joy of the blessed. Every object that the soul then will see in God himself will overwhelm it with delight; it will see the rectitude of his judgments, the harmony of his regulations for every soul, all ordained to his divine glory, and its own good. The soul will especially perceive, in respect to itself, the boundless love which God has entertained towards it in becoming man, and sacrificing his life upon the cross through love of it. Then will it know what an excess of goodness is comprehended in the mystery of the cross, in the sight of a God become a servant, and dying condemned upon an infamous tree; and in the mystery of the Eucharist, in the sight of a God beneath the species of bread, and made the food of his creatures.

In particular the soul will perceive all the graces and favours shown to it, which, until then, had been hidden. It will see all the mercies he has bestowed on it, in waiting for it, and pardoning its ingratitude. It will see the many calls, and lights, and aids that have been granted to it in abundance. It will see that these tribulations, these infirmities, these losses of property or of kindred, which it counted punishments, were not really punishments, but loving arrangements of God for drawing it to the perfect love for him. In a word, all these things will make the soul know the infinite goodness of its God, and the boundless love which he deserves; whence, so soon as it has reached heaven, it will have no other desire but to behold him in his blessedness and content; and, at the same time, comprehending that the happiness of God is supreme, infinite, and eternal, it will experience a joy that is only not infinite because a creature is not capable of anything that is infinite. It will enjoy, nevertheless, a pleasure that is extreme and full, which fills it with delight, and with that kind of delight that belongs to God himself; and thus will be fulfilled in it the words, Enter thou into the joy of Thy Lord.[1591] The blessed are not so much blessed through the delight which they experience in themselves as in the joy with which God rejoices; for the blessed love God so infinitely more than themselves that the blessedness of God delights them infinitely more than their own blessedness, through the love which they bear to him; which love makes them forget themselves, and all their delight is to please their Beloved.

And this is that holy and loving inebriation which causes the blessed to lose the memory of themselves, to give themselves wholly to praise and love the dear object of all their love, which is God. They shall be inebriated with the fullness of Thy house.[1592] Happy from their first entrance into heaven, they continue, as it were, lost, and, so to say, swallowed up in love, in that boundless ocean of the goodness of God. Wherefore every blessed soul will lose all its desires, and will have no other desire but to love God, and to beloved by him; and knowing that it is sure of ever loving him, and of being ever loved by him, this very thing will be its blessedness, which will fill it with joy, and will make it throughout eternity so satisfied with delight that it will desire nothing more. In a word, it will be the paradise of the blessed, to rejoice in the joy of God. And thus, he who in this life rejoices in the blessedness that God enjoys, and will enjoy through eternity, can say that even in this life he enters into the joy of God, and begins to enjoy Paradise. Yet, O my sweet Saviour, and the love of my soul! in this vale of tears I still see myself surro unded by enemies, who would separate me from Thee. O my beloved Lord! suffer me not to perish; make me ever love Thee in this life and in the next life, and then do with me what Thou wilt. O Queen of Paradise! if thou prayest for me, assuredly I shall be with thee eternally, to be in thy company, and to praise thee in Paradise.

XXIX

THE PAIN OF HAVING LOST GOD WILL BE THAT WHICH CONSTITUTES HELL

The weight of punishment must correspond to the weight of the sin. Mortal sin is defined by theologians in a single phrase, "a turning away from God;"[1593] and in this consists the wickedness of mortal sin; it consists in despising the divine grace, and in being willing, of one's own accord, to lose God, who is the greatest good; wherefore justly the greatest punishment of sinners in hell is the punishment of having lost God. The other pains of hell are terrible: the fire which devours; the gloom which darkens; the cries of the damned which deafen; the stench, which would be enough to cause those miserable beings to die, if die they could; the closeness which oppresses and hinders their breath; but these pains are nothing in comparison with the loss of God. In hell the reprobate wail eternally; and the bitterest subject of their wailing is the thought that, through their own fault, they have lost God. O God! what a blessing will they have lost! In this life of present objects, passions, temporal occupations, sensible pleasures and adverse events hinder us from contemplating the infinite beauty and goodness of God; but when the soul has departed from the prison-house of the body, it does not instantly behold God as he is; for, if it saw him, it would be instantly blessed; but it knows that God is an infinite good, and worthy of infinite love; whence the soul, which is created to see and love this God, would instantly go to unite itself to God; but if it were in sin, it would find an impenetrable wall (which is sin), that would forever close up the path which leads to God. O Lord! I thank Thee that this life is not yet closed to me, as I have deserved. I still can come to Thee; cast me not away from Thy face!

The soul that is created to love its Creator, by natural love cannot find itself impelled to love its ultimate end, which is God; in this life, the darkness of sin, and earthly affections, lull to sleep this inclination which it has to unite itself to God, and therefore it is not greatly afflicted at being separated; but when it leaves the body, and is delivered from the senses, then it comprehends with a clear knowledge that God only can give it content. Hence, so soon as it is separated from the body, immediately it flees to embrace its greatest good; but finding itself in sin, it perceives that, as an enemy, it is driven from God, But though driven away, it will not cease to feel itself ever drawn to unite itself to God; and this will be its hell, to find itself ever drawn towards God, and ever driven away from God. But it would be said that the miserable soul, if it has lost God, and can no more see him, can at least comfort itself in loving him. But this is not so; for being abandoned by grace, and made a slave to sin, its will is perverted; so that, on one side, it finds itself ever drawn to love God, and, on the other, compelled to hate him. Thus, at the same time that it knows that God is worthy of infinite love and praise, it hates him and curses him. Yet perhaps it might, at least in this prison of torments resign itself to the divine will, as holy souls do in purgatory, and bless the hand of this God that justly punishes it. But no; it cannot resign itself, because, to do this, it must be assisted by grace, while grace (as has been said) has abandoned it; whence it cannot unite its will to that of God, because its own will is altogether contrary to the divine will.

Whence it also comes that the wretched soul turns all its hatred upon itself, and thus will live forever, torn by contrary desires. It would fain live, it would fain die. On one part, it would live, in order to hate God, who is the object of its greatest hatred; on the other, it would die, that it might not feel the pain it experiences of having lost him, while it perceives that it cannot die. Thus it will live forever in one continual mortal agony. Let us pray God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to deliver us from hell; and especially he ought to pray thus, who, at any time in his life, has lost God through any grievous sin.

O Lord! (let him say) save me, and therefore bind me ever to Thee with Thy holy love; redouble these holy and sweet chains of salvation, which may ever bind me the more to Thee, Miserable that I am, I have despised Thy grace, and deserved to be forever separated from Thee, my greatest good, and to hate Thee forever. I thank Thee for having borne with me when I was at enmity with Thee; what would have become of me, had I then died? But now that Thou hast lengthened my life, grant that it may not be that I may still more displease Thee, but only to love Thee, and to mourn for the offences I have committed against Thee. O my Jesus! from this day forth Thou shalt be my only love, and my only fear will be to offend Thee, and to separate myself from Thee. But if Thou aidest me not, I can do nothing; I hope in Thy blood, that Thou wilt give me help to be all Thine own, O my Redeemer, my love, my all! O Mary, thou great advocate of sinners, help a sinner who recommends himself to thee, and trusts in thee. If we would be assured of not losing God, let us give ourselves indeed wholly to God. He that does not give himself wholly to God is ever in danger of turning his back upon him, and of losing him; but a soul which resolutely separates itself from everything, and gives itself all to God will no more lose him; because God himself will not allow that a soul that has heartily given itself all unto him should turn its back upon him and perish. Wherefore a great servant of God was wont to say that when we read of the fall of any who had before given tokens of living a holy life, we must consider that such persons had not given themselves all to God.

XXX

CONTEMPT FOR THE WORLD

The thought of the vanity of the world, and that all things that the world values are but falsehood and deceit, has made many souls resolve to give themselves wholly to God. What does it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?[1594] How many young persons has this great maxim of the Gospel brought to leave relatives, country, possessions, honours, and even crowns, to go to shut themselves up in a cloister or desert, there to think of God alone! The day of death is called the day of loss: The day of loss is at hand.[1595] It is a day of loss, because all the goods that we have gained on earth must be left, on the day of our death. Wherefore St. Ambrose wisely says that we falsely call these good things our good things, because we cannot carry them with us into the other world, where we must dwell forever. It is our holy deeds alone that accompany us, and they alone will comfort us in eternity.[1596] All earthly fortunes, the highest dignities, gold, silver, the most precious jewels, when contemplated from the bed of death, lose their splendour; the dark shadow of death obscures even sceptres and crowns, and makes us see that whatever the world values is but smoke, dust, vanity, and misery. And, in truth, at the time of death, what profit is there in all the riches acquired by the dying person, if nothing belongs to him after death, except a box of wood, in which he is placed to grow corrupt? For what will vaunted beauty of body serve, when there remains of it only a little polluted dust and four fleshless limbs?

What is the life of man upon earth? Behold it, as described by St. James: What is your life? It is a smoke which appear eth for a little while; and then will pass away.[1597] Today this great man is esteemed, feared, praised; tomorrow he is despised, contemned, and abused. I saw the wicked lifted on high; I went by, and behold he was gone.[1598] He is no longer to be found in this his beloved house, in this great palace which he built; and where is he? he is become dust in the grave! A false balance is in his hand.[1599] In these words the Holy Spirit advises us not to be deceived by the world, because the world weighs its goods in a false balance; we ought to weigh them in the true balance of faith, which will show us what are the true goods of which it can never be said that they speedily finish. St. Teresa said we should not take account of anything that ends with death. O God! what greatness ever remained to these so many first ministers of state, commanders of armies, princes, Roman emperors, now that the scene is changed, and they find themselves in eternity! Their memory has perished with a sound.[1600] They made a great figure in the world, and their names resounded among all; but when they were dead, for them was changed rank, name, and everything. It is useful here to notice an inscription placed over a certain cemetery in which many gentlemen and ladies are buried: "See where end all greatness, all earthly pomp, all beauty. Worms, dust, a worthless stone, a little sand, close the brief scene at the end of all."

The form of this world passeth away.[1601] Our life is but a scene that passes away and speedily ends; and it must end for all, whether nobles or commoners, kings or subjects, rich or poor. Happy he who, in this scene, has played his part well before God. Philip III., King of Spain, died a young man, at the age of forty-two years; and before he died he said to those who stood by, "When I am dead proclaim the spectacle that you now see; proclaim that, in death, to have been a king, serves only to make one feel the pain of having reigned." And then he ended with a sigh, saying, "Oh that during this time I had been in a desert, becoming a saint, that now I might appear with more confidence before the tribunal of Jesus Christ!" We know the change of life of St. Francis Borgia at the sight of the corpse of the Empress Isabella, who, in life, was most beautiful, but, after death, struck horror into all who saw her. Borgia, when he saw her, exclaimed, "Thus, then, end the good things of this world!" and he gave himself wholly to God. Oh that we could all imitate him before death comes upon us! But let us haste, because death runs towards us, and we know not when it will arrive. Let us not so act that the light that God will then give us will cause nothing but remorse, when we hold in our hands the candle of death. Let us resolve to do now what we shall then wish to have done, and shall not be able to do. No, my God, it is enough that Thou hast hitherto borne with me; I do not wish that Thou shouldst wait longer to see me give myself wholly to Thee. Thou hast called me many times to have done with this world, and to give myself all to Thy love. Now Thou turnest to me to call unto Thee; behold me, receive me into Thy arms, while at this moment I abandon myself wholly to Thee. O Spotless Lamb, who at Calvary was sacrificed on a cross for me, wash me first with Thy blood, and pardon all the injuries that Thou hast received from me; and then inflame me with Thy holy love. I love Thee above everything; I love Thee with all my heart. And what object can I find in the world more worthy of love than Thou art, and which has loved me more? O Mary, Mother of God, and my advocate! pray for me; obtain for me a true and lasting change of life. In thee I trust.

XXXI

LOVE OF SOLITUDE

God does not allow himself to be found in the tumult of the world; therefore the saints have been wont to seek him in the most rugged deserts, in the most hidden caves, in order that they might converse with God alone. St. Hilarion made trial of several deserts, going from one to another, ever seeking the most solitary, where no man could communicate with him; and, in the end, he died in a desert in Cyprus, after having lived there for five years. St. Bruno, when he was called by the Lord to leave the world, went, with his companions, who wished to follow him, to find St. Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble, that he might assign them some desert place in his diocese. St. Hugh assigned them the Certosa, which, from its wildness, was more fitted to be a covert for wild beasts than a habitation for men; and there they went with joy to dwell, placing themselves each in so many little huts, each distant from the rest. The Lord said once to St. Teresa, "I would willingly speak to many souls, but the world makes so much noise in their hearts that they cannot hear my voice." God does not speak to us in the midst of the rumours and affairs of the world, knowing that if he were to speak he would not be understood. The words of God are his holy inspirations, his lights and calls, through which the saints are enlightened and inflamed with divine love; but they who do not love solitude will be unable to hear these voices of God.

God himself says, I will lead her into solitude and speak to her heart. When God desires to raise any soul to a high degree of perfection, he inspires it to retire to some solitary place, far from the converse of creatures, and there he speaks to the ears, not of the body, but of the heart; and thus he enlightens and inflames it with his divine love. St. Bernard[1602] said that he had learned much more of the love of God, in the midst of the oaks and beeches of the forest, than from books and from the servants of God. Therefore St. Jerome left the pleasures of Rome, and shut himself up in the cave of Bethlehem, and then exclaimed, "O solitude, in which God speaks and communes familiarly with his people!"[1603] In solitude God converses familiarly with his beloved souls, and there he makes them hear those words that melt their hearts with holy love, as the sacred Spouse said, My heart melted when my Beloved spoke.[1604] We see by experience that conversing with the world, and occupying ourselves in the acquisition of earthly goods, make us forget God; but in the hour of death what do we find from all the toils and time we have spent upon things of the earth, except pains and remorse of conscience? In death we only find comfort from that little which we have done and suffered for God. Why, then, do we not separate ourselves from the world, before death separates it from us?

He shall sit solitary, and hold his peace, because he hath taken it upon himself.[1605] The solitary is not moved as he was formerly in worldly affairs; he will sit in repose; and he will hold his peace, and will not call for sensual delights to satisfy him, for he is lifted up above himself, and above all created things; in God he will find every good, and all his content. Who will give me the wings of a dove, that I may fly away, and be at rest?[1606] David desired to have the wings of a dove, that he might leave this earth, and not touch it even with his feet, and thus give rest to his soul. But while we are in this life, it is not given to us to leave this earth. We must, however, take care to love retirement, so far as it is practicable, conversing alone with God; and thus gaining strength for avoiding those defects that arise from our being obliged to have intercourse with the world; as David said, at the very time he was ruling his kingdom, Behold, I have fled far away, and abode in the wilderness.[1607] Oh that I had ever thought upon Thee, O God of my soul, and not of the goods of this world! I curse those days in which I went about seeking earthly pleasures, and offended Thee, my greatest good. Oh that I had ever loved Thee! Oh that I had died, and not caused Thee displeasure! Miserable that I am, death draws near, while I find myself still attached to the world! No, my Jesus, from this day I resolve to leave all, and to be wholly Thine. Thou art almighty; Thou must give me strength to be faithful to Thee. O thou Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me!

XXXII

THE SOLITUDE OF HEART

St. Gregory wrote, "What does the solitude of the body profit if the solitude of the heart is not there?"[1608] In the preceding chapter we have seen how much solitude assists towards a recollectedness of mind; but St. Gregory says that it profits us little or nothing to be with the body in a solitary place, while the heart is full of worldly thoughts and affections. That a soul may be wholly given to God, two things are necessary: the first is, to detach ourselves from the love of every created thing; the second is, to consecrate all our love to God; and this is implied in true solitude of the heart. We must, then, in the first place, detach our heart from every earthly affection. St. Francis de Sales said: "If I knew that I had a single fibre in my heart which was not given to God, I would instantly pluck it out." If we do not purify and strip the heart of everything earthly, the love of God cannot enter in and possess it all. God would reign with his love in our heart, but he would reign there alone; he will have no companions to rob him of a portion of that affection which he justly claims to have all his own. Some souls lament that, in all their devout exercises, in meditations, Communions, spiritual readings, visits to the blessed Sacrament, they do not find God, and know not what means to apply themselves to in order to find him. To these St. Teresa suggests the right means when she says, "Detach thy heart from all created things, and seek God, and thou shalt find him."

Many persons, in order to separate themselves from creatures, and to converse with God alone, cannot go to live in deserts, as they would wish; but we must remember that deserts and caves are not necessary in order to enjoy the solitude of the heart. Those who, from necessity, are obliged to converse with the world, whenever their hearts are free from worldly attachments, even in the public streets, in places of resort, and public assemblies, can possess a solitude of heart, and continue united with God. All those occupations which we undertake in order to fulfil the divine will have no power to prevent the solitude of the heart. St. Catharine of Sienna truly found God in the midst of the household labours in which her parents kept her employed in order to draw her from devotional exercises; but in the midst of these affairs she preserved a retirement in her heart, which she called her cell, and there ceased not to converse alone with God. "Be still, and see that I am God."[1609] In order to possess that divine light which enables us to know the goodness of God, the knowledge of which draws to itself all the affections of our heart, we must be empty, and separate from us the earthly attachments that hinder us from knowing God. As a crystal vase, when it is filled with sand, cannot receive the light of the sun, so a heart which is attached to riches, worldly honours, or sensual pleasures cannot receive the divine light; and, not knowing God, it does not love him. In every condition in which a man is placed by God, in order that creatures may not draw him from God, it is necessary that he give attention to perform his duties according to the pleasure of God, and then in everything else let him act as if there were no other beings in existence except himself and God. We must detach ourselves from everything, and especially from ourselves, by continually thwarting our self-love. For example, a certain thing pleases us; we must leave it for the very reason that it pleases us. A certain person has injured us; we must do him good for this very reason. In a word, we must desire and not desire, exactly as God desires or does not desire, without inclination to any one thing; because we do not know that what we ourselves wish is the will of God.

Oh, how easily is God found by everyone who detaches himself from creatures in order to find him! The Lord is good to the soul that seeks Him.[1610] St. Francis de Sales wrote, "The pure love of God consumes everything that is not God, in order to convert everything into itself." We must, therefore, offer ourselves as an enclosed garden, as the holy spouse in the Canticles is called by God, My sister, my spouse, is an enclosed garden.[1611] The soul that keeps its door shut against earthly affections is called an enclosed garden. It is God who has given us everything that we have, and it is right that he should require of us all our love. When, then, any creature would enter and take up a portion of our love, we must altogether deny it an entrance, and, turning to our greatest good, we must say, with all our heart, " What have I in heaven, and what have I desired upon earth, but Thee, O God of my heart, and my portion forever?" "O my God! what but Thyself can satisfy my soul? No; except Thee I desire nothing either in heaven or on earth; Thou alone art sufficient for me, O God of my heart, and my portion forever!" Oh! happy is he who can say, "I have despised the kingdom of the world, and all the glory of the time, for the love of my Lord Jesus Christ."[1612] Truly, that great servant of God, Sister Margaret of the Cross, the daughter of the Emperor Maximilian II , could say this, when, at her profession, she stripped herself of her rich garments and gems, to clothe herself in the poor woollen habit of the Barefooted Nuns of the Strict Rule of St. Clare; and when, as the author of her life relates, she cast them away with a contempt that moved to tears of devotion all who were present at the function.

O my Jesus! for myself I do not desire that creatures should have any part in my heart; Thou must be my only Lord, by possessing it altogether. Let others seek the delights and grandeurs of this life; Thou alone, both in the present and future life, must be my only portion, my only good, my only love. And, as Thou lovest me, as I see by all the signs Thou givest me, help me to detach myself from everything that can draw me from Thy love. Grant that my soul may be all taken up with pleasing Thee, as the only object of all my affections. Take possession of all my heart; I would be no longer my own. Do Thou rule me, and make me ready to follow out all Thy will. O Mary, Mother of God! in thee I trust; thy prayers can make me belong wholly to Jesus.

XXXIII

THE SIGHT AND LOVE OF GOD IN THE NEXT LIFE WILL CONSTITUTE THE JOY OF THE BLESSED

Let us see what it will be which in heaven will make those holy citizens completely happy. The soul in heaven when it sees God face to face, and knows his infinite beauty, and all his perfections that render him worthy of infinite love, cannot but love him with all its powers, and it loves him far more than itself; it even, as it were, forgets itself, and desires nothing but to behold him satisfied and loved who is its God; and seeing that God, who is the only object of all its affections, enjoys an infinite delight, this joy of God constitutes all its paradise. If it were capable of anything that is infinite, in seeing that its Beloved is infinitely content, its own joy thereupon would be also infinite; but, as a creature is not capable of infinite joy, it rests at least satisfied with joy to such an extent that it desires nothing more; and this is that satisfaction that David sighed for, when he said, I shall be satisfied when Thy glory shall appear.[1613] Thus also is fulfilled what God says to the soul when he admits it into paradise, Enter into the joy of thy Lord.[1614] He does not bid joy enter into the soul, because this his joy, being infinite, cannot be contained in the creature; but he bids the soul enter into his joy, that it may receive a portion of it, and such a portion as will satisfy it, and fill it with delight. Therefore, I am of opinion that in meditation, among all acts of love towards God, there is none more perfect than the taking delight in the infinite joy of God. This is certainly the continual exercise of the blessed in heaven; so that he who often rejoices in the joy of God begins in this life to do that which he hopes to do in heaven through all eternity.

The love with which the saints in paradise burn towards God is such that if ever a fear of losing it were to enter their thoughts, or they were to think that they should not love him with all their powers, as now they love him, this fear would cause them to experience the pains of hell. But it is not so; for they are as sure, as they are sure of God, that they will ever love him with all their powers, and that they will be ever loved by God, and this mutual love will never change throughout eternity. O my God! make me worthy of this, through the merits of Jesus Christ. This happiness, which constitutes paradise, will be further increased by the splendour of that delightful city of God, the beauty of its inhabitants, and by their companionship, especially by that of the Queen of all, Mary, who will appear fairer than all, and by that of Jesus Christ, whose beauty again will infinitely surpass that of Mary.

The joy of the blessed will be increased by the dangers of losing so great a good, which they have all passed through in this life. What, then, will be the thanksgivings that they offer to God, when, through their own sins, they have deserved hell, and now find themselves there on high, whence they will see so many condemned to hell for less guilt than their own, while they are saved, and sure of not losing God, being destined to enjoy eternally those boundless delights in heaven, of which they will never grow weary. In this life, however great and continual be our joys, with time they always weary us; but for the delights of paradise, the more they are enjoyed, the more they are desired; and thus the blessed are ever satisfied and filled with these delights, and ever desire them: they ever desire them, and ever obtain them. Wherefore that sweet song with which the saints praise God and thank him for the happiness he has given them, is called a new song: Sing to the Lord a new song.[1615] It is called new, because the rejoicings of heaven seem ever new, as though they were experienced for the first time; and thus they ever rejoice in them, and ever ask for them; and, as they ever ask for them, they ever obtain them. Thus, as the damned are called "vessels of wrath,"[1616] the blessed are called " vessels of divine love."[1617] Justly, then, does St. Augustine[1618] say that to obtain this eternal blessedness there is needed a boundless labour.

Hence, it was little that the anchorites did with their penitential works and prayers to gain Paradise; it was little for the saints to leave their riches and kingdoms to gain it; little that the martyrs suffered from instruments of torture, and burning irons, and cruel deaths. Let us, at any rate, give heed to suffer joyfully the crosses that God sends us, because they all, if we are saved, will become for us eternal joys. When infirmities, pains, or any adversities afflict us, let us lift up our eyes to heaven and say, "One day all these pains will have an end, and after them I hope to enjoy God forever." Let us take courage to suffer, and to despise the things of the world. Blessed is he who in death can say with St. Agatha, "O Lord, who hast taken from me the love of the world, receive my soul."[1619] Let us endure everything, let us despise everything that is created; it is Jesus who awaits us, and stands with the crown in his hands to make us kings in heaven, if we be faithful to him. But how can I, O my Jesus! aspire to so great a good,—I, who have so often, through the miserable desires of earth, renounced Paradise before Thee, and trodden under foot Thy grace? Yet Th y blood gives me courage to hope for Paradise, though I have so often deserved hell, because Thou hast died upon the cross, in order to bestow Paradise upon those who have not deserved it. O my God and Redeemer! I would no more lose Thee; give me help to be faithful to Thee; Thy kingdom come; through the merits of Thy blood grant me one day to enter Thy kingdom; and, in the meanwhile, until death comes, enable me perfectly to fulfil Thy will, which is the greatest good, and is that Paradise which can be possessed upon earth by him who loves Thee. Therefore, O ye souls who love God! while we live in this vale of tears, let us ever sigh for Paradise, and say, "O fair country, wherein love bestows itself upon love, I sigh for Thee hour by hour, when, O my God, when will it be here?"

XXXIV

Meditation BEFORE THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT OF THE ALTAR

Meditation, wherever it is made, pleases God; but it appears that Jesus Christ especially delights in the meditation that is made before the Most Holy Sacrament, since it appears that there he bestows light and grace most abundantly upon those who visit him. He has left himself in this Sacrament, not only to be the food of souls which receive him in Holy Communion, but also to be found at all times by every one who seeks him. Devout pilgrims go to the holy house of Loretto where Jesus Christ dwelt during his life, and to Jerusalem, where he died on the cross; but how much greater ought to be our devotion when we find him before us in a tabernacle, where this Lord himself now dwells in person, who lived among us, and died for us on Calvary! It is not permitted in the world for persons of all ranks to speak alone with kings; but with Jesus Christ, the King of heaven, both nobles and plebeians, rich and poor, can converse at their will in this Sacrament, and employ themselves as long as they will in setting before him their wants, and in seeking his graces; and there Jesus gives audience to all, hears all, and comforts them. Men of the world, who know no treasures but those of the earth, cannot comprehend what pleasure can be found in spending a long time before an altar, where is placed a consecrated Host; but to souls which love God, hours and days passed before the Blessed Sacrament seem as moments, for the celestial sweetness which the Lord there gives them to taste and to enjoy.

But how can worldly people expect to enjoy this sweetness if they keep their hearts and thoughts full of the earth? St. Francis Borgia said that in order that divine love may rule in our hearts, we must first drive the world away from them; otherwise, divine love will never enter into them, because it finds no place to rest. Be still, and see that I am God.[1620] said David. In order to have experience of God, and to prove how sweet he is to them that love him, our hearts must be empty, that is, detached from earthly affections. Wouldst Thou find God? "Detach thyself from creatures, and thou shalt find him," said St. Teresa. What should a soul do when in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament? It should love and pray. It should not stand there in order to experience sweetness and consolation, but only to give pleasure to God, by making acts of love, by giving itself wholly to God without reserve, by stripping itself of its own will, and offering it self in saying, "O my God, I love Thee, and desire nothing but Thee; grant that I may ever love Thee, and then do with me and with all that I possess according to Thy pleasure." Among all acts of love, that is most pleasing to God which the blessed continually exercise in heaven, that is to say, the rejoicing in the infinite joy of God; for the blessed soul loves God infinitely more than itself, and therefore desires the happiness of her Beloved far more than her own; and seeing that God enjoys an infinite joy, the blessed soul would thence receive an infinite delight; but as a creature is not capable of an infinite delight, it rests full of satisfaction, and thus the joy of God constitutes its joy and its Paradise. These acts of love, even when made by us without any sensible sweetness, please God greatly. He also does not give to souls whom he loves a perpetual enjoyment of. his comfort in this life, but only at intervals; and when he gives them, he gives them not so much as a reward for good works (the full reward of which he reserves for them in heaven), as to give them more strength to suffer with patience the troubles and adversities of this present life, and especially the distractions and dryness of spirit which pious souls experience in meditation.

So far as distractions are concerned, of these we must not make much account, it is enough to drive them away when they come. For the rest, even the saints suffered involuntary distractions. But they did not on this account leave off meditation; and so also must we do ourselves. St. Francis de Sales said that if in meditation we did nothing but drive away, or seek to drive away, distractions, our meditation would be of great profit. As for dryness of spirit, the greatest pain of souls in meditation is to find themselves sometimes without a feeling of devotion, weary of it, and without any sensible desire of loving God; and with this is often joined the fear of being in the wrath of God through their sins, on account of which the Lord has abandoned them; and being in this gloomy darkness, they know not any way of escaping from it, it seeming to them that every way is closed against them. Let the devout soul, then, continue strong in not leaving off meditation, as the devil will suggest to it. At such a time let it unite its desolation to that which Jesus Christ suffered upon the cross; and if it can only say this, it is enough to say it, at least with the intention of the will, "My God, I would love Thee, I would be wholly thine. Have pity on me; oh, leave me not!" Let it say, also, as a holy soul said to its God, in a time of desolation, "I love Thee, though I seem to myself an enemy in Thy sight: drive me away as Thou wilt; I will ever follow after Thee,"

XXXV

IN GOD ALONE IS FOUND TRUE PEACE

He that seeks peace in creatures will never find it, because no creatures are fitted for giving satisfaction to the heart. God has created man for himself, who is an infinite good; wherefore God alone can content him. Hence it comes that many persons, though loaded with riches, honours, and earthly pleasures, are never satisfied; they are ever seeking for more honours, more possessions, more amusements; and, however many they obtain, they are always restless, and never enjoy a day of true peace. Delight thou in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desire of thy heart.[1621] When any person delights only in God, and seeks nothing but God, God himself will take care to satisfy all the desires of his heart; and then he will attain the happy state of those souls who desire nothing but to please God. Senseless are they who say, " Happy is he who can employ himself as he likes, who can command others, who can take what pleasures he pleases." It is madness; he alone is happy who loves God, who says that God alone is sufficient for him. Experience, shows clearly that multitudes of persons who are called fortunate by men of the world, because they are raised up to the possession of great riches and great dignities, live a miserable life, and never find rest. But how is this, that so many rich and titled people, and princes, in the midst of the abundance of the goods of the world, do not find peace? And, on the other hand, how is it that so many good religious, who live retired in a cell, poor and hidden, pass their days so happily?

How is it that so many solitaries, living in a desert or within a cave, suffering hunger and cold, yet rejoice with gladness? It is because they wait only on God, and God comforts them. The peace of God surpasseth all understanding.[1622] Oh, how the peace which the Lord gives to those who love him exceeds all the delights which the world can give. Oh, taste and see how sweet the Lord is.[1623] O men of the world! cries the prophet, why will ye despise the life of the saints without having ever known it? Try it, for once; leave the world, leave it, and give yourself to God, and you will see how well he knows how to comfort you more than all the greatnesses and delights of this world. It is true that even the saints suffer great troubles in this life; but they, resigning themselves to the will of God, never lose their peace The lovers of the world seem now at times joyful, at times sad, but, in truth, they are ever restless and in a state of storms. On the other hand, the lovers of God are superior to all adversity and to the changes of this world, and therefore they live in uniform tranquillity. See how the celebrated Cardinal Petrucci describes a soul that is wholly given to God: "It beholds all creatures around change into a thousand various forms, while within, the depths of its heart, ever united with God, continue without change." But he who would live ever united with God, and would enjoy a continual peace, must drive from his heart everything that is not God, and live as if he were dead to earthly affections O my God! give me strength to separate myself from all the snares that draw me to the world. Grant that I may think of nothing but to please Thee. Happy are they for whom God alone is sufficient! O Lord! give me grace that I may seek nothing but Thee, and ask for nothing but to love Thee and give Thee pleasure. For love of Thee I now renounce all earthly pleasures, I renounce also all spiritual consolations; I desire nothing but to do Thy will, and to give Thee pleasure. O Mother of God! recommend me to thy Son, who denies thee nothing.

XXXVI

WE OUGHT TO HAVE GOD ALONE AS THE END OF OUR ACTIONS

In all our actions we should have no other end in view than to please God; not to please our relatives, friends, great people, or ourselves, because everything that is not done for the sake of God is lost. Many things are done for the sake of pleasure, or in order not to displease men; but, says St. Paul, If I yet please men, I should not be the servant of God.[1624] God only must be regarded in everything we do, so that we may say, as Jesus Christ said, I do always the things that please him.[1625] It is God who has given us everything we have; we have nothing of our own, except nothingness and sin. It is God alone who has truly loved us. He has loved us from eternity, and he has loved us so far as to give himself for us upon the cross and in the Sacrament of the altar: God alone, therefore, deserves all our love. Unhappy is the soul that looks with affection upon any object upon earth which displeases God. It will never know peace in this life, and it is in imminent peril of never enjoying peace in the next. But happy is he, O my God! who seeks Thee alone, and renounces everything for Thy love. He will find that pearl of Thy pure love a joy more precious than all the treasures and kingdoms of the earth. He that does this obtains the true liberty of the sons of God, for he finds himself freed from all the bonds that bind him to earth, and hinder him from uniting himself to God.

O my God and my all! I would rather have Thee than all the riches, honours, knowledge, glory, expectations, and gifts that Thou couldst give me. Thou art all my good. Thee alone I desire, and nothing more; for Thou alone art infinitely beautiful, infinitely kind, infinitely worthy of love, in a word, Thou art the only thing that is good. Wherefore every gift that is not Thyself is not enough for me. I repeat, and I will ever repeat it, Thee alone I wish for, and nothing more; and whatever is less than Thee, I say it again, is not sufficient for me. Oh, when will it be given me to occupy myself wholly in praising Thee, loving Thee, and pleasing Thee, so that I shall no more think of the creature, nor even of myself? O my Lord and my love! help me when Thou seest me growing cold in Thy love, in danger of giving my affection to creatures and to earthly goods; Stretch forth Thy hand from on high, seize me, and deliver me from many waters.[1626] Deliver me from the danger of going far away from Thee. Let others seek what they will; it pleases not me, and I desire nothing but Thee, my God, my love and my hope: What have I in heaven, and what have I desired on earth, but Thee, O thou God of my heart, and my portion forever; my God and my all.[1627] Let men undeceive themselves; all good things that come from creatures are but dust, smoke, and deceits; God alone can satisfy them.

But in this life he does not grant us to enjoy him fully; he only gives us certain foretastes of the good things which he promises us in heaven; there he waits to satisfy us with his own joy, when he will say to us, Enter into the joy of thy Lord[1628] The Lord gives heavenly consolations to his servants, only to make them yearn for that happiness which he prepares O almighty God! O God worthy of love! grant that in all things henceforth we may love and seek nothing but Thy pleasure. Grant that Thou mayest be my all and my only love, since Thou alone, both justly and through gratitude, dost deserve all our affections. I have no greater pain to afflict me than the thought that in times past I have so little loved Thy infinite goodness; but I desire and resolve, with Thy help, to love Thee with all my strength for the time to come, and thus I hope to die, loving Thee alone, my greatest good. O Mary, Mother of God! pray for me, a miserable being: thy prayers are never refused; pray to Jesus, that he may make me all his own.

XXXVII

WE MUST SUFFER EVERYTHING IN ORDER TO PLEASE GOD

This has been the one chief and dearest endeavour of all saints, to desire with their whole heart to endure every toil, all contempt, every pain, in order to please God, and thus to please that divine heart, which so much deserves to be loved, and loves us so much. In this consists all perfection, and the love of a soul towards God, in its ever seeking the pleasure of God, and the doing of that which most pleases God. Oh, blessed is he who can say with Jesus Christ, Those things which are pleasing to Thee, I always do.[1629] And what greater honour, what greater comfort, can a soul have than to go through some fatigue, or to accept some labour, believing it to be acceptable to God?

It is more than a duty that we should give pleasure to that God who has so much loved us, has given us all that we possess; and, not content with giving us so many blessings, has gone so far as to give himself for us upon the cross, dying upon it for love of us; and then has instituted the Sacrament of the altar, where he gives himself wholly to us in the Holy Communion, so that he has no more that he can give. On this account the saints have never known where to stay, in order to give pleasure to God. How many young nobles have left the world, in order to give themselves wholly to God! How many young women, even of royal blood, have renounced marriage with the great in order to shut themselves up in a cloister! How many anchorites have gone to hide themselves in deserts and caves in order to meditate upon God alone! How many martyrs have embraced scourges and fiery plates, and the most cruel torments of tyrants, in order to please God! In a word, in order to give pleasure to God, the saints have stripped themselves of their possessions, have renounced the greatest earthly dignities, and have accepted as treasures infirmities, persecutions, the loss of property, and the most painful and desolate deaths. The good pleasure of God, therefore, if we truly love it, ought to be preferred by us to the acquisition of all riches, of the loftiest glory, of all the delights of earth, and even of Paradise itself; for it is certain that all the blessed, if they were to know that it would please God more that they should burn in hell, one and all, even the Mother of God among them, would cast themselves into that abyss of flames, and suffer eternally in order to give greater pleasure to God. For this end the Lord has placed us in the world, in order that we may devote ourselves to pleasing him, and to giving him glory. Wherefore the will of God ought to be the one object of all our desires, of all our thoughts and actions. Well does that heart deserve to be pleased in all things which has so greatly loved us, and is so anxious for our good.

But how is it, O Lord! that, ungrateful, instead of seeking to give Thee pleasure, I have so often displeased Thee? Yet the abhorrence which Thou causest me to feel for the sins I have committed against Thee teaches me that Thou dost desire to pardon me. Pardon me, then, and suffer me not to be any more ungrateful to Thee. Grant that I may conquer everything to give Thee pleasure. In Thee, O Lord! have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever.[1630] O Queen of Heaven, and my Mother! draw me wholly to God.

XXXVIII

HAPPY IS HE WHO DESIRES NOTHING BUT GOD

Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.[1631] By "the poor in spirit " is meant those who are poor in earthly desires, and desire nothing but God. These are poor in desires, but not without affection, because they live contented even in this life; and, therefore, the Lord docs not say, "Theirs will be the kingdom of heaven," but " theirs is," because even in this life they are rich in spiritual blessings which they receive from God; and thus, however poor they are in temporal goods, they live content with their condition. They are different from the rich in earthly desires, who, in the present life, whatever riches they possess, are always poor, and live discontented; for the good things of this life do not satisfy our thirst, however much they are increased; wherefore, these persons are never contented, never attaining to the acquisition of what they desire.

In order to enrich us with true riches, Jesus Christ chose to be a poor man, as the Apostle writes, For your sakes He became poor, that by His poverty ye might become rich.[1632] He chose to be poor in order to teach us by his example to despise earthly blessings; and thus to enrich us with heavenly blessings, which are infinitely more precious, and which last forever. Wherefore he declared that whoever did not renounce every species of attachment to this earth could not be his true disciple. Happy he who desires nothing but God, and can say, with St. Paulinus, "Let the rich have their riches, kings their kingdoms; Christ is my wealth and my kingdom."[1633] Let us rest assured that God alone can content us, but he does not fully content any but those souls which love him with a whole heart. And what place can the love of God find in a heart that is full of this earth? Such people may go often to communion, and pay visits to the Blessed Sacrament; but, because this earth is in their hearts, God cannot wholly possess them, and enrich them as he would. Many souls lament that in their meditations and communions, and in their other most devout exercises, they do not find God. To such St. Teresa said, "Detach thy heart from all creatures, and thou shalt find God." Let us strip ourselves of every affection that tends to earthly things, and especially of our own will; let us give to God our whole will, without reserve, and say to him, "Lord, do Thou dispose of me, and of all I have, as Thou wilt; I desire nothing but what Thou desirest, and I know that what Thou wilt is the best for me. Grant me, then, that I may ever love Thee, and I desire nothing more."

The only means for detaching ourselves from creatures is to acquire a great love for God. If the love of God does not go so far as to obtain the mastery over our own will, we shall never attain to being saints. The means for acquiring this ruling love is devout prayer. Let us constantly pray to God to give us his love, that we may thus find ourselves detached from every created thing. Divine love is a thief, which, in a holy way, robs us of all earthly affections, and causes us to say, "What other thing do I desire but Thee alone, O God of my heart" Love is strong as death.[1634] This means that as there is no power that resists death, so there is nothing, even of things most invincible, that can resist the love of God. Love conquers everything. With the love of God the martyrs conquered the fiercest torments and the most agonizing deaths. Oh, happy indeed is he who can say with David, What have I in heaven, and what have I desired upon earth, but Thee, O God of my heart, and my portion forever! What else can I desire in this life and in eternity, but Thee alone, O my God? Let others find the good things they choose; be Thou, O God of my heart, my only good; be Thou all my peace. In what peril does the soul stand of losing God and perishing when it has not attained to the giving itself wholly to God; while he who has truly given himself altogether to God can rest secure of never leaving him, because the Lord is truly merciful and faithful to everyone who gives himself to him without reserve. But why is it that some persons, who began by living a holy life, afterwards fall so grievously, that they leave us little hope of their salvation? Why, indeed, is this? I answer, that they had not given themselves wholly to God; and this their fall is the proof of it.

O my God, and my true lover! suffer it not that my soul, which was created to love Thee, should love anything apart from Thee, and should not wholly belong to Thee, who hast purchased me with Thy blood. O my Jesus! how is it possible that, after having known the love which Thou hast borne to me, I can love anything apart from Thee? Draw me continually within Thy heart; make me forget everything that I may neither seek nor sigh after anything but Thy love. O my Jesus! in Thee I trust. O Mary, Mother of God! in thee is my hope; detach me from the love of everything that is not of God, that he may be the one object of all my affections, and of my eternal happiness.

XXXIX

DRYNESS OF SPIRIT

St. Francis de Sales said that true devotion and the true love of God do not consist in the receiving of spiritual consolations in prayer and other devout exercises, but in the possession of a resolute will to desire and to do nothing but what God wills. This is the one end for which we should apply ourselves to prayer, to Communion, to mortification, and to every other thing that is pleasing to God; even though we experience in them no sweet flavour, and continue in the midst of temptations, and in a desolateness of spirit. "With dryness of mind and temptations," said St. Teresa, "the Lord makes trial of those who love him." Even if this dryness last for the whole of life, let not the soul leave off prayer; the time will come when all will be abundantly rewarded. As all masters of the spiritual life recommend, in time of desolation we ought especially to exercise ourselves in acts of humility and resignation. There is no better time for learning our own helplessness and our misery than when we are barren in prayer, wearied, distracted, and desolate, without any perceptible fervour, and even without perceptible desires for making progress in divine love. At such times let the soul say, " Lord, have mercy upon me; behold how powerless I am to do a single good deed." We must besides resign ourselves to the will of God, and say, " O my God, it is Thy will to keep me thus in darkness, thus in affliction; may Thy holy will be ever done. I desire not to be comforted; it is enough for me to abide solitary to give Thee pleasure." And thus we ought to persevere in prayer during all its duration.The greatest trouble, however, which any one suffers in prayer is not so much a dryness as a darkness, in which he finds himself stripped of every good wish, and tempted to give up faith and hope. Sometimes, in addition, he experiences violent attacks of temptations, and such distrust that lie continues in grievous fear of having even lost the grace of God, and that for his sins God had driven him from Him, and had abandoned him; so that he looks upon himself as abhorred by God; and therefore at such times solitude torments him, and meditation seems to him like a kind of hell. Then must he take courage, and recollect that this dread of having yielded to temptation or to despair is simply the dread and the torment of the soul, but not a voluntary act, and therefore he is free from sin. At such a time a person really resists temptation with his will, though, through the darkness which enshrouds him, he is not able distinctly to perceive it. And the proof of this is the experience which he has, that if he were to be tempted knowingly to commit a single venial sin, his soul, which loves God, would rather accept death a thousand times. On this account, we must not trouble ourselves at such times to attain a certainty that we are in the grace of God, and that there is no sin in what we are doing. Thou wouldst then know and be sure that God loves thee; but at such a time God does not choose to let thee know it; he wills that thou shouldst only strive to humble thyself, and trust in his goodness, and resign thyself to his will. Thou wouldst see that God does not will that thou shouldst see. For the rest, St. Francis de Sales says that the resolution which thou hast (at least in thy will) to love God, and not to cause him deliberately the slightest displeasure, is an assurance that thou art in the grace of God. Abandon thyself, therefore, at such times, to the divine mercy; declare to God that thou desirest nothing but him and his will, and fear not. Oh, how dear to the Lord are these acts of confidence and resignation, accomplished in the midst of this terrible darkness.

For forty-one years, St. Jane Frances of Chantal suffered these internal pains, accompanied by terrible temptations, and by fears that she was in a state of sin, and was abandoned by God. Her pangs were so great that she was accustomed to say that the thought of death was the only thing that gave her relief. She was wont to say, " Sometimes it seems to me that my patience is exhausted, and that I am on the point of giving up everything, and of abandoning myself to perdition." For the last eight or nine years of her life, her temptations, instead of diminishing, became fiercer; so that whether she was praying or in any occupation, her inward martyrdom was such as to call forth the compassion of everyone who associated with her. It seemed to her sometimes that God had driven her from him, so that to relieve herself, she turned her thoughts away from God; but not finding the relief she sought, she turned again to the contemplation of God, even though he seemed wroth against her. In meditations, in communions, and other devout exercises, she experienced nothing but weariness and torment. She seemed to herself to be like a sick person overwhelmed with complaints, unable to turn herself from side to side; dumb, so as not to be able to explain her sufferings; and blind, so that she could see no way of escaping from the depths. She seemed to have lost love, hope, and faith; and, for the rest, she kept her eyes fixed upon God, resting upon the arm of the divine will. In a word, St. Francis de Sales used to say to her that that blessed soul was like a deaf musician who could sing most admirably, but had no pleasure in his voice, because he could not hear it.

The soul, therefore, which finds itself tried with dryness, however it may be oppressed with gloom, must not lose courage, but trust in the blood of Jesus Christ, and resign itself to the divine will, and say: "O Jesus, my hope, and my soul's only love! I deserve no consolations; give them to those who have always loved Thee; I have deserved hell, and to be ever abandoned there by Thee, without hope of ever being able to love Thee. But no, my Saviour, I accept every pain; punish me as Thou wilt, but deprive me not of the power of loving Thee. Take from me everything, except Thyself. Miserable as I am, I love Thee more than myself, and I give myself wholly to Thee; I desire to live no more for myself. Give me strength to be faithful to Thee. O holy Virgin, hope of sinners! I trust in thy intercession; make me love my God, who has created and redeemed me."

XL

THE RETIRED LIFE

Souls that love God find their Paradise in the retired life, in which they have no communication with men. It brings no bitterness nor weariness to converse with God and to separate ourselves from creatures. His conversation has no bitterness, nor does His society bring weariness, but joy and gladness.[1635] Worldly people, with good reason, fly from solitude; because in solitude, where they are not occupied with diversions or worldly business, the remorse of conscience makes itself felt more acutely in their hearts; and therefore such persons seek to relieve themselves, or at least to distract their thoughts, by conversing with men; but the more they study to relieve themselves among men, and in the midst of worldly affairs, the more they encounter thorns and bitter disappointments. To the lovers of God this does not happen, because in their retirement they find a sweet companion, who comforts them and makes them glad, more than the company of all their friends or relatives, or of the highest personages of the earth. St. Bernard said, "I am never less alone than when alone"[1636] never less alone than when far from men; for then I find God who speaks to me, and then I find myself more ready to listen to him, and more prepared to attach myself to him?" Our Saviour desired that his disciples, although he had destined them to propagate the faith by journeying through the whole world, from time to time should leave their labours, and retire to solitude, to commune with God alone. Besides, let us remember that Jesus Christ, from the time when he began to live with the world, was wont to send them into the different parts of Judea, that they might convert sinners; but, after their labours, he did not cease to call them to retire to some solitary place, saying to them, Come ye apart to a desert, and rest a while; for those who came and returned were many, and the disciples had no time to eat.[1637]

If our Lord said, even to the Apostles, " Rest a while," it is indeed necessary for all holy labourers to retire, from time to time, into solitude, to preserve their recollectedness with God, and to obtain strength to labour with greater vigour for the salvation of souls. He that labours for his neighbour but with little zeal, and with little love towards God, retaining some object dictated by self-love, and seeking to gain honour or wealth, does little for the gaining of souls. Therefore our Lord says to his workmen, "Rest a little while." Certainly Jesus Christ did not mean by this expression that the Apostles were to set themselves to slumber, but that they should repose in holding communion with God, in praying to him for the graces necessary for living well, and thus should gain strength for conducting the salvation of souls, for without this rest with God in prayer, strength fails for labouring rightly to our own benefit, and to the profit of others. St. Laurence Justinian wisely remarks, when speaking of the retired life, that it is to be always loved, but not always possessed; meaning to say that they who are called by God to the conversion of sinners must not remain always in solitude shut up in a cell, for they would fail of their divine calling, to obey which, when it is God who calls them, they must leave their retirement; yet they should never cease to love and to sigh for solitude, whenever God makes it more easy for them to find it.

O my Jesus! I have loved solitude little, because I have loved Thee little. I have gone about seeking pleasures and refreshment from creatures who have made me lose Thee, the infinite good. Miserable I am, that for so many years I have kept my heart distracted, thinking only of the good things. of earth, and forgetting Thee. Oh, take Thou this heart of mine, since Thou hast bought it with Thy blood; inflame it with Thy love, and possess it for Thine own. O Mary, Queen of Heaven! thou canst obtain for me this grace; from thee I hope for it.

XLI

DETACHMENT FROM CREATURES

In order to attain to loving God with all our heart, we must separate it from everything that is not God, that does not tend towards God. He chooses to be alone in the possession of our hearts; he admits no companions there; and with reason, because he is our only Lord, who has given us everything. Still further, he is our only lover, who has loved us not for his own interest, but solely from his goodness; and because he thus exceedingly loves us, he desires that we should love him with all our hearts: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." To love God with our whole heart implies two things: the first is, to drive from it every affection that is not for God, or not according to the will of God. "If I knew," said St. Francis de Sales, "that I had one fibre in my heart which did not belong to God, I would instantly tear it out." The second is prayer, by which holy love introduces itself into the heart. But if the heart does not fly from the earth, love cannot enter, for it finds no place for itself, On the other hand, a heart detached from all creatures instantly becomes inflamed, and in creases in divine love at every breathing of grace. "Pure love" said the holy Bishop of Geneva, "consumes everything that is not God, in order to change it into itself; because everything that is done for God is the love of God." Oh, how is God full of goodness and liberality to those souls that seek nothing but him and his will! The Lord is good to them that seek Him.[1638]

Happy he who, living still in the world, can say with truth, with St. Francis, "My God and my all!" and thus can hold in contempt all the vanities of the world. "I have despised the kingdom of the world, and all the glory of this life, for the love.of Jesus Christ my Lord."[1639] When, then, creatures would enter into our heart and take a share of this love, all of which we owe to God, we must immediately banish them, shutting the door against them, and saying, "Begone, begone to those who desire you; my heart I have given wholly to Jesus Christ; for you there is no place." And, in addition to this resolution to desire nothing but God, we must hate that which the world loves, and love that which the world hates. Above all, to attain to perfect love, we must deny ourselves, embracing that which is distasteful to self-love, and rejecting that which self-love demands. A certain thing is pleasant to us; for that very reason, we must reject it. A certain medicine is disagreeable, because it is bitter; we must take it for the very reason that it is bitter. It is unpleasant to us to do good to a certain person who has been ungrateful to us; we must, by all means, do him good; for the very reason that he has been ungrateful.

Further, St. Francis de Sales said that we must love even virtues with a detachment of heart; for example, we ought to love meditation and retirement; but when they are forbidden to us, through the calls of obedience or of charity, we must leave both the one and the other without being disquieted. And thus it is necessary to embrace with equanimity everything that happens to us through the will of God. Happy he who wishes to have or refuses to have, whatever happens, because God wishes it or refuses it, without inclining to either side. And therefore we must pray the Lord to enable us to find peace in everything that he appoints for us.

It is certain that no one lives more happy in the world than he who despises the things of the world, and lives in continual conformity to the will of God. Therefore, it is a useful thing frequently during the day, or at least at the times of prayer and Communion, to renew at the feet of the crucifix the total renunciation of ourselves and of all our possessions, saying, "O my Jesus! I desire to think no more of myself; I give myself wholly to Thee, do with me what Thou wilt. I see that everything that the world offers me is vanity and deceit. From this day,I would seek nothing but Thee, and Thy good will; help me to be faithful to Thee. O Virgin Mary, pray to Jesus for me."

XLII

PRECIOUS IS THE DEATH OF THE SAINTS

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints.[1640] Why is the death of the saints called precious? "Because," answers St. Bernard,[1641] "it is so rich in blessings which deserve to be purchased at any cost." Some persons, attached to this world, would wish that there was no such thing as death; but St. Augustine says, "What is it to live long upon this earth, except to suffer long?"[1642] "The miseries and difficulties that constantly weary us in this present life are so great," says St. Ambrose, "that death seems rather a relief than a punishment."[1643]

Death terrifies sinners, because they know that from the first death, if they die in sin, they will pass to the second death, which is eternal; but it does not terrify good souls, who, trusting in the merits of Jesus Christ, have sufficient signs to give them a moral assurance that they are in the grace of God. Wherefore, those words, "Depart, Christian soul, from this world," which are so terrible to those who die against their will, do not afflict the saints, who preserve their hearts free from worldly love, and with a true affection can continue repeating, "My God and my all."[1644] To these, death is not a "torment, but a rest from the pains they have suffered in struggling with temptations, and in quieting their scruples, and their fear of offending God; so that what St. John writes of them is fulfilled: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord! Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours. [1645] He that dies loving God is not disturbed by the pains that death brings with it; but rather it is delightful to such persons to offer them to God, as the last remains of their life. Oh what peace is experienced by him who dies, when he has abandoned himself into the arms of Jesus Christ who chose for himself a death of bitterness and desolation, that he might obtain for us a death of sweetness and resignation!

O my Jesus! Thou art my judge, but Thou art also my Redeemer, who hast died to save me. From my first sin I have deserved to be condemned to hell, but in Thy mercy Thou hast given me a deep sorrow for my sins, wherefore I confidently hope that now Thou hast pardoned me. I have not deserved to love Thee; but with Thy gifts Thou hast drawn me to Thy love. If it is Thy will that this sickness shall bring death to me, I willingly receive it. I see truly that I do not now deserve to enter Paradise; I go content to purgatory, to suffer as much as it pleases Thee; there my greatest pain will be to continue far from Thee, and I shall sigh to come and see Thee and love Thee face to face; therefore, O my beloved Saviour! have mercy upon me.

And what else is this present life, but a state of perpetual peril of losing God? " We walk amidst snares," says St. Ambrose; amidst the deceits of enemies, who seek to cause us to lose the divine grace. Therefore St. Teresa, every time that the clock struck, gave thanks to God that another hour of struggle and peril had passed without sin; and therefore she was so rejoiced at the tidings of her coming death, considering that her struggles were over, and the time was near for her to depart and behold her God. In this present life we cannot live without defects. This is the motive that makes souls that love God even desire death. It was this thought that, at the time of death, gladdened Father Vincent Carafa, when he said, "Now that I finish my life, I cease to displease God." A certain man gave directions to his attendants, that at the time of his death they should often repeat to him these words, " Comfort thyself, because the time is near when thou wilt no more offend God." And what else is this body to us but a prison in which. the soul is incarcerated, so that it cannot depart to unite itself to God? On this account, St. Francis, inflamed with love, at the hour of his death cried out with the prophet, "Take my soul out of prison." O Lord, deliver me from this prison which prevents me from seeing Thee. O death, worthy of love, who can fear thee and not desire thee, since thou art the end of all toils, and the beginning of eternal life! St. Pionius the martyr, standing by the instruments of death, showed himself so full of joy, that the people who stood by wondered at his delight, and asked him how he could be so happy when he was just going to die. "You are mistaken," said he, as Eusebius relates, "you are mistaken; I am not hastening to death, but to life."

O most sweet Jesus, I thank Thee for not having called me to death when I was under Thy wrath, and for having won over my soul with such gentle means as Thou hast employed. When I think of the displeasure I have caused Thee, I am ready to die with grief. This my soul, which was lost, I now commit wholly into Thy hands: into Thy hands I commend my spirit; remember, O Lord! that Thou hast redeemed it with Thy death. I love Thee, O infinite goodness! and I desire to depart quickly from this life, that I may come and love Thee with a more perfect love in heaven. And so long as I shall continue to live on this earth, make me continually to comprehend better my obligation to love Thee. O my God! receive me; I give myself wholly to Thee, and I trust in Thee through the merits of Jesus Christ. I also trust in thy intercession, O Mary, my hope!

XLIII

LUKEWARMNESS

There are two kinds of lukewarmness; one that can be avoided, and the other that cannot. We cannot avoid that kind which, in the present state of being, is suffered even by spiritual souls, who, through their natural weakness, cannot avoid falling, but who, from time to time, without the full consent of their will, fall into some light fault; from which defects no one is free, because of the corruption of our nature through original sin, without a most special grace, which was granted to none but the Mother of God. God himself permits these flaws in his saints, in order to keep them humble. Often they find themselves without fervour, wearied and wandering in their devout exercises; and at such times of dryness they are more apt to fall into many defects, at least without deliberation. For the rest, they who find themselves in this condition must not leave off their ordinary devotions nor lose courage, nor believe that they have fallen into real lukewarmness; for this is not lukewarmness. Let them go on with their accustomed exercises, let them detest their defects, let them often renew their resolutions of giving themselves wholly to God, and let them have confidence in him, for he will comfort them. There is true lukewarmness to be mourned over, when the soul falls into venial sins with a full will, and grieves but little for them, and takes little care to avoid them, asserting that they are trifles of no moment. What! is it nothing to displease God? St. Teresa said to her nuns, "My daughters, may God deliver you from known sins, however small."

Yet people say, that such sins do not deprive us of the grace of God. He that says this is in imminent danger of seeing himself one day deprived of divine grace, and in a state of mortal sin. St. Gregory writes, that whoever falls into deliberate mortal sins habitually, without feeling pain at it, and without thinking of amending himself, does not stay just where he has fallen, but goes on to fall down a precipice: "The soul never lies on the spot where it falls."[1646] Mortal diseases do not always spring from serious disorders, but from slight disorders of long continuance; and thus the fall of certain souls into a state of sin is often to be attributed to the repetition of venial sins, which make the soul so weak, that when it is attacked by any powerful temptation, it has no strength to resist, and so falls. "He that despiseth little things, by little degrees shall he fall."[1647] He that takes no account of trifling falls, will one day find himself upon a precipice.

The Lord said, "Because thou art lukewarm, I am about to vomit thee out of my mouth." This signifies that the soul would be abandoned by God, or at least deprived of those special divine aids which are necessary to preserve us in a state of grace. Let us pay good heed to this. The Council of Trent condemns those who say that we can persevere in grace without a special help from God: "If any man shall say, that the justified can persevere in the justification he has received without the special help of God, let him be accursed." Thus, we cannot persevere in grace without a special extraordinary help from God; but this special help God will justly deny to one who makes no account of committing many venial sins with his eyes open. Is God bound to give this special help to one who thinks nothing of voluntarily causing him continual displeasure? " He that sows sparingly shall reap also sparingly." If we act grudgingly with God, how can we hope that God will act bountifully with us? Miserable is that soul that is at peace with sin, even when it is venial! Such a one will go from bad to worse; for his passions, ever gaining strength upon him, easily blind him; and when a man is blind, it is easy for him to find himself falling down a precipice when least he expects it. Let us fear to fall into voluntary lukewarmness; for it is like a fever, that does not cause much alarm, but is in itself so malignant, that it is with great difficulty cured.For the rest, though it is very difficult for a lukewarm person to amend, yet there are remedies, if only he desires amendment. The remedies are: 1. A resolution to escape, at all costs, from this miserable state; 2. The removal of the occasions of falling, without which there is no hope of amendment; and 3. The constant recommendation of himself to God, with fervent prayer that he would give him strength to escape from this deplorable condition, continued until he finds himself free.Lord, have mercy upon me! I see that I have deserved to be vomited forth by Thee, for the many defects with which I serve Thee. Miserable I am, for I see myself without love, without confidence, and without desire. O my Jesus! abandon me not; stretch forth Thy powerful hand, and drive me from this depth of lukewarmness in which I see myself fallen. Grant thisthrough the merits of Thy passion, in which I trust. O holy Virgin, pray to Jesus for me!

XLIV

PURITY OF INTENTION

Purity of intention consists in doing everything from a simple desire to please God. Jesus Christ has said, that according to the intention, whether it be good or evil, so is our work judged before God. If thine eye be single, thy whole body is full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body is full of darkness.[1648] The single eye signifies a pure intention of pleasing God; the dark and evil eye signifies a want of such honest and holy intention, when our actions are done from a motive of vanity, or from a desire to please ourselves. Can any action be more noble than for a man to give his life for the faith? and yet St. Paul says, that he who dies from any motive but that of a pure desire to do God's will, gains nothing by his martyrdom. If, then, martyrdom avails nothing unless it be endured for the sake of God alone, of what value will be all the preaching, all the labour of good works, and also all the austerities of penitents, if they are done to obtain the praise of men, or to satisfy their own inclination?

The prophet Aggæus says, that works, however holy in themselves, if not done for God, are nothing better than bags full of holes;[1649] which means, that they are all lost directly, and that no good comes of them. On the contrary, every action done with an intention of pleasing God, of however little value in itself, is worth more than many works done without such pure intention. We read in St. Mark that the poor widow cast into the alms-box of the temple only two mites; but yet of her the Saviour said, See, that poor widow has cast in more than all.[1650] St. Cyprian remarks on this, that she put in more than all the others, because she gave those two little pieces of money with the pure intention of pleasing God. One of the best signs by which we may know whether a person's work is done with a right intention is, that if the work has not the effect desired he will not be at all disturbed. Another good sign is, that when a person has completed any work, and then is spoken ill of for it, or is repaid with ingratitude, he nevertheless remains contented and tranquil. On the other hand, if it happen to any one to be praised for his work, he must not disquiet himself with the fear of being filled with vain glory; but should it come upon him, only let him despise it in his heart, and say, with St. Bernard, "I did not begin it for thee, nor because of thee will I leave it."[1651] To work with an intention of acquiring more glory in heaven is good, but the most perfect is the desire to give glory to God. Let us be sure that the more we divest ourselves of our earthly interests, so much the more will our Saviour increase our joy in Paradise. Blessed is he who labours only to give glory to God, and to follow his holy will. Let us imitate the love of the blessed, who, in loving God, seek only to please him.

St. Chrysostom says, "If we can attain to the fulfilment of God's pleasure, what more can we desire? If thou art worthy of doing anything that pleases[1652] God, dost thou ask any other reward?" This is that single eye which pierces the heart of God with love towards us; as he says to the holy Spouse, Thou hast wounded my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast wounded my heart with one of thine eyes.[1653] This single eye signifies the one end that holy souls have in all their actions, that of pleasing God. And this was the counsel that the Apostle gave to his disciples: Therefore, whether you eat or drink, or whatsoever you do, do all to the glory of God.[1654] The Venerable Beatrice of the Incarnation, the first daughter of St. Teresa, said, "No price can be put on anything, however small, that is done entirely for God." And with great reason she said this, for all works done for God are acts of divine love. Purity of intention makes the lowest actions become precious, such as eating, working, recreation, when they are done from obedience and from a desire to please God. We must, then, in the morning, direct to God all the actions of the day; and it will be very useful to us to renew this intention at the beginning of every action, at least of the most important, such as meditation, Communion, and spiritual reading pausing a little in the beginning of these, like the holy hermit, who, before beginning anything he had to do, lifted his eyes to heaven, and remained still; and when he was asked what he was then doing, replied, "I am making sure of my aim."

When, O my Jesus! shall I begin to love Thee truly? Miserable that I am! If I seek among my works for any that are good, for one work done only to please Thee, my Saviour, I shall not find it. Alas! then, have pity on me, and suffer not that I continue to serve Thee so ill up to the time of my death. Grant me Thy help, that what remains to me of life I may spend only in serving and loving Thee. Make me overcome all, that I may please Thee, and do all only to fulfil Thy holy pleasure; through the merits of Thy Passion, I ask it. O my great advocate, Mary, obtain for me this grace by thy prayers!

ASPIRATIONS AFTER THE COUNTRY OF THE BLESSED

Happy is he who is saved; who leaves this place of exile, and enters into the heavenly Jerusalem, and enjoys that perfect day which will be always day and always joyful, free from all molestation, and from all fear of ever losing so infinite a happiness. Jacob said, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are a hundred and thirty; few, and evil.[1655] The same may be said of us miserable pilgrims, whilst we remain on this earth, to endure the toils of our exile, afflicted by temptations, torn by passions, and tormented by miseries, and still more by the fear of losing our eternal salvation at last. Seeing all this, we should conclude, and ever keep it in mind, that this is not our country, but a land of exile, where God detains us, in order that we may, through suffering, come to merit the reward of entering one day into our happy country.

And thus living detached from this earth, we ought always to aspire after Paradise, saying: " When shall it be, O Lord, that I shall be delivered from all these distresses, and think only of loving Thee and praising Thee? When will it be that Thou wilt be all to me in all things, as the Apostle writes: That God may be all in all?[1656] When shall I enjoy that unchanging peace, free from all affliction, and from all danger of being lost? When, my God, shall I find myself dwelling with Thee, and enjoying the sight of Thine infinite beauty face to face, and without veil? When shall I attain to the possession of Thee, my Creator, in such a manner that I may say, My God, I cannot lose Thee more? O my Saviour, whilst Thou seest me an exile, and full of trouble, in this land of enemies, where I live in continual warfare, help me with Thy grace, and console me in this sorrowful pilgrimage. Whatever the world may offer me, I know that nothing in it can bring peace; but yet I fear lest, if I have not help from Thee, the pleasures of the world, joined to my evil inclinations, should draw me on to some terrible precipice. Exile as I am in this valley of tears, I would think of Thee continually, O my God! and share in that infinite happiness which Thou enjoyest; but the evil appetites of sense make themselves heard within me, and disturb me. I would that my affections were ever occupied in loving Thee and thanking Thee; but in my flesh I feel drawn towards sensual delights, and thence I am constrained to exclaim with St. Paul, Unhappy man that lam, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?[1657] Miserable man that I am, in continual combat, not only with external enemies, but with myself, whence I am weighed down and a trouble to myself.[1658]

Who, then, will deliver me from the body of this death? that is, from the danger of falling into sin, from that peril, the fear only of which is to me a continual death, which torments me, and will not cease to torment me during all my life: Go not far from me, O God; my God, in Thy help I put my trust.[1659] My God, go not far from me; because if Thou goest from me, I fear I shall displease Thee. Therefore, draw nearer to me with Thy powerful help; succour me continually, that I may be able to resist the attacks of my enemies. The royal prophet has said that Thou art ever near, that Thou dost endow with holy patience all those who are of sorrowful heart, afflicted within themselves.[1660] Remain beside me, then, my beloved Saviour, and give me that patience that I need to overcome the continual attacks by which I am tormented. As often as I try to give myself to meditation and prayer, troublesome thoughts draw me away, and distract me with a thousand follies; do Thou give me force to drive them from me, and to crucify all the evil inclinations that hinder me from uniting myself to Thee. And take from me, I pray Thee, the great repugnance that I feel to embracing in love and peace everything that is not according to my own self-love. O house of my God, prepared for those that love Thee, to Thee I sigh from this land of misery. "I have gone astray as a sheep that is lost: O, seek Thy servant." O beloved Shepherd of my soul, who didst descend from heaven to seek and to save the lost sheep, behold me, one of these who has turned from Thee, and lost itself! Seek Thy servant; Lord, seek me; abandon me not, as I deserve; seek me and save me; take me and keep me safe within Thine arms, that I may not leave Thee anymore. While I am looking towards Paradise with strong desire, my enemy frightens me with the remembrance of my sins; but the sight of Thee, my crucified Jesus, consoles me, and gives me courage to hope that some day I may come to love Thee, and behold Thee unveiled, in Thy blessed kingdom. Queen of heaven, continue to be my advocate. Through the blood of Jesus Christ, and through thine intercession, I have a firm hope of being saved.

Spiritual Treatises[1661]

I

DIVINE LOVE

I. HOW MUCH GOD DESERVES TO BE LOVED

GOD is a treasury of all grace, of all good, of all perfection. God is infinite, God is eternal, God is immense, God is unchangeable. God is powerful, God is wise, God is provident, God is just. God is merciful, God is holy, God is beautiful, God is brightness itself, God is rich, God is all things, and he is therefore worthy of love; and of how much love! God is infinite; he gives to all, and receives nothing from any one.

All that we have comes to us from God; but God has nothing from us: Thou art my God, for Thou hast no need of my goods.[1662] God is eternal; he has ever been eternal, and always shall be. We can count the years and the days of our existence; but God knows no beginning, and will never have an end; But Thou art always the selfsame, and Thy years shall not fail.[1663] God is immense, and is essentially present in every place. We, when we are in one place, cannot be in another. But God is in all places, in heaven, on earth, in the sea, in the depths, without us, and within us. Whither shall I go from Thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from Thy face? If I ascend into heaven, Thou art there: if I descend into hell, Thou art present.[1664] God is unchangeable; and all that he has ordained by his holy will from eternity, he wills now, and will do so forever. For I am the Lord, and I change not.[1665] God is powerful; and with respect to God, all the power of creatures is but weakness. God is wise; and with respect to God, all human wisdom is ignorance. God is provident; and with respect to God, all human foresight is ridiculous. God is just; and with respect to God, all human justice is defective: And in His angels He found wickedness.[1666]

God is merciful; and with respect to God, all human clemency is imperfect. God is holy; in comparison with God, all human sanctity, though it be heroic, falls short in an infinite degree: None is good but God alone.[1667] God is beauty itself; yes, how beautiful is God! and with respect to God, all human beauty is deformity. God is brightness itself; and with respect to God, all human brightness, even that of the sun, is darkness. God is rich; and with respect to God, all human riches is poverty. God is all things; and with respect to God, the highest, the most sublime, the most admirable of created things, and even if they were all united in one, are as nothing: All men areas nothing before Thee.[1668] He is, therefore, worthy of love; and, oh, of how much! Ah, God is worthy of so much love, that all the angels, and all the saints of Paradise, do nothing but love God, and they will throughout all eternity be occupied only in loving him; and in this love of God, they are and will be always happy. Ah, God is so worthy of love, that he is obliged to love himself with an infinite love; and in this same love, so necessary, but at the same time so delightful, which God bears to himself, consists his beatitude! And shall we not love him? How did the saints love him? St. Francis Xavier used to loosen his clothes and throw himself on the ground, not being able to resist the impulse of holy love. St. Stanislaus Kostka bared his breast, and used to run to fountains to refresh himself with the water. The heart of St. Philip Neri became sensibly enlarged by the force of holy love.

St. Francis de Sales said, that if he knew that there was the smallest fibre in his heart that was not saturated with divine love, he would tear it out at once and cast it far from him. And St. Catharine of Sienna, St. Teresa, St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, and other souls like them, were often in transports, and ravished as it were through the violence of the holy love of God; and St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, not satisfied with loving him so much herself, sometimes went about her convent, in order to give vent to her love, crying with aloud voice, "Love is not loved; Love is not loved." And shall we then not love him? Do you know why we do not love him? It is because we know him so little. The saints, who knew him better than we do, loved him so much. Let us then also try to know him a little more. Let us meditate from time to time on his divine attributes, on his divine perfections; let us at least, from time to time, raise our minds by a simple glance to him in the way I have here proposed, and our hearts will also become inflamed with this holy divine love. It is condescension in so great a God, that he should permit himself to be loved by such vile creatures as we are; and it is also his sweet commandment. When God gave Moses his law on the top of Mount Sinai, before giving him any other precept, he taught him this: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart; and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole strength.[1669] And he enjoined him first of all to imprint well these words in his own heart: And these words shall be in thy heart;[1670] and afterwards to promulgate them with ardour among the children of Israel: And thou shalt tell them to thy children.[1671]

Let us also love him as he deserves; let us fulfil perfectly this his precept, which is at the same time so noble and so sweet; which is in fine the first and greatest precept of the law: This is the greatest and the first commandment.[1672] And let us live and die in the fulfilment of this precept.

II. HOW MUCH GOD DESIRES TO BE LOVED BY US

Our good God, because he loves us much, desires to be loved much by us; and therefore he has not only called us to love him by so many invitations repeated again and again in the Holy Scriptures, and by so many blessings both general and individual, but he would also oblige us to love him by an express commandment; and he threatens those with hell who love him not; while to those who do love him he promises Paradise. His will is, that no one be lost, but that all attain salvation, as St. Peter and St. Paul most clearly teach: Who will have all men to be saved.[1673] He dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[1674] But since God wishes all men to be saved, why has he created hell? He did so, not to see us damned, but in order to be loved by us. If he had not created hell, who in the whole world would love him? If with hell, existing as it really does, the greater part of men choose rather to be damned than to love Almighty God, who, I repeat, would love him were there no hell? And therefore the Lord threatens those who will not love him with an eternal punishment; so that they who will not love him out of love may at least love him by force, being constrained to do so through fear of falling into hell.

O God, how fortunate and honoured would that man esteem himself to whom his king should say, "Love me because I love you"! An earthly monarch would take good care not to humble himself to such an extent as to ask one of his subjects for his love; but God, who is infinite goodness, the Lord of all, almighty, all-wise, in a word, God, who merits an infinite love, God, who has enriched us with spiritual and temporal gifts, does not disdain to ask of us our love. He exhorts us and commands us to love him, and he cannot obtain it. What does he ask of each one of us but to be loved? What doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but that thou fear the Lord thy God . . . and love Him?[1675] It was for this end that the Son of God came to converse with us even upon earth, as he himself said: I am come to cast fire on the earth; and what will I but that it be kindled?[1676] Observe these last words, and what will I but that it be kindled? As if it were that a God, who possesses in himself infinite happiness, could not be happy without seeing himself loved by us: "As if," says St. Thomas, "He could not be happy without thee."[1677] We cannot doubt, then, that God loves us, and loves us exceedingly; and because he loves us exceedingly, he wishes us to love him with our whole heart: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart.[1678]

And then he adds: And these words shall be in thy heart . . . and thou shalt meditate upon them sitting in thy house, and walking on thy journey, sleeping and rising: and thou shalt bind them as a sign on thy hand, and they shall be and shall move between thy eyes. And thou shalt write them in the entry and on the doors of thy house.[1679] We can see in all these words how earnest is the desire which God has to be beloved by each one of us. He wishes that the injunction of loving him with our whole heart should be imprinted in our heart; and that we may never be unmindful of these words, he wishes us to meditate upon them when we are sitting at home, when we are walking abroad, when we lie down to sleep, and when we awake from it again. He wishes us to hold them in our hands bound up with some significant memento, in order that, wherever we may be, our eyes may ever rest upon them; and hence it was that the Pharisees, taking them only in their literal sense, used, as we are told by St. Matthew, to wear them inscribed on pieces of parchment, not only in their right hands, but also upon their foreheads,[1680] St. Gregory of Nyssa exclaims. "Blessed is the arrow that carries along with it into the heart the God by whom it is aimed!"[1681] And what the holy Father means is this: that when God wounds the heart with an arrow of love, it acts like a flash or ray of special illumination, whereby the soul becomes cognizant of his goodness and of the love which he bears towards it, as also of the desire which he has to possess the love of that soul; whilst at the same moment he himself comes together with that arrow of his love, he who is the archer being himself also love: for, as St. John says, God is charity.[1682] And as an arrow remains fixed in the heart which it has wounded, so in like manner does God, when he wounds a soul with his love, come to remain forever united with that soul which he has wounded. Let us be assured that it is God only who loves us truly. The love of parents, of friends, and of all others who profess to love us, excepting in the case of those who love us solely out of regard for God, is not a true but a self-interested love, and arises from some motive of self-love as the end for the sake of which we are loved.

Yes, O my God! I know full well that it is Thou alone who lovest me, and desirest for me every good, not for any selfish interests of Thine own, but solely out of Thine own goodness, and out of the pure affection which Thou dost bear towards me: whilst I am so ungrateful as to have caused no one so much displeasure and so much grief as I have done to Thee, who hast loved me so much. O my Jesus! do not permit me to be ungrateful to Thee any more. Thou hast loved me truly, and I wish to love Thee truly in whatever of this life may still be mine. With St. Catharine of Genoa, I say to Thee: "My Love, no more sins, no more sins;" I wish to love Thee only, and naught besides. St. Bernard says, that a soul that truly loves God "cannot will anything but what God wills,"[1683] Let us pray to God to wound us with his holy love; for a soul thus wounded has neither the faculty nor the power to have a will for anything but that which God wills, and divests itself of every desire arising out of self-love. This self-spoliation, moreover, together with the giving of one's self unreservedly to God, is the arrow by which he declares that he himself is wounded by the soul; as he said to the sacred Spouse in the Canticles: Thou hast wounded My Heart, My sister, My spouse.[1684]

How beautifully does St. Bernard express himself on this subject when he says: "Let us learn to dart our hearts at God!"[1685] When a soul gives itself up wholly and unreservedly to God, it is as if it darted its own heart like a spear towards the heart of God, who declares himself to be, as it were, captivated and taken prisoner by the soul that has made over to him the gift of itself in full. This is the employment of such souls in the prayers which they offer; "they dart their hearts at God;"[1686] they give themselves wholly up to God; and they are ever renewing that gift in these or similar ejaculations of love: "My God and my All:"[1687] my God, I wish for Thee, and for naught besides. Lord! I give myself wholly to Thee; and if I know not how to make the gift as perfect as I ought, do Thou take the management of it Thyself. And what would I love, O my Jesus! if I love not Thee, who hast died for me? "Draw me after Thee:"[1688] O my Saviour, drag me out of the mire of my sins, and draw me after Thee. Bind me, O Lord! and fetter me with the chains of Thy love, that I may never leave Thee more. I wish to be all Thine own. Lord, hast Thou understood me? I wish to be wholly, wholly Thine: it is for Thee to make me so. And what would I have but Thee, my Love, my All? Since Thou hast called me to Thy love, enable me to please Thee as Thou dost desire. And what would I love but Thee, who art infinite goodness, deserving infinite love? Thou hast inspired me with the desire of being wholly Thine: oh, make the work complete! And what would I have in this world but Thee, who art the Sovereign Good? I give myself to Thee without reserve: oh, accept me, and give me the strength to be faithful unto Thee till death! I wish to love Thee greatly in this life, that I may love Thee greatly for all eternity.

Jesus, my true, my only Love,
I wish for nought but Thee:
Behold me all Thine own, my God;
Do what Thou wilt with me.

Whoever says this little canticle from the heart causes joy in Paradise. Blessed, in short, is that soul that can truly say, My Beloved to me, and I to him.[1689] My God has given himself wholly to me, and I have given myself wholly to him; I am no longer my own; I belong entirely to my God. St. Bernard says that whosoever can speak thus from his heart, would most readily and willingly embrace all the pains of hell (provided that he could do so without separating himself from God) rather than behold himself, even for one single moment, separated from God: "It would be more tolerable to such a one to suffer hell than to withdraw from him."[1690] Oh, what a beautiful treasure is the treasure of divine love! He who possesses it is happy indeed; let him take every care, and make use of all the means which are necessary to preserve and increase it; while he who does not yet possess it ought to employ every means in order to acquire it.

III. MEANS TO ACQUIRE THE LOVE OF GOD

Let us now see which are the means most suitable to acquire and preserve the love of God.

1. DETACHMENT FROM CREATURES

The first of these is the detachment of one's self from earthly affections. In a heart that is full of earth there is no room to be found for the love of God; and the more the earthly element predominates, the less does the divine love bear sway. Wherefore, he who desires to have his heart filled with divine love should study to remove out of it all that is of earth. In order to become saints, we must follow the example of St. Paul, who, that he might gain the love of Jesus Christ, despised as so much dung all the good things of this world: I count all things as dung, that I may gain Christ.[1691] Oh, let us pray the Holy Spirit to enkindle within us his holy love; for then we too shall despise and reckon as mere vanity, smoke, and dirt all this world's riches, pleasures, honours, and distinctions, for the sake of which mankind in general involve themselves so miserably in destruction. Ah! whenever holy love enters into the heart, it no longer regards as of any value all that the world holds in estimation: If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing.[1692] St. Francis de Sales observes that when a house is in flames the goods are all thrown out of the windows; meaning to say that when the heart is on fire with divine love, a man needs not the preachings and exhortations of a spiritual father, but of his own accord sets himself to work to divest himself of the good things of this world, of its honours, of its riches, and of all earthly things, in order that he may love nothing but God. St. Catharine of Genoa used to say that she did not love God for the sake of his gifts, but that she loved the gifts of God in order that she might love him the more.

Gilbert observes that it is hard and intolerable to a heart that loves God to divide its affections between him and creatures, by loving at one and the same time God and creatures too: "Oh, how hard it is for the lover to divide his heart between Christ and the world!"[1693] St. Bernard says that the divine love is, on the other hand, insolent: "Love is insolent;"[1694] insolent, because God will not suffer that, in a heart which loves, there should be others to share with him in its love, wishing, as he does, to have it all for himself. Is it, then, that God claims too much, in wishing that a soul should love him, and him alone? "The Sovereign Loveliness," observes St. Bonaventure, "ought to be loved exclusively."[1695] Such a one as God, whose loveliness and goodness are infinite and worthy of an infinite love, has a just claim to be alone in his possession of the love of a heart created by himself for the express purpose that it should make him the object of its love; while, in order that he might be loved exclusively, he has gone so far as to expend himself wholly for that heart, as St. Bernard says, when speaking of himself and of the love which Jesus Christ had borne towards him: "He was utterly spent for my benefit."[1696] What each one of us can most truly say, when thinking of Jesus Christ, is, that for each one of us he has sacrificed all his life and all his blood, dying upon a cross, consumed by pain; and that although his death be past? he has bequeathed to us his body and his blood, his soul and his whole self in the Sacrament of the Altar, that it may be the meat and drink of our souls, and that we may each of us be united with himself.

Happy is the soul, as St. Gregory observes, that has arrived at a state wherein everything is intolerable that is not the God whom it exclusively loves.[1697] "Whatever does not speak of the God whom it so intensely loves is intolerable." We must, then, be on our guard against setting our affections on creatures, lest they steal from us a portion of the love which God wishes to be wholly for himself. And even when such affections are right, as in the case of the affections entertained for parents or friends, we should never forget the saying of St. Philip Neri, that whatever love we entertain for creatures is so much taken away from God. We ought, therefore, to endeavour to make ourselves " gardens enclosed," as the Sacred Spouse in the Canticles was styled by her Lord: My Spouse is a garden enclosed.[1698]The title of "a garden enclosed" applies to the soul that keeps itself closed against the entrance of all mere earthly affections. Whenever, therefore, any creature seeks to enter and to seize a portion of our heart, we must utterly refuse it admission; and then we ought to turn to Jesus Christ, and say to him: My Jesus, Thou alone art sufficient for me. I do not wish to love aught but Thee: "Thou art the God of my heart; and God is my portion forever."[1699] My God, Thou alone art the Lord of my heart, and my only love. And on this account let us not cease to pray continually to God, that he would bestow upon us the gift of his pure love; since, as St. Francis de Sales observes, "The pure love of God consumes all that is not God, to transform everything into itself."

2. MEDITATION ON THE PASSION

Meditation on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ is the second means for acquiring divine love. On this subject the reader can refer to my book, which was published a short time since, entitled Reflections on the Passion of Jesus Christ, in which he will find a detailed examination of the sufferings that our Saviour underwent in his Passion. As for the rest, it is certain that the fact of Jesus Christ being so little loved in the world arises from the negligence and ingratitude of mankind, and from not considering, at least occasionally, how much he has suffered for us, and the love wherewith he suffered for us. "To mankind it has appeared foolish,"[1700] as St. Gregory observes, "that God should die for us." It seems folly, says the Saint, that God should have been willing to die in order to save us miserable slaves: nevertheless, it is of faith that he has done so. "He has loved us, and delivered himself for us."[1701] And he has willed to shed all his blood, in order to wash away our sins therewith: He hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own Blood.[1702] St. Bonaventure says, "My God, so much hast Thou loved me, that through Thy love for me, Thou dost seem to have gone so far as even to have hated Thyself."[1703] Besides, he has yet further willed that he himself should be our food in Holy Communion.

And here the angelic doctor St. Thomas, speaking of this Most Holy Sacrament, says that God has so humbled himself with us, that it is as if he were, our servant, and each of us his God: "as though He were their servant, and each of them were God's God." [1704] Hence it is that the Apostle says, For the charity of Christ presseth us.[1705] St. Paul says that the love which Jesus Christ has borne us constrains us, and in a certain sense forces us, to love him. O my God! what is there that men will not do out of love for some creature on which they have set their affections! And how little is their love for One who is, moreover, God; whose goodness and loveliness are infinite, and who has even gone so far as to die upon a cross for each one of us! Ah, let us all follow the example of the Apostle, who said, But God forbid that I should glory , save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.[1706] So spoke the holy Apostle; and what greater glory can I hope for in the world than that of having had a God to sacrifice his blood and life, out of his love for me? And this is what every one who has faith must say, and if he has faith, how will it be possible for him to love any other than God? O my God! how can a soul, contemplating Jesus crucified, as, suspended on three nails, he hangs from those same wounds of his in his hands and feet, and dies of sheer anguish, through his love for us, not perceive itself drawn, and as it, were constrained, to love him with all its powers? Let a soul be as cold as it can be in the divine love; if it have faith, I know not how it be possible for it not to perceive itself urged to love Jesus Christ, or even the most hasty consideration of what the Holy Scriptures tell us of the love which he has manifested towards us in his Passion, and in the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar.

As regards his Passion, we read in Isaias*: Surely He hath borne our infirmities, and carried our sorrows;* and in the verse that follows: But He was wounded for our iniquities; He was bruised for our sins.[1707] So that it is of faith that Jesus Christ has willed to suffer in his own person pains and afflictions, to set free from them ourselves, to whom they were justly due. And why is it that he has done so, if it be not for the love which he has borne towards us? Christ hath loved us, and hath delivered himself for us.[1708] as St, Paul says. And St. John says: Who hath loved us and washed us from our sins with His own Blood.[1709] While with respect to the Sacrament of the Eucharist, it was Jesus himself who said to us all, when he instituted it. Take ye, and eat; this is My Body. [1710] And in another passage He that eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood abideth in Me, and I in him.[1711] How can any one who has faith read this without feeling himself, as it were, forced to love his Redeemer, who, after having sacrificed his blood and life out of love for him, has left him his own body in the Sacrament of the Altar, to be the food of his soul, and the means of uniting him wholly to himself in Holy Communion? We may add one more brief reflection on the Passion of Jesus Christ. He shows himself to us on the cross pierced by three nails, with blood issuing from every pore, and agonizing in the pangs of death.

I ask, why is it that Jesus manifests himself to us in such a pitiable condition? Is it, perchance, that we may compassionate him? No: it is not so much to gain our compassion, as to become the object of our love, that he has reduced himself to so miserable a state. It ought to have been a motive more than sufficient to secure our love, had he given us to know that his love for us is from all eternity: I have loved thee with an everlasting love.[1712] But seeing that this was not enough for our lukewarmness, the Lord, in order to move us to love him according to his desires, has willed thus to give us indeed a practical demonstration of the love which he bore towards us, by making us behold him, covered with wounds, die of anguish, through his love for us, that by means of his sufferings we might understand the immensity and tenderness of the love which he cherishes towards us; as it is so well expressed in these words of St. Paul: He has loved us, and delivered Himself for us.[1713]

3. CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD

The third means of gaining a perfect love of God is the bringing of our own will into uniformity with the divine will in all things. St. Bernard says that he who loves God perfectly "cannot will anything excepting that which God wills."[1714] There are many who profess themselves to be thoroughly resigned to whatever God wills; but when afterwards any adverse circumstance or any troublesome infirmity befalls them, they cannot retain their peace of mind. It is not so with souls that are in a state of true uniformity. They say, " Thus it pleases, or thus it has pleased, Him whom I love;" and they are immediately at rest. "To holy love," says St. Bonaventure, "all things are sweet." [1715] These souls know that everything that happens in the world is either ordered or permitted by God; consequently, in all that comes to pass, they humbly bow down their head and live contented with what God assigns. And although it be frequently the case that he does not will that those who persecute and injure us should do so, yet he nevertheless wills for wise ends that we should suffer with patience the persecution or the injury by which we are afflicted.

St. Catharine of Genoa used to say, "If God had placed me in the depths of hell, I would sincerely have said, It is good for us to be here."[1716] I would have said, It is enough for me that I am here by the will of Him whom I love, who loves me more than all others do, and knows what is best for me. Sweet is the repose of those who repose in the arms of the divine will. St. Teresa says: " The grand thing to be acquired by one who practises the habit of prayer is the conformity of his own will to the divine; for in that consists the highest perfection."[1717] Wherefore we must be ever repeating to God that prayer of David: Teach me to do Thy will. [1718] Lord, since Thou dost wish me to be saved, teach me ever to do Thy will. The most perfect act of love which a soul can perform towards God is that of St. Paul, when, on his conversion, he said, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[1719] Lord, tell me what Thou dost desire of me, for I am ready to do it. This act is worth more than a thousand fasts and a thousand disciplines. This—ought to be the object of all our works, desires, and prayers, the accomplishment of the divine will. For this we ought to pray our divine Mother, our patron saints and guardian angels, to obtain for us the grace to fulfil the will of God.

And whenever things that are opposed to our self-love befall us, we may then, by one act of resignation, gain treasures of merit. Let us accustom ourselves on such occasions to repeat those which Jesus himself has, by his own example, taught us: The chalice which My Father hath given Me shall I not drink it?[1720] or, again, Yea, Father, for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight. [1721] Lord, thus it hath pleased Thee, and thus it pleases me also. Or, again, with holy Job, let us say, As it hath pleased Thee, Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord.[1722] The venerable Father Avila used to say that a single " Blessed be God," under adverse circumstances, is worth more than a thousand thanksgivings when things go smoothly. And here we may say again, what has already been said above, beautiful is the repose of those who repose themselves in the arms of the will of God; for then will the declaration of the Holy Spirit be fulfilled in them: Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad.[1723]

4. MENTAL PRAYER

The fourth means for becoming enamoured of God is mental prayer. The eternal truths are not discernible by the natural eye, like the things that are visible in this world. They are to be discerned solely by means of meditation and contemplation. Therefore, unless we pause for a certain length of time, in order to consider the eternal truths, and more especially our obligation to love God, on account of his being so deserving of our love, as also for the great blessings which he has conferred upon us and the love which he has borne us, we shall hardly loose ourselves from the love of creatures, to fix our whole love on God. It is in the time of prayer that God gives us to understand the worthlessness of earthly things, and the value of the good things of heaven; and then it is that he inflames with his love those hearts which do not offer resistance to his calls.

There are many, however, who complain that they go to prayer and do not find God; the reason of which is, that they carry with them a heart, full of earth. Detach the heart from creatures, says St. Teresa, seek God and you will find him. The Lord is good to the soul that seeketh Him.[1724] Therefore to find God in prayer, the soul must be stripped of its love for the things of earth, and then God will speak to it: I will lead her into the wilderness and I will speak to her heart. But in order to find God, the solitude of the body, as St. Gregory observes, is not enough; that of the heart is necessary too. The Lord one day said to St. Teresa: "I would willingly speak to many souls; but the world makes such a noise in their heart that My voice cannot make itself heard." Ah! when a detached soul is engaged in prayer, truly does God speak to it and make it understand the love which he has borne it; and then the soul, as a certain author says, burning with holy love, speaks not; but in that silence, oh, how much does it say! The silence of charity, observes the same writer, says more to God than could be said by the utmost powers of human eloquence: each sigh that it utters is a manifestation of its whole interior. It then seems as if it could not repeat often enough, My Beloved to me, and I to him.[1725]

5. PRAYER

The fifth means of attaining to a high degree of divine love is prayer. We are poor in all things; but if we pray, we are rich in all things; for God has promised to grant the prayer of him who prays to him. He says: Ask and it shall be given to you.[1726] What greater love can one friend show towards another than to say to him, Ask of me what you will, and I will give it you.[1727] This is what the Lord says to each one of us. God is Lord of all things. He promises to give us as much as we ask him for; if, then, we are poor, the fault is our own, because we do not ask him for the graces of which we stand in need. And it is on this account that mental prayer is morally necessary for all; inasmuch as when prayer is laid aside, while we are involved in this world's cares, we pay but little attention to the soul; but when we practise it we discover the wants of the soul, and then ask for the corresponding graces and obtain them. The whole life of the saints has been one of meditation and prayer; and all the graces by means of which they have become saints have been received by them in answer to their prayers. If, therefore, we would be saved and become saints, we ought ever to stand at the gates of the divine mercy to beg and pray for, as an alms, all that we stand in need of. We need humility: let us ask for it and we shall be humble. We need patience under tribulations: let us ask for it and we shall be patient. The divine love is what we desire: let us ask for it, and we shall obtain it. Ask and it shall be given you? is God's promise, which cannot fail.

And Jesus Christ, in order to inspire us with the greater confidence in our prayers, has promised us that whatever be the graces which we shall ask of the Father in his name, for the sake of either his love or his merits, the Father will give us them all: Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name He will give it you.[1728] And in another place he says: Whatsoever ye shall ask of me myself in my name, through my merits, I will grant it: If you shall ask me anything in my name, that I will do.[1729] Yes; because it is of faith that whatever God can do can also be done by Jesus Christ, who is his Son.

PRAYER OF ST. BONAVENTURE TO JESUS CHRIST, TO OBTAIN HIS HOLY LOVE

Most sweet Jesus, pierce the interior of my soul with the sweet wound of Thy love, that my soul may ever languish and be dissolved with Thy love and with the desire of possessing Thee, and long to quit this life, that it may come to be perfectly united with Thee in a blessed eternity. Grant that my soul may ever thirst after Thee, speak only to Thee, find Thee, and do all for Thy glory. Grant that my heart may be ever fixed on Thee who art my only hope, my riches, my peace, my refuge, my confidence, my treasure, and my inheritance,

PRAYER TO THE EVER-BLESSED VIRGIN, TO OBTAIN THE LOVE OF JESUS AND A HAPPY DEATH

O Mary! thou who so much desirest to see Jesus loved, if thou lovest me this is the favour that I now ask of thee, to obtain for me a great love for Jesus Christ. Thou obtainest from thy Son whatever thou pleasest; pray, then, for me, and console me. Obtain for me a great love for thee, who of all creatures art the most loving and beloved of God. And through that grief which thou didst suffer on Calvary, when thou didst behold Jesus expire on the cross, obtain for me a happy death, that by loving Jesus and thee, my Mother, I may come to love you both forever in heaven.

HYMN. ON THE LOVE OF GOD

BY MONSIGNORE FALCOJA

O God of loveliness!
O Lord of Heaven above! How worthy to possess
My heart's devoted love! So sweet Thy countenance, So gracious to behold,
That one, one only glance To me were bliss untold. Thou art blest Three in One, Yet undivided still;
Thou art that One alone Whose love my heart can fill. The heavens, the earth below, Were fashioned by Thy Word;
My God, my dearest Love! My God for evermore! My soul's true life above! Thee does my heart adore. No love on earth I own, For nought on earth 1 sigh; For love of Thee alone I faint away, I die.
Were hearts as countless mine As sands upon the shore, All should in choir combine To love Thee evermore. And every heart should yearn With tenderest desire,
How amiable art Thou, And in my bosom burn
My ever-dearest Lord! With flames of holiest fire.
To think Thou art my God, O Loveliness supreme,
O thought for ever blest! And Beauty infinite!
My heart has overflowed O ever-flowing stream,
With joy within my breast. And ocean of delight!
My soul so full of bliss O Life by which I live,
Is plunged, as in a sea, My truest life above!
Deep in the sweet abyss To Thee alone I give
Of holy charity. My undivided love.
No object here below Death even, for Thy sake
Awakens my desire; I count to be no loss;
No suffering nor woe And sweet repose I take,
Can grief or pain inspire. For Thee, on every cross.
The world I could despise, Could I but love Thee still Though it were all of gold; In the dark pit of hell, Thee only do I prize, E'en there, to do Thy will,
O mine of wealth untold! I should not fear to dwell.

II

THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST

THE POWER OF THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST TO ENKINDLE THE DIVINE LOVE IN EVERY HEART

I. WHAT THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST HAS DONE FOR GOD AND FOR US

Father Balthassar Alvarez, a great servant of God, used to say that we must not think we have made any progress in the way of God until we have come to keep Jesus crucified ever in our heart. And St. Francis de Sales said that "the love which is not the offspring of the Passion is feeble." Yes, because we cannot have a more powerful motive for loving God than the Passion of Jesus Christ, by which we know that the Eternal Father, to manifest to us his exceeding love for us, was pleased to send his only begotten Son upon earth to die for us sinners. Whence the Apostle says that God, through the excess of love wherewith he loved us, willed that the death of his Son should convey life to us: For His exceeding charity wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together in Christ.[1730] And this was precisely the expression used by Moses and Elias on Mount Tabor, in speaking of the Passion of Jesus Christ. They did not know how to give it any other appellation than an excess of love: And they spoke of His excess, which He should consummate in Jerusalem.[1731]

When our Saviour came into the world, the shepherds heard the angels singing, Glory to God in the highest,[1732] But the humiliation of the Son of God in becoming man, through his love for man, might have seemed rather to obscure than to manifest the divine glory; but no; there was no means by which the glory of God could have been better manifested to the world than by Jesus Christ dying for the salvation of mankind, since the Passion of Jesus Christ has made us know how great is the mercy of God, in that a God was willing to die to save sinners, and to die, moreover, by a death so painful and ignominious. St. John Chrysostom says that the Passion of Jesus Christ was not an ordinary suffering, nor his death a simple death like that of other men.[1733] It has made us know the divine wisdom. Had our Redeemer been merely God, he could not have made satisfaction for man; for God could not make satisfaction to himself in place of man; nor could God make satisfaction by means of suffering, being impassible. On the other hand, had he been merely man, man could not have made satisfaction for the grievous injury done by him to the divine majesty. What, then, did God do? He sent his own very Son, true God with the Father, to take human flesh, that so as man he might by his death pay the debt due to the divine justice, and as God might make to it full satisfaction.

It has, moreover, made us know how great is the divine justice. St. John Chrysostom says that God reveals to us the greatness of his justice, not so much by hell in which he punishes sinners, as by the sight of Jesus on the cross; since in hell creatures are punished for the sins of their own, but on the cross we behold a God cruelly treated in order to make satisfaction for the sins of men.

What obligation had Jesus Christ to die for us? He was offered because it was His own will.[1734] He might have justly abandoned man to his perdition; but his love for us would not let him see us lost; wherefore he chose to give himself up to so painful a death in order to obtain for us salvation: He hath loved us, and delivered Himself up for us.[1735] From all eternity he had loved man: I have loved thee with an everlasting love.[1736] But then, seeing that his justice obliged him to condemn him, and to keep him at a distance separated from himself in hell, his mercy urged him to find out a way by which he might be able to save him. But how? By making satisfaction himself to the divine justice by his own death. And consequently he willed that there should be affixed to the cross whereon he died the sentence of condemnation to eternal death which man had merited, in order that it might remain there cancelled in his blood. Blotting out the writing of the decree that was against us, which was contrary to us, He hath taken the same out of the way, fastening it to the cross.[1737] And thus, through the merits of his own blood, he pardons all our sins: Forgiving you all offences.[1738] And at the same time he spoiled the devils of the rights they had acquired over us, carrying along with him in triumph as well our enemies as ourselves, who were their prey. And despoiling the principalities and powers, He Hath exposed them confidently in open show, triumphing over them in Himself.[1739]

On which Theophylact comments, "As a conqueror in triumph, carrying with him the booty and the enemy."[1740] Hence, when satisfying the divine justice on the cross, Jesus Christ speaks but of mercy. He prays his Father to have mercy on the very Jews who had contrived his death, and on his murderers who were putting him to death: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.[1741] While He was on the cross, instead of punishing the two thieves, who had just before reviled him, And they that were crucified with Him reviled Him,[1742] when he heard one asking for mercy, Lord, remember me when Thou shalt come into Thy kingdom,[1743]—overflowing with mercy, he promises him Paradise that very day: This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise.[1744] Then, before he expired, he gave to us, in the person of John, his own mother to be our mother: He saith to the disciple, Behold thy mother.[1745] There upon the cross he declares himself content in having done everything to obtain salvation for us, and he makes perfect the sacrifice by his death: Afterwards Jesus, knowing that all things were now accomplished, . . . said, It is consummated; and bowing His head, He gave up the ghost.[1746]

And behold, by the death of Jesus Christ, man is set free from sin and from the power of the devil; and, moreover, is raised to grace, and to a greater degree of grace, than Adam lost: And where sin abounded, says St. Paul, grace did more abound.[1747] It remains therefore for us, writes the Apostle, to have frequent recourse with all confidence to this throne of grace, which Jesus crucified exactly is, in order to receive from his mercy the grace of salvation, together with aid to overcome the temptations of the world and of hell! Let us go therefore with confidence to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in seasonable aid.[1748] Ah, my Jesus, I love Thee above all things, and whom would I wish to love if I love not thee, who art infinite goodness, and who hast died for me? Would that I could die of grief every time I thin-k how I had driven Thee away from my soul by my sins, and separated myself from Thee, who art my only good, and who hast loved me so much. Who shall separate us from the charity of Christ?[1749] It is sin only that can separate me from Thee. But I hope, in the blood Thou hast shed for me, that Thou wilt never allow me to separate myself from Thy love, and to lose Thy grace, which I prize more than every other good. I give myself wholly to Thee. Do Thou accept me, and draw all my affections to Thyself, that so I may love none but Thee.

II. WHAT THE PASSION OF JESUS CHRIST REQUIRES OF US

Does Jesus Christ, perhaps, claim too much in wishing us to give ourselves wholly to him, after he has given to us all his blood and his life, in dying for us upon the cross? The charity of Christ presseth us.[1750] Let us hear what St. Francis de Sales says upon these words: "To know that Jesus has loved us unto death, and that the death of the cross, is not this to feel our hearts constrained by a violence which is the stronger in proportion to its loveliness?" And then he adds, "My Jesus gives himself all to me, and I give myself all to him. On his bosom will I live and die. Neither death nor life shall ever separate me from him."[1751]

It was for this end, says St. Paul, that Jesus Christ died, that each of us should no longer live to the world nor to himself, but to Him alone who has given himself wholly to us. And Christ died for all, that they who live may not now live to themselves, but unto Him who died for them.[1752] He who lives to the world seeks to please the world; he who lives to himself seeks to please himself; but he who lives to Jesus Christ seeks only to please Jesus Christ, and fears only to displease him. His only joy is to see him loved; his only sorrow, to see him despised. This is to live to Jesus Christ; and this is what he claims from each one of us. I repeat, does he claim too much from us, after having given us his blood and his life? Wherefore, then, O my God! do we employ our affections in loving creatures, relatives, friends, the great ones of the world, who have never suffered for us scourges, thorns, or nails, nor shed one drop of blood for us; and not in loving a God, who for love of us came down from heaven and was made man, and has shed all his blood for us in the midst of torments, and finally died of grief upon a cross, in order to win to himself our hearts!

Moreover, in order to unite himself more closely to us, he has left himself, after his death, upon our altars, where he makes himself one with us, that we might understand how burning is the love wherewith he loves us? " He hath mingled himself with us," exclaims St. John Chrysostom,"[1753]that we may be one and the same thing; for this is the desire of those who ardently love." And St. Francis de Sales, speaking of the Holy Communion, adds: "There is no action in which we can think of our Saviour as more tender or more loving than this, in which he, as it were, annihilates himself, and reduces himself to food, in order to unite himself to the hearts of his faithful." But how comes it, O Lord! that I, after having been loved by Thee to such an excess, have had the heart to despise Thee? According to Thy just reproach, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have despised me.[1754] I have dared to turn my back upon Thee, in order to gratify my senses. Thou hast cast me behind Thy back.[1755] I have dared to drive Thee from my soul, The wicked have said to God, Depart from us.[1756]

I have dared to afflict that heart of Thine which has loved me so much. And what, then, am I now to do? Ought I to be distrustful of Thy mercy? I curse the days wherein I have dishonoured Thee. Oh, would that I had died a thousand times, O my Saviour, rather than that I had ever offended Thee! O Lamb of God! Thou hast bled to death upon the cross to wash away our sins in Thy blood. O sinners! what would you not pay on the day of judgment for one drop of the blood of this Lamb? O my Jesus! have pity on me, and pardon me; but Thou knowest my weakness; take, then, my will, that it may never more rebel against Thee. Expel from me all love that is not for Thee. I choose Thee alone for my treasure and my only good. Thou art sufficient for me; and I desire no other good apart from Thee. The God of my heart) and God is my portion forever. 1 O little sheep, beloved of God (so used St. Teresa to call the Blessed Virgin), who art the Mother of the divine Lamb, recommend me to thy Son. Thou, after Jesus, art my hope; for thou art the hope of sinners. To thy hands I entrust my eternal salvation. Spes nostra, salve.

III. A SWEET ENTERTAINMENT FOR SOULS THAT LOVE GOD, AT THE SIGHT OF JESUS CRUCIFIED

1. SUFFERINGS OF JESUS ON THE CROSS

O Jesus on the cross! O stupendous sight for heaven and earth of mercy and of love! To see the Son of God dying through pain upon a gibbet of infamy, condemned as a malefactor to so bitter and shameful a death, in order to save sinful men from the penalty that was due to them! This sight has ever been, and will always be, the subject of the contemplation of the saints, and has led them willingly to renounce all the goods of the earth, and to embrace with great courage sufferings and death, that they might make themselves more pleasing to a God who died for love of them. The sight of Jesus despised between two thieves has made them love contempt far more than worldlings have loved the honours of the world. Beholding Jesus covered with wounds upon the cross, they hold in abhorrence the pleasures of sense, and have endeavoured to afflict their flesh in order to unite their sufferings to the sufferings of the Crucified. Beholding the patience of our Saviour in his death, they have joyfully accepted the most painful sicknesses, and even the most cruel torments that tyrants can inflict. Lastly, from beholding the love of Jesus Christ in being willing to sacrifice his life for us in a sea of sorrows, they have sought to sacrifice to him all that they had, possessions, children, and even light itself.

St. Paul, in speaking of the love which the Eternal Father has borne towards us, in that, when he saw us dead by reason of sin, he willed to restore life to us by sending his Son to die for us, calls it too great a love. But God, who is rich in mercy for his exceeding charity where with He loved us, hath quickened us together in Christ.[1757] And in the same way ought we to call the love wherewith Jesus Christ has willed to die for us too great a love. Hence the same apostle says, We preach Jesus Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the Gentiles, foolishness.[1758] St. Paul says that the death of Jesus Christ appeared to the Jews a stumbling-block, because they thought that he should have appeared on earth full of worldly majesty, and not indeed as one condemned to die like a criminal upon a cross. On the other hand, to the Gentiles it seemed a folly that a God should be willing to die, and by such a death too, for his creatures. On this subject St. Laurence Justinian remarks: "We have seen Him who is wise infatuated through an excess of love."[1759] We have beheld Him who is the eternal wisdom itself, the Son of God, become a fool for us, by reason of the too great love which he bore towards us.

And does it not seem a folly for a God, almighty and supremely happy in himself, to be willing of his own accord to subject himself to be scourged, treated as a mock king, buffeted, spit upon in the face, condemned to die as a malefactor, abandoned by all upon a cross of shame, and this to save the miserable worms he himself had created? The loving St. Francis, when he thought of this, went about the country exclaiming with tears, " Love is not loved! Love is not loved!" And hence St. Bonaventure says that he who wishes to keep his love for Jesus Christ ought always to represent him to himself hanging on the cross; and dying there for us. "Let him ever have before the eyes of his heart Christ dying upon the cross."[1760] Oh, happy is that soul which frequently sets before its eyes Jesus dying on the cross, and stops to contemplate with tenderness the pains which Jesus has suffered, and the love wherewith he offered himself to the Father, while he lay agonizing on that bed of sorrow. Souls that love God, when they find themselves more than usually harassed by temptations of the devil and by fears about their eternal salvation, derive great comfort by considering in silence and alone Jesus hanging on the cross, and shedding blood from all his wounds. At the sight of the crucifix, all desires for the goods of this world flee utterly away. From that cross exhales a heavenly breath, which causes us to forget all earthly objects, and enkindles within us a holy desire of quitting all things, in order to employ all our affections in loving that Lord who has pleased to die through love for us. Isaias foretold that our Redeemer would be a man of sorrows. And we have seen him . . . despised, and the most abject of men, a man of sorrows.[1761]

Now let him who wishes to behold this man of sorrows, foretold by Isaias, look on Jesus Christ dying on the cross. There, nailed by his hands and feet, he hangs, the whole weight of his body pressing on his wounds in all his members, which are every one of them torn and bruised. He suffers continual and excruciating pains; whichever way he turns, so far from finding relief, his pain but increases more and more, until it deprives him of life; and thus this man of sorrows is condemned by the Father to die of sheer sufferings on account of our sins. What Christian, then, O my Jesus! knowing by faith that Thou hast died upon the cross for love of him, can live without loving Thee! Pardon me, then, O Lord! first of all, this great sin of having lived so many years in the world without loving Thee. My beloved Saviour, the thought of death fills me with dread, as being the moment when I shall give an account to Thee of all the sins that I have committed against Thee; but that blood that I see flowing from Thy wounds causes me to hope for pardon from Thee, and at the same time the grace of loving Thee for the future with my whole heart, by virtue of those merits Thou hast earned by so many pains. I give myself wholly to Thee; I will no longer be my own; I desire to do all; I desire to suffer in order to please Thee. I will die for Thee who hast died for me: I will say to Thee, with St. Francis, " May I die for love of the love of Thee, who didst vouchsafe to die for love of the love of me."[1762]

2. DEATH OF JESUS

Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit.[1763] These words, uttered by Jesus Christ upon the cross when he was on the point of death, bring great comfort to the dying, who find themselves engaged in that last combat with hell, and are about to pass into eternity. My beloved Jesus, I will not wait for the moment of my death to recommend my soul to Thee. From this moment I recommend it to Thee. By that blood shed for me, permit it not to be separated from Thee. Hence forth I will be Thine, and all Thine without reserve. If Thou seest that I should ever turn my back upon Thee, as I have in times past, I beseech Thee, let me die in this moment in which I hope to be in Thy grace.

In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever.[1764] O faithful soul! lift up thine eyes, and look at the cross of thy Redeemer, now dead for the love of thee. Say to him: O my Jesus! in Thy flesh lacerated and torn by the scourges, the thorns, the nails, I behold the burning love Thou hast borne me, and the ingratitude I have shown Thee; but Thy blood is my hope. Wretch that I am, how often have I renounced Thy grace, and have myself willed to condemn myself to hell. What would become of me if Thou hadst not chosen to die for me? I could die of grief every time I think of having despised Thine infinite goodness, and of having of my own accord banished and separated Thee from my soul. But no; henceforth, with the help of Thy grace, I will leave all. Enough for me to be united with Thee, my God and my all! O men, O men! how can you show such contempt for a God who has suffered so much for you? Behold him on that cross, how he sacrifices himself by death to pay for your sins, and to gain your affections. My Jesus, I will live no longer ungrateful for such goodness. O wounds of Jesus, wound me with love! O blood of Jesus, inebriate me with love! O death of Jesus, make me die to every affection which is not for Jesus! I love Thee more than myself, O my Jesus! and there is no pain that causes me more sorrow than the thought of having so often despised Thy love. Accept me; in Thy mercy reject me not, now that I give myself to Thee without reserve.

Behold, lastly, how our Saviour, overwhelmed with sufferings upon the cross, bows his head, and breathes forth his soul: And bowing His head, He gave up the ghost.[1765] Eternal God, I, a wretched sinner, have dishonoured Thee by my evil life; but Jesus Christ, in making satisfaction for me by his death, has abundantly restored Thy honour. By the merits of Thy Son, who hast died for me, have pity on me. O Jesus, my Saviour! I see Thee now dead on this cross. Thou speakest no more; Thou breathest no more; because Thou hast life no longer, having willed to lose it to give life to our souls. Thou hast no longer any blood; for Thou hast shed it all, by dint of torments, to wash away our sins. In one word, Thou hast abandoned Thyself to death through Thy love for us. He hath loved us, and delivered Himself for us[1766] "Let us consider," writes St. Francis de Sales, "this divine Saviour stretched upon the cross, as upon his altar of honour, where he is dying of love for us; but a love more painful than that very death. Ah, why, then, do we not in spirit throw ourselves upon him to die upon the cross with him, who has willed to die there for love of us? I will hold h im, we ought to say, and will never let him go. I will die with him, and be burned up in the flames of his love.

One and the same fire shall consume this divine Creator and his miserable creature. My Jesus is all mine, and I am all his. I will live and die upon his breast; neither death nor life shall ever separate him from me."[1767] Yes, my sweet Redeemer, I embrace with tenderness Thy pierced feet; and, filled with confidence in beholding Thee dead for love of me, I repent of having despised Thee, and I love Thee with my whole soul. At the foot of Thy cross I leave Thee my heart and my will. Do Thou Thyself nail it to this cross, so that it may never be separated from Thee, and henceforth may have no other desire than to please Thee alone.

3. FRUITS OF THE DEATH OF JESUS

St. John writes that our Saviour, in order to make his disciples understand the death he was to suffer upon the cross, said, And, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all things to Myself. Now this he said, signifying what death he should die?[1768] And, in fact, by exhibiting himself crucified and dead, how many souls has Jesus drawn to himself, so that they have left all to give themselves up entirely to his divine love. Ah, my Jesus! draw my soul to Thyself, which was one time lost; draw it by the chains of Thy love, so that it may forget the world to think of nothing else but of loving and pleasing Thee. Draw me after Thee by the odour of Thine ointments.[1769] O my Lord, Thou knowest my weakness and the offences that I have committed against Thee. Draw me out of the mire of my passions; draw all my affections to Thyself, so that I may attend to nothing but Thy pleasure only, O my God, most lovely! Hear me, O Lord! by the merits of Thy death, and make me wholly Thine.

St. Leo tells us that he who looks with confidence upon Jesus dead upon the cross is healed of the wounds caused by his sins. "They who with faith behold the death of Christ are healed from the wounds of sin."[1770] Every Christian, therefore, should keep Jesus crucified always before his eyes, and say with St. Paul, I judged not myself to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.[1771] In short, the Apostle says, that he did not desire any other knowledge in this world than that of knowing how to love Jesus Christ crucified. My beloved Saviour, to obtain for me a good death Thou hast chosen a death so full of pain and desolation! I cast myself into the arms of Thy mercy. I see that many years ago I ought to have been in hell, separated from Thee forever, for having at one time despised Thy grace; but Thou hast called me to penance, and I hope hast pardoned me; but if through my fault Thou hast not yet pardoned me, pardon me at this moment. I repent, O my Jesus! with my heart, for having turned my back upon Thee, and driven Thee from my soul. Restore me to Thy grace. But that is not enough: give me strength to love Thee with all my soul during my whole life. And when I come to the hour of my death, let me expire burning with love for Thee, and saying, my Jesus, I love Thee, I love Thee, and thus continue to love Thee for all eternity. From this moment I unite my death to Thy holy death, through which I hope for my salvation. In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever[1772] O great mother of God, thou after Jesus art my hope. In thee, O Lady, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever. O devout souls, when the devil wishes to make us distrustful about our salvation by the remembrance of our past sins, let us lift up our eyes to Jesus dead upon the cross, in order to deliver us from eternal death. After a God has made us know by means of the holy faith the desires he has of our salvation, having even sacrificed his life for us, if we are resolved really to love him for the remainder of our lives, cost what it may, we should be on our guard against any weakness of confidence in his mercy. After he has given us so many signs of his love for us, and of his desire for our salvation, it is a kind of sin against him not to put our whole confidence and hope in his goodness.

Full, then, of holy confidence, let us hope for every good from the hands of a God so liberal and so loving; and at the same time let us give ourselves to him without reserve, and thus pray to him: O eternal God, we are sinners, but Thou who art Almighty canst make us saints; grant that henceforth we may neglect nothing that we know to be for Thy glory, and may do all to please Thee. Blessed shall we be if we lose all to gain Thee, the infinite good. Grant that we may spend the remainder of our lives in pleasing Thee alone. Punish us as Thou wilt for our past sins, but deliver us from the chastisement of not being able to love Thee; deprive us of all things save Thyself. Thou hast loved us without reserve; we also will love Thee without reserve, O infinite Love, O infinite Good. O Virgin Mary, draw us wholly to God; thou canst do so; do so for the love that thou hast for Jesus Christ.

4. CONCLUSION

Let us finish this little treatise with the prayer of St. Francis de Sales, saying: "O Eternal Love, my soul seeks Thee and chooses Thee for all eternity. Come, O Holy Spirit! and kindle in our hearts the fire of Thy love. To die and to love; to die to everything, in order to live eternally for the love of Jesus. O Saviour of our souls, grant that we may sing forever and ever, Live, Jesus! I love Jesus. Live, Jesus, whom I love! I love Jesus, who liveth and reigneth forever and ever. Amen!"[1773]

5. Ah, my Jesus! and who, seeing that Thou, the Son of God, hast willed to end Thy life by so bitter a death for love of us, will be so hard and ungrateful of heart as to be able to love anything in the world but Thee, or to prefer before Thee any of the miserable good things of earth? My God and my all, I prefer Thee before all the knowledge, all the wealth, all the riches, all the glories and hopes, and all the gifts that Thou canst bestow upon me. Thou art all my good. Thou art infinitely amiable; and how can I love any but Thee? Every gift, therefore, which is not Thyself, is not sufficient for me, does not satisfy me; Thee only do I desire, and nothing more. And if for my sins it be Thy will to punish me, punish me by the deprivation of everything, but deprive me not of Thyself. Thou alone art sufficient for me; I repeat, I desire Thee alone and nothing more. I desire to spend the remainder of my life in loving and pleasing Thee. What have the saints not done to please Thee? They have stripped themselves of all their possessions, have renounced the greatest dignities of the world, and have welcomed as treasures contempt, torments, and the most cruel deaths that the cruelty of tyrants could contrive. O Lord! I now understand that Thou hast created us to love and please Thee. In past time I was wretched enough, instead of pleasing Thee, to cause Thee so much displeasure. What do I say? I could die of grief at the very thought. I hope that now Thou hast pardoned me for Thy mercy's sake. Since Thou hast now pardoned me, I give Thee my whole will, my whole self. Take possession of me forever; make me all Thine. Draw me ever closer within Thy heart. Banish from me every love that is not Thee, who art my only good, my only Love. O Mary, Mother of God! thou after Jesus art my hope. I ask of God the grace to be wholly his; this is his only desire for us. Thou canst do all things with God; thou must obtain for me this grace. O divine Love, how is it that Thou art so despised by men? O men, look at the Son of God upon that cross, who like a lamb is sacrificing himself by a painful death to pay for your sins, and so to gain your love; look at him, and love him.My Jesus, worthy of infinite love, let me not live any longer ungrateful for such goodness. In past time I have thought but little of corresponding to the love that Thou hast borne me; for the future I will only think of loving and pleasing Thee. Let us strip ourselves of all self-love, and of all earthly affections, to give our will wholly, wholly to God without reserve. O Lord! dispose of me and of all belonging to me for life and death as Thou wilt: I only will what Thou willest. My only desire is to love Thee always in this life and for all eternity. And what will I but Thee alone, O God of my heart? O blood of my Jesus, inebriate me with the love of Jesus! O wounds of Jesus, pierce me with the love of Jesus! O death of Jesus, make me die to every love that is not for Jesus! My Jesus, I love Thee above all things; I love Thee with my whole soul; I love Thee more than myself. My beloved Lord, give me Thy love, and make me all Thine. O Mary, my Mother! again I beg of thee, make me all for Jesus. Thou canst do so; I hope it from thee.

DEVOUT ASPIRATIONS

O loving Heart of Jesus! inflame this poor heart of mine. My Jesus, when shall I begin to love Thee as Thou hast loved me? My God, when shall I die to everything, to live to Thee alone?

My beloved One, make me love Thee even in sufferings. Thou hast loved me without reserve; I also will love Thee without reserve. My Jesus, make Thyself known and loved by all. My Jesus, grant that I may die, saying, I love Thee, I love Thee. My God, suffer me not to lose Thee forever. Give me the grace to love Thee, and then do with me what Thou wilt. At this hour I might have been in hell; but now I love Thee, and I hope always to love Thee. And what else do I wish for, O my God! but Thee, who art my chief, my only good? My Jesus, in the Day of Judgment do not separate me from Thee. My Jesus, how lovely art Thou, but by how few art Thou loved! Oh that I could die of grief every time that I think of having voluntarily lost Thee! My Jesus, grant me Thy love, and I ask Thee for nothing more. Thou hast died for me; I wish also to die for Thee. O death of Jesus! from thee I hope for a good death. O blood of Jesus! from thee I hope for the pardon of all my sins. O wounds of Jesus! from you I hope to love Jesus forever. O agony of Jesus! from thee I hope to bear peacefully the agony of my death. O sorrows of Jesus! from you I hope for patience in all contradictions. O scourges of Jesus! deliver me from everlasting despair. O tears of Mary! obtain for me sorrow for my sins. My own St. Joseph, by thy happy death obtain for me a good death. O ye holy Apostles! by your blessed death obtain for me the grace to die in the love of God. And what wish I, either in this life or in the next, but Thee alone, my God? My Jesus, had I died in sin, I could no more love Thee; now I desire to love Thee, and Thee alone. My God, I love Thee, and I will love none but Thee. St. Teresa, St. Philip Neri, my advocates, make me burn with love for Jesus, as you yourselves did burn. My Jesus, by the pain Thou didst endure when Thy left hand was pierced with the nail, give me a true sorrow for my sins. My Jesus, by the pain Thou didst endure when Thy right hand was pierced with the nail, give me perseverance in Thy grace. My Jesus, by the pain Thou didst endure when Thy left foot was pierced with the nail, deliver me from the pains of hell. My Jesus, by the pain Thou didst endure when Thy right foot was pierced with the nail, give me the grace to love Thee eternally in heaven. My Jesus, by the wound that was made in Thy Sacred Heart, give me the grace to love Thee always in this life and in the. next. Live, Jesus, our Love, And Mary, our Hope.

HYMN. ON THE LOVE WHICH JESUS BEARS TO THE SOUL

Oh, it were joy and high reward, Transpierced with wound of love, to die For that most lovely, loving God For whom alone all hearts should sigh. Such is his beauty, such his grace, That stars of heaven, or gems of earth, Compared with that divinest face Lose their loveliness and worth. He seeks his prey with skill divine, He draws his bow, the arrow flies; The heart is pierced, and forced to pine With love for him for whom it dies. To wound those souls he longs to gain, The charm of varied guise he found, And all to make those hearts remain Close to his heart for ever bound. For this the Word Divine appears On earth, a babe, so poor, so weak; And from our hearts, with infant tears, All love, he came our love to seek. In youth He next is seen again A lowly humble artisan,

And God's own Son does not disdain The vilest services of man.

At last a criminal in chains Himself unto his spouse he shows; And thus his life of varied pains He ends amid the direst woes. His love does more; in form of bread To give himself he yet desires; Ther e with himself the soul is fed That loves and to his love aspires. His love knows every winning way; He spares no toil, he fears no pain, To make another heart his prey, Or truer love from it to gain. Sometimes he loves to banish fear, With all the sweetness of a spouse; Anon he shows a look severe: 'Tis all fresh fervor to arouse. Of old he deigned my heart to woo, And bound me with love's fiery chains; Then seized my heart his hostage true, And jealous still his prey retains. Then silence, wicked world! d epart, Seek not esteem or love of mine; Another Lover owns my heart, His charms are other far than thine.

III

CONFORMITY TO THE WILL OF GOD[1774]

I. EXCELLENCE OF THIS VIRTUE

OUR whole perfection consists in loving God, who is in himself most lovely: Charity is the bond of perfection.[1775] But, then, all perfection in the love of God consists in the union of our own with his most holy will. This, indeed, is the principal effect of love; as St. Dionysius the Areopagite observes, "such a union of the will of those who love as makes it to become one and the same will."[1776] And therefore the more united a person is with the divine will, so much greater will be his love. It is quite true that mortifications, meditations, Communions, and works of charity towards others are pleasing to God. But where is this the case? When they are done in conformity to his will; for otherwise, not only does he not approve them, but he abominates and punishes them. Suppose that there are two servants, one of whom labours hard and incessantly throughout the day, but will do everything after his own fashion; while the other does not work so much, but acts always in obedience to orders: is it not certain that the latter, and not the former, is the one who pleases his master?

In what respect do any works of ours serve to the glory of God, where they are not done according to his good pleasure? It is not sacrifices that the Lord desires, says the prophet to Saul, but obedience to his will: Does the Lord desire holocausts and victims, and not rather that the voice of the Lord should be obeyed?[1777] To refuse to obey is like the crime of idolatry. He who will act from his own will, independently of that of God, commits a kind of idolatry; since in that case, instead of worshipping the divine will, he worships, in a certain sense, his own. The greatest glory, then, that we can give to God is the fulfilment in everything of his holy will. This is what our Redeemer, whose object in coming upon earth was the establishment of the glory of God, principally came to teach us by his example. See how St. Paul makes him address his eternal Father: Sacrifice and oblation Thou wouldst not; but a body Thou hast fitted to Me: then said I, Behold, I come, that I should do Thy will.[1778] O God? Thou hast refused to accept the victims which mankind have offered Thee. It is Thy will that I should sacrifice to Thee the body which Thou hast given Me; lo, I am ready to perform that will of Thine. And hence it is that he so often declares that he had come upon earth not to fulfil his own, but his Father's will only: I came down from heaven, not to do my own will, but the will of Him that sent Me?[1779]

And on this account he wished that the world might have known the love which he bore toward his Father, from the obedience to his will which he manifested in sacrificing himself upon the cross for the salvation of mankind; just as he said himself in the garden, when going forth to meet his enemies, who had come to take him and lead him away to death: That the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father hath given Me commandment, so do I: arise, let us go hence.[1780] And for this reason, too, it was that he said that he would recognize as a brother of his own him who should have acted according to the divine will: Whosoever shall do the will of My Father, he is My brother. [1781] On this account it is that all the saints have ever kept steadfastly in view the fulfilment of the divine will, thoroughly understanding that herein consists the entire perfection of a soul. The blessed Henry Suso used to say, "God does not desire that we should abound in knowledge, but that in all things we should submit ourselves to his will." And St. Teresa, "All that one who devotes himself to prayer has need to acquire is the conformity of his own will to the divine; and he may rest assured that herein consists the highest perfection. Whoever practises this best will receive from God the greatest gifts, and will make most progress in the interior life."[1782] The Dominican nun the Blessed Stephana of Soncino, being one day, in a vision, carried into heaven, saw certain persons who had died, and with whom she had been acquainted, stationed amongst the seraphim; and it was told her that these had been raised to so high a position in glory through the perfect conformity to God's will which they had practised on earth.

And the Blessed Suso already mentioned used to say, when speaking of himself: "I would much rather be the vilest worm of earth through God's will than a seraph through my own." While we are in this world, we should learn from the blessed in heaven the way in which we have to love God. The pure and perfect love which the blessed in heaven entertain for God lies in their own perfect union with the divine will. Should the seraphim understand it to be his will that they must employ themselves for all eternity in gathering into a heap the sands of the sea-shore, or in plucking up the grass from the gardens, they would willingly do it with all possible pleasure. Nay, more: if God were to give them to understand that they should go to burn in the flames of hell, they would immediately precipitate themselves into that abyss, in order to accomplish the divine will. And it is this that Jesus Christ has taught us to pray, namely, that we may perform the divine will on earth, as the saints perform it in heaven: Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.[1783] The Lord calls David a man after his own heart, because David accomplished all his desires: I have found a man according to My own heart, who shall do all My wills.[1784] David was ever prepared to embrace the divine will, as he frequently declared: My heart is ready, O God; my heart is ready. [1785] And, on the other hand, the only prayer which he made to the Lord was that he would teach him to do his will: Teach me to do Thy will.[1786] A single act of perfect conformity to the divine will is sufficient to make one a saint.

Look at Saul, whom Jesus Christ illuminates and converts, while he is going on in his persecution of the Church. What does Saul do? what does he say? He simply makes an offering of himself to do the divine will: Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[1787] And, behold, the Lord declares him to be a vessel of election and apostle of the Gentiles*: This man is to Me a vessel of election, to carry My name before the Gentiles.*[1788] Yes, for he who gives his will to God gives him everything: he who gives him his goods in alms, his blood by disciplines, his food by fasting, gives to God a part of what he possesses; but he who gives him his will gives him the whole; so that he can say to him, Lord, I am poor, but I give Thee all that is in my power; in giving Thee my will, there remains nothing for me to give Thee. But this is precisely all that our God claims from us: My son, give Me thy heart.[1789] My son, says the Lord to each of us, My son, give Me thy heart; that is to say, thy will. "There is no offering," says St. Augustine, "that we can make to God more acceptable to himself than to say to him, Take possession of us." [1790] No, we cannot offer to God anything more precious than by saying to him, Lord, take possession of us; we give our whole will to Thee; make us understand what it is that Thou dost desire of us, and we will perform it. If, then, we would give a full satisfaction to the heart of God, we must bring our own will in everything into conformity with his; and not only into conformity, but into uniformity, too, as regards all that God ordains. Conformity signifies the conjoining of our own will to the will of God; but uniformity signifies, further, our making of the divine and our own will one will only, so that we desire nothing but what God desires, and his sole will becomes ours. This is the sum and substance of that perfection to which we ought to be ever aspiring; this is what must be the aim of all our works, and of all our desires, meditations, and prayers. For this we must invoke the assistance of all our patron saints and of our guardian angels, and, above all, of our divine Mother Mary, who ,vas the most perfect of all the saints, for the reason that she ever embraced most perfectly the divine will.

II. CONFORMITY IN ALL THINGS

But the chief point lies in our embracing the will of God in all things which befall us, not only when they are favourable, but when they are contrary to our desires. When things go on well, even sinners find no difficulty in being in a state of conformity to the divine will; but the saints are in conformity also under circumstances which run counter and are mortifying to self-love. It is herein that the perfection of our love for God is shown. The Venerable Father John Avila used to say, "A single Blessed be God, when things go contrary, is of more value than thousands of thanksgivings when they are to our liking." Moreover, we must bring ourselves into conformity to the divine will, not only as regards those adverse circumstances which come to us directly from God, such, for instance, as infirmities, desolations of spirit, poverty, the death of parents, and other things of a similar nature, but also as regards those which come to us through the instrumentality of men, as in the case of contumelies, reproaches, acts of injustice, thefts, and persecutions of every kind. On this point, we must understand that when we suffer injury from any one in our reputation, our honour, or our property, although the Lord does not will the sin which such a one commits, he nevertheless does will our humiliation, our poverty, and our mortification. It is certain and of faith, that everything that comes to pass in the world comes to pass through the divine will: I form the light and darkness, I make peace and create evil.[1791] From God come all things that are good and all things that are evil; that is to say, all things that are contrary to our own liking, and that we falsely call evil; for, in truth, they are good, when we receive them as coming from his hands: Shall there be.an evil in the city which the Lord hath not done?[1792] said the prophet Amos. And the Wise Man said it before: Good things and evil, life and death, are from God.[1793] It is true, as I observed above, that whenever any one unjustly treats you in an injurious manner, God does not will the sin which such a person commits, nor concur in the malice of his intentions; but he quite concurs, with a general concurrence, as regards the material action by which such a one wounds, plunders, or injures you; so that what you have to suffer is certainly willed by God, and comes to you from his hands. Hence it was that the Lord told David that he was the author of the injuries which Absalom would inflict upon him, even to the taking away his wives in his very presence; and that in punishment for his sins: Behold, I will raise up evil against thee out of thy own house, and I will take thy wives before thy eyes, and give them to thy neighbour.[1794]

Hence, too, he told the Jews that it would be as a punishment for their wickedness when he should have commanded the Assyrians to spoil and bring them to ruin: The Assyrian, he is the rod of My fury. . . . I will give him a charge to take away the spoils, and to lay hold on the prey;[1795] which St. Augustine explains, "The wickedness of these men is made to be, as it were, an axe of God."[1796] God uses the iniquity of the Assyrians, like an axe, to chastise the Jews. And Jesus himself said to St, Peter that his Passion and death did not come to him so much from men, as from his Father himself*: The chalice which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?*[1797] When the messenger (who is thought to have been the devil) came to Job to tell him that the Sabeans had taken all his goods away and had put his sons to death, what is the saint's reply? The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away[1798] He said not, the Lord hath given me sons and property, and the Sabeans have taken them away from me; but the Lord hath given them me, and the Lord hath taken them away; because he perfectly understood that that loss of his was willed by God; and therefore he added, As it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord.[1799]

We must not, then, look upon the troubles that befall us as happening by chance, or only through the fault of others; we must rest assured that everything that happens to us comes to pass through the divine will. "You should know," says St. Augustine, "that whatever happens in this world contrary to our will does not happen excepting through the will of God."[1800] Epictetus and Atho, blessed martyrs of Jesus Christ, when subjected to the torture by the tyrant, torn with hooks of iron and burnt with blazing torches, said nothing but this: "Lord, let Thy will be accomplished in us;" and on arriving at the place of their suffering, they exclaimed, in a loud voice, "Blessed be Thou, O everlasting God! because Thy will has been in everything fulfilled in us."[1801] Cæsarius relates of a certain religious that although there was in no respect any external difference between himself and the others, he had nevertheless arrived at such a degree of sanctity as to heal the sick by the mere touch of his clothes. His Superior, in astonishment at this, one day asked him how he could ever perform such miracles, while his life was not more exemplary than that of others. In reply, he said that it was a matter of astonishment to himself also, and that he did not know how to account for it. "But what devotions do you practise?" asked the Abbot. The good religious, in answer, said that he did but little or nothing in this respect; only that he had ever made it his great care to will that alone which God willed, and that the Lord had granted him the grace to keep his own will thoroughly abandoned in that of God. "Prosperity," he said, "does not elate me, nor does adversity cast me down, because I receive everything from the hands of God; and to this end it is that I direct all my prayers, namely, that his will may perfectly accomplish itself in me." "And with respect to that loss," rejoined the Superior, "which our enemy caused us the other day, by depriving us of our means of subsistence, setting fire to our farm-buildings where our corn and cattle were housed, did you not feel some resentment in consequence?" "No, my Father," was his reply; "but, on the contrary, I returned thanks to God for it, as is my custom in similar cases, knowing that God does and permits all for his own glory and for our greater good; and with this conviction, I am always content under every circumstance that comes to pass."[1802] The Abbot, understanding this, and seeing in that soul so great a conformity to the divine will, was no longer surprised at his performance of such great miracles.

III. HAPPINESS OBTAINED FROM PERFECT CONFORMITY

He who acts in this way does not only become a saint, but he enjoys, even in this world, a perpetual peace. Alphonsus the Great, King of Arragon, and a most wise prince, on being one day asked whom he considered to be the happiest man in the world, replied, He who abandons himself to the will of God, and receives all things, whether prosperous or adverse, as from his hands. To those who love God, all things work unto good.[1803] Those who love God are ever content, because their whole pleasure lies in the accomplishment, even in things that run counter to themselves, of the divine will; and hence even afflictions themselves are converted into their contentment, by the thought that in the acceptance of them they are giving pleasure to their Lord whom they love: Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad.[1804] And, in truth, what greater contentment can a man ever experience than in seeing the accomplishment of all that he desires? Now, whenever any one desires nothing save what God desires, since everything that comes to pass in the world (sin only excepted) always comes to pass through the will of God, everything that such a one desires does consequently come to pass.

There is a story in the lives of the Fathers of a certain countryman whose land was more productive than that of others, and who, on being asked how it happened, replied that no one should be surprised at it, because he always had such weather as he desired. " And how so?" it was asked. " Yes," replied he, " because I desire no weather but that which God desires; and as I desire what God desires, so does he give me the fruits of the earth as I desire them." Souls that are truly resigned, says Salvian, if they are in a state of humiliation, desire this; if they suffer poverty, they desir e to be poor; in short, whatever happens to them, they desire it all, and therefore they are, in this life, happy: "They are in humble station, they wish for this; they are poor, they make poverty their delight; therefore we must say of them that they are happy."[1805] When cold or heat, rain or wind, prevails, he who is in a state of union with the divine will says, I wish it to be cold, I wish it to be hot; I wish the wind to blow, the rain to fall, because God wishes it so. Does poverty, persecution, sickness, death arrive, I also wish (says such a one) to be poor, persecuted, sick; I wish even to die, because God wishes it thus. This is the beautiful liberty that the sons of God enjoy, worth more than all the domains and all the kingdoms of this world. This is that great peace that the saints experience, which surpasseth all understanding.[1806] with which all the pleasures of the senses, all gayeties, festivities, distinctions, and all other worldly satisfactions, cannot compete; for these, being, as they are, unsubstantial and transitory, although, while they last, they may be fascinating to the senses, nevertheless do not bring contentment, but affliction, to the spirit wherein true contentment resides.

So that Solomon, after having enjoyed such worldly pleasures to the full, cried out, in his affliction, But this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.[1807] The fool (says the Holy Spirit) is changed like the moon: the holy man continueth in wisdom like the sun.[1808] The fool that is to say, the sinner changes like the moon, which to-day grows, to-morrow wanes. To-day you will see him laughing, to-morrow weeping; to-day all gentleness, to-morrow furious like the tiger, And why so? because his contentment depends on the prosperity or the adversity that he meets with; and therefore he varies as the circumstances which befall him vary. Whereas the just man is like the sun, ever uniform in his serenity under whatever circumstances may come to pass; because his contentment lies in his uniformity to the divine will, and therefore he enjoys a peace that nothing can disturb: And on earth peace to men of good will.[1809] said the angel to the shepherds. And who can these men of good will ever be but those who are at all times in unison with the will of God, which is supremely good and perfect? The will of God is good, delightful, and perfect.[1810] Yes, because he wills only that which is best and most perfect. The saints, through their conformity to the divine will, have enjoyed in this world a paradise in anticipation. St. Dorotheus tells us that it was thus that the ancient Fathers kept themselves in profound peace, receiving all things as they did from the hands of God.

When St, Mary Magdalene of Pazzi heard mention only of the will of God, she used to experience so intense consolation that she fell into an ecstasy of love. And although, on the other hand, the sting of adverse circumstances will not fail to make itself felt, yet its influence will not extend beyond the lower part of our nature; for in the higher part of the soul there will reign peace and tranquillity while the will remains in union with that of God. Your joy (said the Redeemer to the Apostles) no man shall take from you. That your joy may be full.[1811] He who is ever in conformity to the divine will possesses a full and perpetual joy; full, because he has all that he wishes for, as was observed above; perpetual, because it is a joy of which no one can deprive him, while, at the same time, no one can prevent that which God wills from coming to pass. Father John Taulerus relates of himself that after having for many years prayed the Lord to send some one to instruct him in the true spiritual life, he one day heard a voice saying to him, "Go to such a church, and you will find what you ask for." On reaching the church, he finds at the gate a beggar, barefooted and with scarcely a rag on his back. He salutes him: a "Good day, my friend." The poor man replies, "Sir, I do not remember ever to have had a bad day." The Father rejoins, "God grant you a happy life;" to which he answers, "But I have never been unhappy." And then he goes on to say, "Listen, my Father; it is not without reason that I have told you that I have never had a bad day; because, when I suffer hunger, I praise God; when it snows or rains, I bless him; if I am treated with contempt, or repulsed by any, or if I experience misfortunes of any other kind, I always give glory to my God for it. I said, besides, that I have never been unhappy, and this also is true; because it is my habit to desire, without reservation, all that God desires; therefore, in all that happens to me, whether it be pleasant or painful, I receive it from his hands with joy, as being what is best for me; and herein lies my happiness."

"And if it should ever happen," says Taulerus, "that God willed you to be damned, what would you say then?" "If God were to will this," replied the beggar, "I would, with all humility and love, lock myself so fast in my Lord's embrace, and hold him so tight, that if it were to be his will to cast me down into hell, he would be obliged to come along with me; and thus, with him, it would then be sweeter to me to be in hell than to possess without him all the enjoyments of heaven." "Where was it that you found God?" said the Father. "I found him where I took leave of creatures," was the reply. "Who are you?" The poor man answered, "I am a king." "And where is your kingdom?" "It is within my soul, where I keep everything in due order; the passions are subjected to the reason, and the reason to God." In conclusion, Taulerus asked him what it was that had led him on to so high a degree of perfection? "It has been silence," said he, "observing silence with man, in order to hold converse with God; and also the union which I have maintained with my Lord, in whom I have found, and still do find, all my peace."[1812] Such, in short, had this poor man become through his union with the divine will; and certainly he was, in all his poverty, more wealthy than all the monarchs of the earth, and in his sufferings more happy than all the men of the world with their earthly pleasures.

IV. GOD WISHES ONLY OUR GOOD

Oh, great indeed is the folly of those who fight against the divine will! They have now to suffer troubles, because no one can ever prevent the accomplishment of the divine decrees: Who resisteth His will?[1813] And, on the other hand, they have to suffer them without deriving benefit from them; nay, even drawing down upon themselves greater chastisements in the next life, and greater disquietude in this: Who hath resisted Him, and hath had peace?[1814] Let the sick man make as great an outcry as he will about his pains; let him who is in poverty complain, rave, blaspheme against God as much as he pleases in his distresses, what will he gain by it, but the doubling of his affliction? "What are you in search of, O foolish man," says Augustine, "when seeking good things? Seek that one Good in whom are all things good."[1815] What are you going in search of, poor silly fellow, outside of thy God? Find God, unite yourself to his will, bind yourself up with it; and you will be ever happy, both in this life and in the other. And, in short, what is there that God wills but our good? Whom can we ever find to love us more than he? It is his will, not merely that no one should perish, but that all should save and sanctify themselves: Not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[1816] This is the will of God, your sanctification.[1817] It is in our good that God has placed his own glory, being, as St. Leo says, in his own nature goodness infinite, "God, whose nature is goodness," and it being the nature of goodness to desire to spread itself abroad, God has a supreme desire to make the souls of men partakers of his own bliss and glory.

And if, in this life, he sends us tribulations, they are all for our own good: All things work together unto good.[1818] Even chastisements, as was observed by the holy Judith, do not come to us from God for our destruction, but in order to our amendment and salvation: Let us believe that they have happened for our amendment, and not for our destruction.[1819] In order to save us from eternal evils, the Lord throws his own good will around us: O Lord, Thou hast crowned us as with a shield of Thy goodwill.[1820] He not only desires, but is anxious for, our salvation: The Lord is careful for me.[1821] And what is there that God will ever refuse us, says St. Paul, after having given us his own Son? He that spared not even His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how hath He not also with Him given us all things.[1822] This, then, is the confidence in which we ought to abandon ourselves to the divine dispensations, all of which have for their object our own good. Let us ever say, under all the circumstances that may happen to befall us, In peace, in the self-same, I will sleep and I will rest; for Thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in hope.[1823] Let us also place ourselves entirely in his hands, for he will certainly take care of us: Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you.[1824]

Then, let our thoughts be fixed on God, and on the fulfilment of his will, that he may think of us and of our good. "Daughter," said the Lord to St. Catharine of Sienna, "do thou think of Me, and I will ever think of thee." Let us be frequently saying with the sacred spouse, My Beloved to me, and I to Him.[1825] The thoughts of my Beloved are upon my good; I will think of nothing but of pleasing him, and bringing myself into a state of perfect uniformity to his holy will. The holy Abbot Nilus used to say that we ought never to pray to God that he would make our will succeed, but that in us he would accomplish his own will. And whenever, too, things that are contrary befall us, let us accept them all, as from God's hands, not merely with patience, but with joy, as did the Apostles when they went from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus."[1826] And what greater satisfaction can a soul enjoy than in the knowledge that by suffering with a good will anything that it may have to suffer it gives to God the greatest pleasure that it can give him? The masters of the spiritual life teach that, though the desire which certain souls have of suffering to give him pleasure is acceptable to him, he is yet more pleased with the conformity of those who wish for neither joy nor pain, but, in perfect resignation to his holy will, have no other desire than to fulfil whatever that will may be. If then, O devout soul! you would please God, and live in this world a life of contentment, unite yourself ever and in everything to the divine will. Consider that all the sins that you have committed, when leading a life of disorder and distress, have come to pass in consequence of having separated yourself from the will of God.

Bind yourself up, from this day forward, with his good pleasure; and always say, in everything that may befall you: Yea, Father; for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight.[1827] Thus let it be, O Lord! since thus it is pleasing unto Thee. Whenever you feel yourself troubled on account of any occurrence of an adverse description, consider that it has come from God; and therefore say at once, "Thus God wills," and so remain in peace." "I was dumb, and I opened not my mouth, because Thou hast done it"[1828] Lord, since Thou hast done it, I say nothing, and accept it. To this end you must direct all your thoughts and prayers; namely, to strive and pray ever unto God, in meditations, in Communions, in visits to the Most Holy Sacrament, that he would make you accomplish his will. And ever be making an offering of yourself, saying, My God, behold, here I am; do what Thou willest with me, and with all that I have. This was St. Teresa's continual exercise; fifty times a day at least did the saint offer herself to the Lord, that he might dispose of her according to his pleasure. Oh, happy will you, my reader, be if you act ever thus! You will certainly become a saint; your life will be one of peace, and your death will be one of greater happiness still When any one is passing to the other life, all the hopes that are conceived of his salvation depend on the judgment formed as to whether he has died in resignation or not. If, after having, during life, welcomed to your embrace all things that have come from God, you in like manner embrace death also in order to accomplish his divine will, you will certainly secure your salvation and die the death of a saint. Let us, then, abandon ourselves in everything to the good pleasure of that Lord who, being most wise, knows what is best for us; and being most loving, since he has sacrificed his life through love for us, wills also that which is most for our good. And let us, too, be thoroughly assured and convinced that, as St. Basil says God lays himself out for our good, incomparably beyond all that we ourselves could ever do or desire.[1829]

V. SPECIAL PRACTICES OF THIS CONFORMITY

But let us now look at the matter in a more practical point of view, and consider what things there are in which we have to bring ourselves into uniformity to the will of God.

1. ORDINARY OR COMMON ACCIDENTS

In the first place, we must have this uniformity as regards those things of nature that come to us from without; as when there is great heat, great cold, rain, scarcity, pestilence, and the like. We must take care not to say, What intolerable heat! what horrible cold! what a misfortune! how unlucky! what wretched weather! or other words expressive of repugnance to the will of God. We ought to will everything to be as it is, since God is he who orders it all. St. Francis Borgia, on going one night to a house of the Society when the snow was falling, knocked at the door several times; but, the Fathers being asleep, he was not let in. They made great lamentations in the morning for having kept him so long waiting in the open air; but the saint said that during that time he had been greatly consoled by the thought that it was God who was casting down upon him those flakes of snow. In the second place, we must have this conformity as regards things that happen to us from within, as in the sufferings consequent on hunger, thirst, poverty, desolations, or disgrace. In all, we ought ever to say, "Lord, be it Thine to make and to unmake. I am content; I will only what thou dost will."[1830] And thus, too, we ought, as F. Rodriguez says, to reply to such imaginary cases as the devil occasionally suggests to the mind, in order to make us fall into some consent that is wrong, or at least to disgust us. If such a person were to say so and so to you, if he were to do so and so to you, what would you say? what would you do? Let our answer always be, "I would say and do that which God wills." And by this means we shall keep ourselves free from all fault and molestation.

2. NATURAL DEFECTS

In the third place, if we have any natural defect either in mind or body, a bad memory, slowness of apprehension, mean abilities, a crippled limb, or weak health, let us not therefore make lamentation. What were our deserts, and what obligation had God to bestow upon us a mind more richly endowed, or a body more perfectly framed? Could he not have created us mere brute animals?.or have left us in our own nothingness? Who is there that ever receives a gift and tries to make bargains about it? Let us, then, return him thanks for what, through a pure act of his goodness, he has bestowed upon us; and let us rest content with the manner in which he has treated us. Who can tell whether, if we had had a larger share of ability, stronger health, or greater personal attractions, we should not have possessed them to our destruction? How many there are whose ruin has been occasioned by their talents and learning, of which they have grown proud, and in consequence of which they have looked upon others with contempt, a danger which is easily incurred by those who excel others in learning and ability!

How many others there are whose personal beauty or bodily strength have furnished the occasions of plunging them into innumerable acts of wickedness! And, on the contrary, how many others there are who, in consequence of their poverty, or infirmity, or ugliness, have sanctified themselves and been saved; who, had they been rich, strong, or handsome, would have been damned! And thus let us ourselves rest content with that which God has given us: But one thing is necessary.[1831] Beauty is not necessary, nor health, nor sharpness of intellect; that which alone is necessary is our salvation.

3. CORPORAL MALADIES

In the fourth place, we must be particularly resigned under the pressure of corporal infirmities; and we must embrace them willingly, both in such a manner, and for such a time, as God wills. Nevertheless, we ought to employ the usual remedies; for this is what the Lord wills also: but if they do us no good, let us unite ourselves to the will of God, and this will do us much more good than health. O Lord! let us then say, I have no wish either to get well or to remain sick: I will only that which Thou dost will. Certainly the virtue is greater, if, in times of sickness, we do not complain of our sufferings; but when these press heavily upon us, it is not a fault to make them known to our friends, or even to pray to God to liberate us from them. I am speaking now of sufferings that are severe; for, on the other hand, there are many who are very faulty in this, that on every trifling pain or weariness they would have the whole world come to compassionate them, and to shed tears around them. Even Jesus Christ, on seeing the near approach of his most bitter Passion, manifested to his disciples what he suffered: My soul is sorrowful even unto death.[1832] and he prayed the Eternal Father to liberate him from it: My Father, if it be possible, let this chalice pass from Me.[1833]

But Jesus himself has taught us what we ought to do after praying in like manner; namely, straightway to resign ourselves to the divine will, adding, as he did, Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt.[1834] How foolish, too, are those who say that they wish for health, not indeed, in order to suffer, but to render greater service to God, by the observance of the rules, by serving the community, by going to church, by receiving Holy Communion, by doing penance, by study, by employing themselves in the saving of souls, by hearing confessions, and by preaching! But, my good friend, I wish you would tell me why it is that you desire to do these things? Is it to please God? And why go out of your way in order to do this; certain, as you are, that what pleases God is, not that you pray, receive Communion, do acts of penance, study, or preach sermons, but that you suffer with patience the infirmity or the pains which he sees fit to send you? Unite, then, your own sufferings to those of Jesus Christ. But, you say, I am troubled that, in consequence of being such an invalid, I am useless and burdensome to the community and to the house. But as you resign yourself to the will of God, so you ought to believe that your Superiors, too, resign themselves, seeing, as they do, that it is not through any laziness of your own, but through the will of God, that you have laid this burden upon the house. Ah, these desires and regrets do not spring from the love of God, but from the love of self, which is hunting after excuses for departing from the will of God! Is it our wish to give pleasure to God? Let us say, then, whenever we happen to be confined to bed, to the Lord this only, Fiat voluntas Tua, "Thy will be done."

And let us be ever repeating it, although for the hundredth or thousandth time; and by this alone we shall give more pleasure to God than we could give him by all the mortifications and devotions which we could perform. There is no better mode of serving God than by cheerfully embracing his will. The Venerable Father Avila wrote thus to a priest who was an invalid: "My friend, do not stop to calculate what you might do if you were well, but be content to remain unwell as long as God shall please. If your object be to do the will of God, how is it of more consequence for you to be well than ill? "[1835] And certainly this was wisely said; for God is not glorified so much by our works as by our resignation and conformity to his holy will. And therefore St. Francis de Sales used to say that we serve God more by suffering than by working. It will often happen that we shall find ourselves with out doctors and medicine; or, again, our medical attendant may not clearly understand our complaint; and here, too, we must be in a state of conformity to the divine will, which ordains it to be so for our good. It is related of one who had a devotion to St. Thomas of Canterbury, that, being unwell, he went to the tomb of the saint to obtain his recovery. He returned home in good health; but then he said within himself, But if the sickness would have been a greater help towards my salvation, what benefit shall I gain from the health which I now have? With this thought in his mind, he went back to the tomb, and prayed the saint to ask for him of God that which was the more expedient of the two for his eternal salvation; and after doing this he relapsed into the sickness, and remained in it with perfect contentment, holding it for certain that God ordained it to be so for his good. There is a similar anecdote related by Surius,[1836] of a certain blind man who received his sight through the intercession of the Bishop St. Vedast; but afterwards prayed that, if that sight was not expedient for his soul, he might return to his former state of blindness; and after this prayer he continued blind as before.

In times of sickness, then, it is best not to seek after health, either good or bad, but to abandon ourselves to the will of God, that he may dispose of us as pleases him. But if health is what we would seek, let us ask for it with resignation at least, and on the condition that health of body be suitable to the health of our soul; otherwise a prayer to this effect will be faulty, and rejected, because the Lord does not listen to prayers of this description when unaccompanied by resignation.

I call the time of sickness the touchstone by which spirits are tried, because in it is ascertained the value of the virtue of which any one stands possessed. If he does not lose his tranquillity, if he makes no complaints, and is not over-anxious, but obeys his medical advisers and his superiors, preserving throughout the same peacefulness of mind, in perfect resignation to the divine will, it is a sign that he possesses great virtue. But what, then, ought one to say of the sick person who laments and says that he receives but little assistance from others; that his sufferings are intolerable; that he can find no remedy to do him good; that his medical man is ignorant; at times complaining even to God that his hand presses too heavily upon him? St. Bonaventure relates,[1837] in his Life of St. Francis, that when the saint was suffering pains of an extraordinary severity, one of his religious, who was somewhat over-simple, said to him, "Father, pray to God to treat you with a little more gentleness; for it seems that he lays his hand upon you too heavily." St. Francis, on hearing this, cried aloud, and said to him in reply, Listen; if I did not know that these words of yours were the offspring of mere simplicity, I would never see you more, daring, as you have done, to find fault with the judgments of God." And after saying this, extremely enfeebled and emaciated through his sickness though he was, he threw himself from his bed upon the floor and kissing it, he said, " Lord, I thank Thee for all the sufferings which Thou sendest me. I pray.Thee to send me more of them, if it so please Thee. It is my delight for Thee to afflict me, and not to spare me in the least degree, because the fulfilment of Thy will is the greatest consolation which in this life I can receive."

4. LOSS OF USEFUL PERSONS

Under this head we must also class the loss which we may at times have to suffer of persons who, in either a temporal or spiritual point of view, happen to be of service to us. This is a matter in regard to which those who are devout are often very faulty, through their want of resignation to the divine dispensations. Our sanctification must come to us, not from spiritual directors, but from God. It is, indeed, his will that we should avail ourselves of directors as spiritual guides, when he gives them to us; but when he takes them away, he wills that we should rest content with this, and increase our confidence in his goodness; saying at such times, Lord, it is Thou who hast given me this assistance; now Thou hast taken it from me; may Thy will be ever done; but I pray Thee now to supply my wants Thyself, and to teach me what I ought to do to serve Thee. And in the same way ought we to receive all other crosses from the hands of God. But so many troubles, you say, are chastisements. But, I ask in reply, are not the chastisements that God sends us in this life acts of kindness and benefits? If we have offended him, we have to satisfy the divine justice in some way or other, either in this life or in the next. Therefore we ought all of us to say with St. Augustine, "Here burn, here cut, here do not spare; that so Thou mayest spa re in eternity;"[1838] and again, with holy Job: "And that this may be my comfort, that, afflicting me with sorrow, He spare not."[1839] It ought, too, to be a consolation to one who has deserved hell to see that God is punishing him in this world; because this ought to give him good hopes that it may be God's will to deliver him from punishment eternal. Let us, then, say, when suffering the chastisements of God, what was said by Heli the high priest: It is the Lord; let Him do what is good in His sight.[1840]

5. SPIRITUAL DESOLATION

Moreover, we ought to be resigned in times of spiritual desolation. The Lord is accustomed, when a soul gives itself up to the spiritual life, to heap consolations upon it, in order to wean it from the pleasures of the world; but afterwards, when he sees it more settled in spiritual ways, he draws back his hand, in order to make proof of its love, and to see whether it serves and loves him unrecompensed, while in this world, with spiritual joys. "While we are living here," as St. Teresa used to say, " our gain does not consist in any increase of our enjoyment of God, but in the performance of his will." And in another passage: "The love of God does not consist in tenderness, but in serving him with firmness and humility." And again, elsewhere: "The Lord makes trial of those who love him by means of drynesses and temptations." Let, then, the soul thank the Lord when he caresses it with sweetnesses; but not torment itself by acts of impatience, when it beholds itself left in a state of desolation. This is a point which should be well attended to; for some foolish persons, seeing themselves in a state of aridity, think that God may have abandoned them; or, again, that the spiritual life was not made for them; and so they leave off prayer, and lose all that they have gained. There is no time better for exercising our resignation to the will of God than that of dryness.

I am not saying that you will not suffer pain on seeing yourself bereft of the sensible presence of your God; it is impossible for a soul not to feel such pain as this; nor can it refrain from lamentation, when our Redeemer himself upon the cross made lamentation on this account: My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?[1841] But, in its sufferings, it should ever resign itself perfectly to the will of its Lord. These spiritual desolations and abandonments are what all the saints have suffered. "What hardness of heart," said St. Bernard, "do I not experience! I no longer find any delight in reading, no longer any pleasure in meditation or in prayer." The condition of the saints has been ordinarily one of dryness, not of sensible consolations. These are things which the Lord does not bestow, excepting on rare occasions, and to perhaps the weaker sort of spirits, in order to prevent their coming to a standstill in their spiritual course: the joys which he proposes as rewards, he prepares for us in Paradise. This world is the place for meriting, where we merit by suffering; heaven is the place for recompense and enjoyments. Therefore, what the saints have desired and sought for in this world has been, not a sensible fervour with rejoicing, but a spiritual fervour with suffering. The Ven. John Avila used to say, "Oh, how much better is it to be in dryness and temptations with the will of God, than in contemplation without it!"[1842]

But, you will say, if I could only know that this desolation comes from God, I should be content; but what afflicts and disquiets me is the fear that it may have come through my own fault, and as a punishment for my tepidity. Well, then, take your tepidity out of the way, and employ greater diligence. But will you, because you are perhaps under a cloud, will you therefore disquiet yourself, leave off prayer, and thus double the evil of which you complain? Let it be that, as you say, the dryness is come upon you as a chastisement. Then accept it as a chastisement on one who so much deserves to be chastised, and unite yourself to the divine will. Do you not say that you deserve hell? And why, then, are you complaining? Perhaps it is because you deserve that God should give you consolations? Ah, go and rest content with the manner in which God is dealing with you; persevere in prayer, and in the way on which you have entered; and henceforth let it be your fear that your complaints may arise from your little humility and your little resignation to the will of God. When a soul applies itself to prayer, it can derive no benefit from it that can be greater than the union of itself with the divine will. Therefore make an act of resignation, and say, Lord, I accept this pain from Thy hands, and I accept it for as long as may please Thee; if it be Thy will that I should be thus afflicted for all eternity, I am content. And in this way your prayer, painful though it may be, will be a greater help to you than any consolation, however sweet. We must, however, bear in mind that dryness is not always a punishment, but is occasionally ordained by God for our greater good, and in order to keep us humble.

That St. Paul might not grow proud of the gifts that he had received, the Lord permitted him to be tormented by temptations of impurity: Lest the greatness of the revelations should exalt me, there was given me a sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan, to buffet me. [1843] He who prays in times of sweetness does no great thing: There is a friend, a companion at table; and he will not abide in the day of distress.[1844] You would not esteem to be a true friend of yours the man who was with you only at your table; but him who assisted you in times of trouble, and without advantage to any interests of his own. When God sends darkness and desolations, it is then that he is trying who are true friends of his. Palladius suffered great weariness in prayer; and when he went to tell St. Macarius, the latter said to him, "When the thought suggests itself to you that you should leave off prayer, let this be your reply: I am content, for the love of Jesus Christ, to remain here as guardian of the walls of this cell." [1845] This, then, is your answer, whenever you feel yourself tempted to leave off prayer, because it appears to you as no better than a mere waste of time: "I am here in order to give pleasure to God." St. Francis de Sales used to say that if in time of prayer we did no more than drive away distractions and temptations, our prayer would, nevertheless, be well made.[1846] Nay, Taulerus says that on him who perseveres in prayer in a state of aridity, God will bestow greater graces than had he prayed much with great sensible devotion. Fr Rodriguez tells us of a certain person who used to say that during forty years of prayer he had never experienced any consolation; but that on such days as he prayed he found himself strong in virtue; whereas, on the contrary, on whatever day he omitted it he experienced such a weakness as made him unfit for anything that was good.

It is observed by S. Bonaventure, and by Gerson,[1847] that many serve God more in the absence of the recollection they desire than if they had possessed it; because they thus live in a state of greater diligence and humility; whereas otherwise they might perhaps become proud and more tepid, thinking that they had already gained the object of their desire. And what is said with regard to aridity must also be said of temptations. We ought to try to avoid temptations; but if God wills or permits that we be tempted against the faith, against purity, or against any other virtue, we ought not to complain, but resign ourselves in this also to the divine will. To St. Paul, who prayed to be released from his temptation to impurity, the Lord made answer, My grace is sufficient for thee.[1848] so, if we see that God does not listen to us, by releasing us from some troublesome temptation, let us likewise say, Lord, do and permit that which pleaseth Thee; Thy grace is sufficient for me; only grant me Thy assistance, that I may never lose it. It is not temptations, but the consenting to temptations, that is the cause of our loss of divine grace. Temptations, when we overcome them, keep us more humble, gain for us greater merits, make us have recourse to God more frequently; and thus keep us further from offending him, and unite us more closely to his holy love.

Lastly, we must unite ourselves to the will of God in regard to our death, and as to the time and the manner in which he will send it. St. Gertrude one day, when climbing up a hill, slipped and fell into a ravine. Her companions asked her afterwards whether she would not have been afraid to die without the sacraments? The saint answered, "It is my great desire to die with the sacraments; but I consider that the will of God is more to be accounted of, because I hold that the best disposition one could have for dying a good death would be one's submission to that which God might will; consequently, I desire whatever death my Lord shall be pleased to allot me." [1849] It is related by St Gregory, in his Dialogues, that the Vandals having condemned to death a certain priest named Santolo, they granted him the liberty of choosing the kind of death which he would prefer; but the holy man refused to make a selection, saying, "I am in the hands of God, and will suffer the death which he permits you to make me suffer; nor do I wish for any other than that."[1850] This act was so pleasing to God that, when these barbarous men had resolved on having his head cut off, he held back the executioner's arm; whereupon they gave in to so great a miracle, and spared his life. As to the manner, then, we ought to esteem that death to be the best for us which God may have determined shall be ours. Save us, Lord (let us ever say, when thinking of our death); and then let us die in whatever manner seemeth good unto Thee. Thus, again, we ought to unite our will to his as to the time of our death. What is this world but a prison for us to suffer in, and to be in danger every moment of losing God? It was this that caused David to exclaim, Bring my soul out of prison.[1851] It was this fear that made St. Teresa sigh for death. On hearing the clock strike, she felt the utmost consolation in the thought that an hour of her life had passed, an hour of her danger of losing God.

Father Avila used to say that every one with imperfect dispositions ought to desire death, because of the danger in which we live of losing the divine grace. What is more precious, or more to be desired, than by a good death to secure to ourselves the impossibility of losing the grace of our God? But, you say, "I have as yet done nothing; there is nothing that I have gained for my soul." But if it be the will of God for your life to terminate at this time, what would you do afterwards, if you were to remain alive contrary to his will? And who knows whether, in that case, you would die such a death as you can have hopes of dying now? Who knows whether, through a change of will, you might not fall into other sins, and involve yourself in damnation? And even were there nothing else, yet by remaining alive you could not live without committing at least venial sins. Hence St. Bernard exclaims, "Why, oh, why do we wish for a life in which the longer we live, the more we sin?[1852] And it is certain that one single venial sin displeases God more than all the good works that we can do please him.

I say, moreover, that he who has but little desire for Paradise shows that he has but little love for God. One who loves desires the presence of the object loved; but we cannot see God without leaving this world; and therefore it is that all the saints have sighed for death, in order to go and see the Lord whom they have loved. Thus did Augustine sigh, " Oh, may I die, that I may see thee!"[1853] Thus, too, St. Paul: Having a desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ.[1854] Thus, again, David: When shall I come and appear before the face of God?[1855] And in like manner, too, all the souls that have been enamoured of God.

It is related by a certain writer that one day, as a gentleman was out hunting in a forest, he heard a man singing sweetly; on going in that direction, he found a poor leper in a state of semi-putrefaction: he asked him if it was he who was singing? "Yes," answered he, " it was I, sir, who was singing." "And how can you ever be singing and contented under sufferings like these, which are taking your life away?" The leper answered, "There is nothing to stand between my Lord God and myself but this wall of clay, which is my body; when this impediment is removed, I shall go to enjoy my God. And seeing, as I do, that it is falling into pieces every day, I therefore rejoice and sing."

7. SPIRITUAL GOODS

Finally, even as regards our degrees in grace and glory we must bring our own will into conformity to the divine. Highly as we ought to value the things of the glory of God, we ought to value his will yet more. It is right for us to desire to love him more than the Seraphim do, but it is not right for us to go on to wish for any other degree of love than that which the Lord has determined on granting us. Father Avila says, "I do not believe that there was ever a saint who did not desire to be better than he was. But it has not deprived any one of them of his peace; because this desire of theirs had not relation to any cravings of their own, but to God; with whose measures of distribution they rested content, although he might have given them less than others; out of true love deeming that contentment with what God gave them had a greater value than the desire of possessing much. It all comes to this, as F. Rodriguez explains it,[1856] that although we ought to be diligent to attain the greatest perfection in our power, that our own lukewarmness and laziness may not be furnished with an excuse, as in the case of those who say, God has to give me what I need I can only do so much; nevertheless, when we fall short, we ought not to lose our peace and conformity to the will of God, which has permitted the failing on our part, nor our courage either.

Let us raise ourselves up immediately from our fall; let us humble ourselves in acts of penance; and, seeking for greater assistance from God, let us pursue our course. So, in like manner, although we may rightly desire to be added in heaven to the choir of the Seraphim, not, indeed, that we may have the more glory for ourselves, but in order to give greater glory to God, and that we may love him the more, we ought, nevertheless, to resign ourselves to his holy will, contenting ourselves with that degree which, through his mercy, he shall vouchsafe to grant us. It would, moreover, be but too evident a fault to desire to possess gifts of supernatural prayer such, more especially, as ecstasies, visions, and revelations; whereas, on the contrary, spiritual writers say that those souls on which God bestows the favour of such graces ought to pray to him to deprive them of them, in order that they may love him by the way of pure faith, which is the safest way. There are many who have attained perfection without these supernatural graces. Those only are virtues that raise the soul to sanctity; and chief amongst their number stands conformity to the will of God. If God does not choose to raise us to a high degree of perfection and of glory, let us conform ourselves in all respects to his holy will, praying to him that he would at least save us through his mercy. And if we act in this manner, the reward will not be small which, of his goodness, our good Lord will give us; loving above everything, as he does, those souls that are resigned.

VI. CONCLUSION

In short, we ought to regard all things that do or will happen to us as proceeding from God's hand; and everything that we do we ought to direct to this one end, the fulfilment of his will, and to do it simply because God wills it to be done. And in order to go on with greater security in this, we must follow the guidance of our superiors as regards what is external, and of our directors with regard to what is internal, that so we may, through them, understand what it is that God desires of us, having great faith in those words of Jesus Christ to us: He that heareth you heareth Me.[1857] And, above all, let it be our study to serve God in the way in which it is his will that we should serve him. I say this, that we may shun the deception practised upon himself by one who loses his time, amusing himself by saying, "If I were in a desert, if I were to enter into a monastery, if I were to go somewhere, so as not to remain in this house, to a distance from these relatives or these companions of mine I would sanctify myself; I would do such and such penance; I would say such and such prayers." He says, "I would do, I would do;" but in the mean time, through bearing with a bad will the cross which God sends him in short, through not walking in the way that God wills for him he not only does not sanctify himself, but goes on from bad to worse. These desires are temptations of the devil, at such times when they are not in accordance with the will of God; we must therefore drive them away, and brace ourselves up to the service of God in that one way which he has chosen for us. By doing his will, we shall certainly sanctify ourselves in any state wherein God places us.

Let us, then, ever will that only which God wills, that so he may take and press us to his heart; and, for this end, let us make ourselves familiar with some of those passages of Scripture that call upon us to unite ourselves ever more and more to the divine will: Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?[1858] My God, tell me what thou desirest of me; for I desire to do it all. I am Thine: save Thou me.[1859] O my Lord! I am no longer my own, but Thine; do with me whatsoever Thou dost please. And at such times especially as any very grievous calamity befalls us as in the case of the death of parents, of the loss of property, and things of a similar kind Yea, Father (let it ever be ours to say), yea, Father; for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight.[1860] Yes, my God and my Father, let it be even so; for so it hath pleased Thee. And, above all, let us love that prayer which Jesus Christ has taught us: Fiat voluntas Tua sicut in cœlo et in terra, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." The Lord told St. Catharine of Genoa that whenever she said the " Our Father," she was to pay particular attention to these words, and pray that his holy will might be fulfilled by her with the same perfection with which it is fulfilled by the saints in heaven. Let us, too, act in this manner, and we shall certainly become saints ourselves. May the divine will, and the Blessed and Immaculate Virgin Mary, be ever loved and praised!

HYMN. HOW AMIABLE IS THE WILL OF GOD?

'Tis Thy good pleasure, not my own, In Thee, my God, I love alone; And nothing I desire of Thee But what Thy goodness wills for me.

O will of God! O will divine! All, all our love be ever Thine.

In love no rival canst Thou bear, But Thou art full of tenderest care; And fire and sweetness all divine To hearts which once are wholly Thine. O will of God, etc.

In Thee all pure affections live, To love Thou dost perfection give; While ever burning with desires The loving soul to Thee aspires. O will of God, etc.

Thou makest crosses soft and light And death itself seem sweet and bright. No cross nor fear that soul dismays Whose will to Thee united stays. O will of God, etc.

To all the glorious choirs of heaven Their very bliss by Thee is given; And heaven itself deprived of Thee Would be a land of misery.

O will of God, etc.

Yea, to the lost who burn in hell, If in their souls Thy love could dwell, The very flames and torments there Would seem but sweet and light to bear, O will of God, etc.

Oh! that one day my life may end In closest bonds to Thee enchained! For thus to die is not to die,

But live, and live eternally.

O will of God, etc.

To Thee I consecrate and give My heart and being while I live; Jesus, Thy heart alone shall be My love for all eternity.

O will of God, etc.

Alike in pleasure and in pain.

To please Thee is my joy and gain; That, O my Love, which pleases Thee Shall ever more seem best to me. May heaven and earth with love fulfil, My God, Thy ever-blessed will!

IV

THE WAY TO CONVERSE ALWAYS AND FAMILIARLY WITH GOD

TAKEN FROM A SMALL FRENCH WORK, AND ENLARGED BY OTHER SACRED THOUGHTS, AFFECTIONS, AND EXERCISES OF THE AUTHOR

I. GOD WISHES US TO SPEAK TO HIM WITH CONFIDENCE AND FAMILIARITY

HOLY Job was struck with wonder to consider our God so devoted in benefiting man, and showing the chief care of his heart to be, to love man and to make himself beloved by him. Speaking to the Lord, he exclaims, What is man, that Thou shouldst magnify him, or why dost Thou set Thy Heart upon him?[1861] Hence it is clearly a mistake to think that great confidence and familiarity in treating with God is a want of reverence to his Infinite Majesty. You ought indeed, O devout soul! to revere him in all humility, and abase yourself before him; especially when you call to mind the unthankfulness and the outrages whereof, in past times, you have been guilty. Yet this should not hinder your treating with him with the most tender love and confidence in your power. He is Infinite Majesty; but at the same time he is Infinite Goodness, Infinite Love. In God you possess the Lord most exalted and supreme; but you have also him who loves you with the greatest possible love. He disdains not, but delights that you should use towards him that confidence, that freedom and tenderness, which children use towards their mothers.

Hear how he invites us to come to his feet, and the caresses he promises to bestow on us: You shall be carried at the breasts, and upon the knees they shall caress you: as one whom the mother caresseth, so will I comfort you.[1862] As a mother delights to place her little child upon her knees, and so to feed or to caress him; with like tenderness does our gracious God delight to treat the souls whom he loves., who have given themselves wholly to him, and placed all their hopes in his goodness. Consider, you have no friend nor brother, nor father nor mother, nor spouse nor lover, who loves you more than your God. The divine grace is that great treasure whereby we vilest of creatures, we servants, become the dear friends of our Creator himself: For she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God.[1863] For this purpose he increases our confidence; he emptied himself,[1864] and brought himself to nought, so to speak; abasing himself even to becoming man and conversing familiarly with us: He conversed with men,[1865] He went so far as to become an infant, to become poor, even so far as openly to die the death of a malefactor upon the cross. He went yet farther, even to hide himself under the appearance of bread, in order to become our constant companion and unite himself intimately to us: He that eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood abideth in Me, and I in him.[1866]

In a word, he loves you as much as though he had no love but towards yourself alone. For which reason you ought to have no love for any but for himself. Of him, therefore, you may say, and you ought to say, My Beloved to me, and I to Him.[1867] My God has given himself all to me, and I give myself all to him; He has chosen me for his beloved, and I choose him, of all others, for my only Love: My Beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands.[1868] Say, then, to him often, O my Lord! wherefore dost Thou love me thus? what good thing dost Thou see in me? Hast Thou forgotten the injuries I have done Thee? But since Thou hast treated me so lovingly, and instead of casting me into hell, hast granted me so many favours, whom can I desire to love from this day forward but Thee, my God, my all? Ah, most gracious God, if in time past I have offended Thee, it is not so much the punishment I have deserved that now grieves me, as the displeasure I have given Thee, who art worthy of infinite love. But Thou knowest not how to despise a heart that repents and humbles itself: A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[1869] Ah, now, indeed, neither in this life nor in the other do I desire any but Thee alone: What have I in heaven? and besides Thee what do I desire upon earth! Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever.[1870] Thou alone art and shalt be forever the only Lord of my heart, of my will; Thou my only good, my heaven, my hope, my love, my all: "The God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever."

The more to strengthen your confidence in God, often call to mind his loving treatment of you, and the gracious means he has used to drive you from the disorders of your life and your attachments to earth, in order to draw you to his holy love; and therefore fear to have too little confidence in treating with your God, now that you have a resolute will to love and to please him with all your power. The mercies he has granted you are most sure pledges of the love he bears you. God is displeased with a want of trust on the part of souls that heartily love him, and whom he loves. If, then, you desire to please his loving heart, converse with him from this day forward with the greatest confidence and tenderness you can possibly have.

I have graven thee in My hands: thy walls are always before My eyes.[1871] Beloved soul, says the Lord, what do you fear or mistrust? I have you written in my hands, so as never to forget to do you good. Are you afraid of your enemies? Know that the care of your defence is always before me, so that I cannot lose sight of it. Therefore did David rejoice, saying to God, Thou hast crowned us as with a shield of Thy good will.[1872] Who, O Lord! can ever harm us, if Thou with Thy goodness and love dost defend and encompass us round about? Above all, animate your confidence at the thought of the gift that God has given us of Jesus Christ: God so loved the world as to give His only-begotten Son.[1873] How can we ever fear, exclaims the Apostle, that God would refuse us any good, after he has vouchsafed to give us his own Son? He delivered Him up for us all; how hath He not also, with Him, given us all things?[1874]

My delights are to be with the children of men.[1875] The paradise of God, so to speak, is the heart of man. Does God love you? Love him. His delights are to be with you; let yours be to be with himself, to pass all your lifetime with him, in the delight of whose company you hope to spend a blissful eternity. Accustom yourself to speak with him alone, familiarly, with confidence and love, as to the dearest friend you have, and who loves you best.

II. IT IS EASY AND AGREEABLE TO ENTERTAIN ONE'S SELF WITH GOD

If it be a great mistake, as has been already said, to converse mistrustfully with God, to be always coming before him as a slave, full of fear and confusion, comes before his prince, trembling with dread, it would be a greater to think that conversing with God is but weariness and bitterness. No, it is not so: Her conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness?[1876] Ask those souls who love him with a true love, and they will tell you that in the sorrows of their life they find no greater, no truer relief, than in a loving converse with God. Now this does not require that you continually apply your mind to it, so as to forget all your employments and recreations. It only requires of you, without putting these aside, to act towards God as you act on occasion towards those who love you and whom you love. Your God is ever near you, nay, within you: In Him we live, and move, and be.[1877]

There is no barrier at the door against any who desire to speak with him; nay, God delights that you should treat with him confidently. Treat with him of your business, your plans, your griefs, your fears, of all that concerns you. Above all, do so (as I have said) with confidence, with open heart. For God is not wont to speak to the soul that speaks not to him; forasmuch as, if it be not used to converse with him, it would little understand his voice when he spoke to it. And this is what the Lord complains of: Our sister is little: what shall we do to our sister in the day when she is to be spoken to?[1878] Our sister is but a child in my love; what shall we do to speak to her if she understand me not? God will have himself esteemed the Lord of surpassing power and terribleness, when we despise his grace; but, on the contrary, he will have himself treated with as the most affectionate friend when we love him; and to this end he would have us often speak with him familiarly and without restraint. It is true that God ought always to be revered in the highest degree; but when he favours you by making you feel his presence and know his desire that you should speak to him as to that one who loves you above all, then express to him your feelings with freedom and confidence. She preventeth them that covet her, so that she first showeth herself u nto them.[1879] When you desire his love, he takes the first step, without waiting till you come to him; and presents himself to you, bringing with him the graces and the remedies you stand in need of. He only waits for you to speak to him, to show you that he is near to you, ready to hear and to comfort you: And His ears are unto their prayers.[1880]

By reason of his immensity, our God is in every place; but there are two places above all where he has his own peculiar dwelling. One is the highest heaven, where he is present by that glory which he communicates to the blessed; the other is upon earth, it is within the humble soul that loves him: Who dwelleth with a contrite and humble spirit.[1881] He, then, our God, dwelleth in the height of heaven; and yet he disdains not to occupy and engage himself day and night with his faithful servants in their cabins or their cells. And there he bestows on them his divine consolations, each one of which surpasses all the delights the world can give, and which he only does not desire who has no experience of them: Oh, taste and see that the Lord is sweet.[1882] Friends in the world have some hours in which they converse together, and others during which they are apart; but between God and you, if you wish, there shall never be one hour of separation: Thou shalt rest, and thy sleep shall be sweet: the Lord will be at thy side.[1883] You may sleep, and God will place himself at your side, and watch with you continually: I will repose myself with Him, and He shall be a comfort in my cares and grief.[1884] When you take your rest, he departs not from beside your pillow; he remains thinking always of you, that when you wake in the night he may speak to you by his inspirations, and receive from you some act of love, of oblation, of thanksgiving; so as to keep up even in those hours his gracious and sweet converse with you.

Sometimes also he will speak to you in your sleep, and cause you to hear his voice, that on waking you may put in practice what he has spoken: I will speak to him in a dream.[1885] He is there also in the morning, to hear from you some word of affection, of confidence; to be the depositary of your first thoughts, and of all the actions which you promise to perform that day to please him; of all the griefs, too, which you offer to endure willingly for his glory and love. But as he fails not to present himself to you at the moment of your waking, fail not you, on your part, to give him immediately a look of love, and to rejoice when your God announces to you the glad tidings that he is not far from you, as once he was by reason of your sins; but that he loves you, and would be beloved by you: and at that same moment he gives you the gracious precept, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart.[1886]

III. OF WHAT, WHEN, AND HOW WE SHOULD CONVERSE WITH GOD

1. IN GENERAL

Never, then, forget his sweet presence, as do the greater part of men. Speak to him as often as you can; for he does not grow weary of this nor disdain it, as do the lords of the earth. If you love him, you will riot be at a loss what to say to him. Tell him all that occurs to you about yourself and your affairs, as you would tell it to a dear friend. Look not upon him as a haughty sovereign, who will only converse with the great, and on great matters. He, our God, delights to abase himself to converse with us, loves to have us communicate to him our smallest, our most daily concerns. He loves you as much, and has as much care for you, as if he had none others to think of but yourself. He is as entirely devoted to your interests as though the only end of his providence were to succour you, of his almighty power to aid you, of his mercy and goodness to take pity on you, to do you good, and gain by the delicate touches of his kindness your confidence and love. Manifest, then, to him freely all your state of mind, and pray to him to guide you to accomplish perfectly his holy will. And let all your desires and plans be simply bent to discover his good pleasure, and do what is agreeable to his divine heart: Commit thy way to the Lord:[1887] and desire of Him to direct thy ways, and that all thy counsels may abide in Him.[1888] Say not, But where is the need of disclosing to God all my wants, if he already sees and knows them better than I? True, he knows them; but God makes as if he knew not the necessities about which you do not speak to him, and for which you seek not his aid. Our Saviour knew well that Lazarus was dead, and yet he made as if he knew it not, until the Magdalene had told him of it, and then he comforted her by raising her brother to life again.[1889]

2. IN TRIALS

When, therefore, you are afflicted with any sickness, temptation, persecution, or other trouble, go at once and beseech him, that his hand may help you. It is enough for you to present the affliction before him; to come in and say, Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress.[1890] He will not fail to comfort you, or at least to give you strength to suffer that grief with patience; and it will turn out a greater good to you than if he had altogether freed you from it.

Tell him all the thoughts of fear or of sadness that torment you; and say to him, My God, in Thee are all my hopes; I offer to Thee this affliction, and resign myself to Thy will; but do Thou take pity on me, either deliver me out of it, or give me strength to bear it. And he will truly keep with you that promise made in the Gospel to all those who are in trouble, to console and comfort them as often as they have recourse to him: Come to Me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you.[1891] He will not be displeased that in your desolations you should go to your friends to find some relief; but he wills you chiefly to have recourse to himself. At all events, therefore, after you have applied to creatures, and they have been unable to comfort your heart, have recourse to your Creator, and say to him, Lord, men have only words for me; my friends are full of words,[1892] they cannot comfort me, nor do I any more desire to be comforted by them; Thou art all my hope, all my love. From Thee only will I receive comfort; and let my comfort be, on this occasion, to do what pleaseth Thee. Behold me ready to endure this grief through my whole life, through all eternity, if such be Thy good pleasure. Only do Thou help me. Fear not that he will be offended if you sometimes gently complain, and say to him, Why, O Lord, hast Thou retired afar off?[1893] Thou knowest, Lord, that I love Thee, and desire nothing but Thy love; in pity help me, and forsake me not. And when the desolation lasts long, and troubles you exceedingly, unite your voice to that of Jesus in agony and dying on the cross, and beseech his mercy, saying, My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?[1894]

But let the effect of this be to humble you yet more at the thought that he deserves no consolations who has offended God; and yet more to enliven your confidence, knowing that God does all things, and permits all, for your good: All things work together unto good[1895] Say with great courage, even when you feel most troubled and disconsolate: The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?[1896] Lord, it is Thine to enlighten me, it is Thine to save me; in Thee do I trust: In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; let me never be confounded.[1897] And thus keep yourself in peace, knowing there never was any one who placed his hopes in God and was lost: No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded.[1898] Consider, your God loves you more than you can love yourself; what do you fear? David comforted himself, saying, The Lord is careful for me.[1899] Say to him, therefore, Lord, into Thy arms I cast myself; I desire to have no thought but of loving and pleasing Thee; behold me ready to do what Thou requirest of me. Thou dost not only will my good, Thou art careful for it; unto Thee, then, do I leave the care of my salvation. In Thee do I rest, and will rest for evermore, since Thou willest that in Thee I should place all my hopes: In peace, in the self same, I will sleep and I will rest; for Thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in hope.[1900] Think of the Lord in goodness.[1901]

In these words the Wise Man exhorts us to have more confidence in the divine mercy than dread of the divine justice; since God is immeasurably more inclined to bestow favours than to punish; as St. James says, Mercy exalteth itself above judgment.[1902] Whence the Apostle St. Peter tells us that in all fears, whether about our interests for time or for eternity, we should commit ourselves altogether to the goodness of our God, who keeps the greatest care of our safety: Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you,[1903] Oh, what a beautiful meaning does this lend to the title which David gives to the Lord, when he says that our God is the God who makes it his care to save: Our God is the God of salvation;[1904] which signifies, as Bellarmine explains it, that the office peculiar to the Lord is, not to condemn, but to save all. For while he threatens with his displeasure those who disregard him, he promises, on the other hand, his assured mercies to those who fear him; as the divine Mother said in her Canticle, And His mercy is to them that fear Him.[1905] I set before you, devout soul, all these passages of Scripture, that when the thought disquiets you, Am I to be saved or not? Am I predestined or not? you may take courage, and understand from the promises he makes you what desire God has to save you, if only you are resolved to serve him and to love him as he demands at your hands.

3. IN JOYS

Further, when you receive pleasant news, do not act like those unfaithful, thankless souls who have recourse to God in time of trouble, but in time of prosperity forget and forsake him. Be as faithful to him as you would be to a friend who loves you and rejoices in your good; go at once and tell him of your gladness, and praise him and give him thanks, acknowledging it all as a gift from his hands; and rejoice in that happiness because it comes to you of his good pleasure.

Rejoice, therefore, and comfort yourself in him alone: I will rejoice in the Lord;[1906] and I will joy in God my Jesus.[1907] Say to him, My Jesus, I bless, and will ever bless Thee, for granting me so many favours, when I deserved at Thy hands not favours, but chastisements for the affronts I have given Thee. Say to him, with the sacred Spouse, All fruits, the new and the old, my Beloved, I have kept for Thee.[1908] Lord, I give Thee thanks; I keep in memory all Thy bounties, past and present, to render Thee praise and glory for them forever and ever. But if you love your God, you ought to rejoice more in his blessedness than in your own. He who loves a friend very much sometimes takes more delight in that friend's good than if it had been his own. Comfort yourself, then, in the knowledge that your God is infinitely blessed. Often say to him, My beloved Lord, I rejoice more in Thy blessedness than in any good of mine; yes, for I love Thee more than I love myself.

4. AFTER A FAULT

Another mark of confidence highly pleasing to your most loving God is this: that when you have committed any fault, you be not ashamed to go at once to his feet and seek his pardon. Consider that God is so greatly inclined to pardon sinners that he laments their perdition, when they depart far from him and live as dead to his grace.

Therefore does he lovingly call them, saying, Why will you die, O house of Israel? Return ye, and live.[1909] He promises to receive the soul that has forsaken him, so soon as she returns to his arms: Turn ye to me, . . . and I will turn to you.[1910] Oh, if sinners did but know with what tender mercy the Lord stands waiting to forgive them! The Lord waiteth, that He may have mercy on you.[1911] Oh, did they but know the desire he has, not to chastise, but to see them converted, that he may embrace them, that he may press them to his heart! He declares: As I live, saith the Lord God, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live.[1912] He even says: And then come and accuse Me, saith the Lord: if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made as white as snow.[1913] As though he had said, Sinners, repent of having offended Me, and then come unto Me: if I do not pardon you, "accuse Me;" upbraid Me, and treat Me as one unfaithful. But no, I will not be wanting to My promise. If you will come, know this: that though your consciences are dyed deep as crimson by your sins, I will make them by My grace as white as snow. In a word, he has declared that when a soul repents of having offended him, he forgets all its sins: I will not remember all his iniquities.[1914] As soon, then, as you fall into any fault, raise your eyes to God, make an act of love, and with humble confession of your fault, hope assuredly for his pardon, and say to him, Lord, behold he whom Thou lovest is sick;[1915] that heart which Thou dost love is sick, is full of sores: heal my soul; for I have sinned against Thee.[1916]

Thou seekest after penitent sinners; behold, here is one at Thy feet, who has come in search of Thee. The evil is done already; what have I now to do? Thou wilt not have me lose courage: after this my sin Thou dost still love me, and I too love Thee. Yes, my God, I love Thee with all my heart; I repent of the displeasure I have given Thee; I purpose never to do so any more. Thou, who art that God, merciful and gracious, patient and of much compassion[1917] forgive me; make me to hear what Thou didst say to the Magdalene, Thy sins are forgiven thee;[1918] and give me strength to be faithful unto Thee for the time to come. That thou mayest not lose courage at such a moment, cast a glance at Jesus on the cross; offer his merits to the Eternal Father; and thus hope certainly for pardon, since He spared not even His own Son.[1919] Say to him with confidence, Look on the face of Thy Christ.[1920] My God, behold Thy Son, dead for my sake; and for the love of that Son forgive me. Attend greatly, devout soul, to the instruction commonly given by masters of the spiritual life, after your unfaithful conduct, at once to have recourse to God, though you have repeated it a hundred times in a day; and after your falls, and the recourse you have had to the Lord (as has been just said), at once to be in peace. Otherwise, while you remain cast down and disturbed at the fault you have committed, your converse with God will be small; your trust in him will fail; your desire to love him grow cold; and you will be little able to go forward in the way of the Lord.

On the other hand, by having immediate recourse to God to ask his forgiveness, and to promise him amendment, your very faults will serve to advance you further in the divine love. Between friends who sincerely love each other it often happens that when one has displeased the other, and then humbles himself and asks pardon, their friendship thereby becomes stronger than ever. Do you likewise; see to it that your very faults serve to bind you yet closer in love to your God.

5. IN DOUBTS

In any kind of doubtfulness also, either on your own account or that of others, never leave acting towards your God with a confidence like to that of faithful friends, who consult together on every matter. So do you take counsel with himself, and beseech him to enlighten you that you may decide on what will be most pleasing to him: Put those words in my mouth, and strengthen the resolution in my heart.[1921] Lord, tell me what Thou wouldst have me to do or to answer; and thus will I. Speak, Lord; for Thy servant heareth.[1922]

6. FOR YOUR NEIGHBOR

Use towards him also the freedom of recommending not only your own needs, but also those of others. How agreeable will it be to your God that sometimes you forget even your own interests to speak to him of the advancement of his glory, of the miseries of others, especially those who groan in affliction, of those souls, his spouses, who in purgatory sigh after the vision of himself, and of poor sinners who are living destitute of his grace!

For these especially say to him*: Lord, Thou who art so amiable, and worthy of an infinite love, how dost Thou, then, endure to see such a number of souls in the world, on whom Thou hast bestowed so many favours, and who yet will not know Thee, will not love Thee, nay, even offend and despise Thee? Ah! my God, object of all love, make Thyself to be known, make Thyself to be beloved. "Hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come;"*[1923] may Thy name be adored and beloved by all; may Thy love reign in all hearts. Ah, let me not depart withoutgranting me some grace for those unfaithful souls for whom I pray.

7. THE DESIRE FOR HEAVEN

It is said that in purgatory those souls who in this life have had but little longing for heaven are punished with a particular suffering, called the pain of languor; and with reason, because to long but little for heaven is to set small value on the great good of the eternal kingdom which our Redeemer has purchased for us by his death. Forget not, therefore, devout soul, frequently to sigh after heaven: say to your God that it seems to you an endless time for you to come and see him, and to love him face to face. Long ardently to depart out of this banishment, this scene of sinning, and danger of losing his grace, that you may arrive in that land of love where you may love him with all your powers. Say to him again and again, Lord, so long as I live on this earth, I am always in danger of forsaking Thee and losing Thy love. When will it be that I quit this life, wherein I am ever offending Thee, and come to love Thee with all my soul, and unite myself to Thee, with no danger of losing Thee any more? St. Teresa was ever sighing in this way, and used to rejoice when she heard the clock strike, because another hour of life, and of the danger of losing God, was past and gone. For she so greatly desired death in order to see God, that she was dying with the desire to die; and hence she composed that loving canticle of hers, I die, because I do not die.

IV. GOD ANSWERS THE SOUL THAT SPEAKS TO HIM

In a word, if you desire to delight the loving heart of your God, be careful to speak to him as often as you are able, and with the fullest confidence that he will not disdain to answer and speak with you in return. He does not, indeed, make himself heard in any voice that reaches your ears, but in a voice that your heart can well perceive, when you withdraw from converse with creatures, to occupy yourself in conversing with your God alone: I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart.[1924] He will then speak to you by such inspirations, such interior lights, such manifestations of his goodness, such sweet touches in your heart, such tokens of forgiveness, such experience of peace, such hopes of heaven, such rejoicings within you, such sweetness of his grace, such loving and close embraces, in a word, such voices of love, as are well understood by those souls whom he loves, and who seek for nothing but himself alone.

V. PRACTICAL SUMMARY

Lastly, to make a brief summary of what has already been said at large, I will not omit to suggest a devout practice whereby you may fulfil all your daily actions in a manner pleasing to God. When you wake in the morning, let it be your first thought to raise your mind to him, offering to his glory all that you shall do or suffer that day, praying to him to assist you by his grace. Then make your other morning acts of devotion, acts of thanksgiving and of love, prayers, and resolutions to live that day as though it were to be the last of your life. Father St. Jure recommends the making in the morning of a compact with the Lord; that every time you make a certain sign, as placing your hand upon your heart, or raising your eyes to heaven or to the crucifix, and the like, you wish thereby to make an act of love, of desire to see him loved by all, of oblation of yourself, and other acts of the same kind. When you have made these acts, and placed your soul in the side of Jesus and under the mantle of Mary, and have prayed the Eternal Father that for the love of Jesus and Mary he would protect you during the day, be careful, before you engage in anything else, to make your mental prayer, or meditation, at least for half an hour; and let your specially chosen meditation be the sorrow and the shame which Jesus Christ suffered in his Passion. This is the dearest subject to loving souls, and the one that most kindles divine love within them. If you would make spiritual progress, let three devotions be especially dear to you; devotion to the Passion of Jesus Christ, to the Most Holy Sacrament, and to the ever-blessed Virgin. In mental prayer, make again and again acts of contrition, of love to God, and oblation of yourself. The Venerable Father Charles Caraffa, founder of the Pious Workers, said that one fervent act of the love of God made thus in the morning is sufficient to maintain the soul in fervour throughout the whole day. Then, besides the more specific acts of devotion, such as confession, Communion, recitation of the divine office, etc., whenever you are engaged in external occupations, as in study, in labour, or in any other employment that may be proper to your condition, never forget, when setting about it, to make an offering of it to God, praying for his assistance to enable you to perform it in a perfect manner; and do not omit to retire frequently into the cell of your heart, in order to unite yourself to God, according to the practice of St. Catharine of Sienna. In short, whatever you do, do it with and for God. In going out of your room or house, and on returning again, always commend yourself to the divine Mother, by saying a Hail Mary. When sitting down to meals, make an offering to God of the disgust or gratification you may find in what you eat and drink; and, on rising from table, return thanks to him and say, Lord, how great is Thy goodness to one who has offended Thee so much! In the course of the day be careful to make your spiritual reading, to visit the Most Holy Sacrament and the Most Holy Mary; and in the evening to say the Rosary, and to make an examination of conscience, together with the Christian acts of faith, hope, charity, contrition, resolutions of amendment, and of receiving the Holy Sacraments during life and at the hour of death, forming also the intention of gaining all the indulgences that you can gain. And again, on going to bed, reflect that if you had your deserts, you would be lying down in the flames of hell; then, with the crucifix in your arms, compose yourself to sleep, saying, In peace, in the self—set me, I will sleep and take my rest.[1925]

And here, in passing, I would briefly point out to you the many indulgences that are attached to various prayers or acts of devotion. Whence it is desirable for you in the morning to make the intention of gaining all the indulgences in your power during the day. To one who makes acts of the three theological virtues mentioned above of faith, etc. there are granted seven years and seven quarantines for each day; and by continuing them for a month a plenary indulgence may be gained, provided on the day of his choice he confesses, communicates, and prays to the intention of the Church, applicable also to the souls in purgatory and to himself. This indulgence is in articulo mortis. In like manner, form the intention of gaining also all the indulgences granted for saying the Rosary on beads properly blessed, the Angelus Domini three times a day, the Litany of our Blessed Lady, the Salve Regina, the Ave Maria, and the Gloria Patri; for saying, "Blessed be the holy and immaculate and most pure conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary;" as also for saying, "Praised now and for ever be the Most Holy Sacrament;" for reciting the prayer Anima Christi, etc.; for bowing the head at the Gloria Patri and at the most holy names of Jesus and Mary; as also for hearing Mass; for making half an hour's mental prayer; to which, besides a partial, there is also a plenary, indulgence attached, provided it be continued for a month, on condition of confession and Communion, and prayers to the intention of the Church in the course of the same; for genuflecting before the Most Holy Sacrament, and for kissing the crucifix. Always have the intention formed of gaining every such indulgence.

Then, that you may be able to keep yourself ever in a state of recollection and union with God, as long as you live, and as far as may be possible, turn everything that you may see or hear into an occasion for raising your mind to God, or for taking a glance at eternity. For example, when you see running water, reflect that your life is also in like manner running on, and carrying you nearer and nearer to death. When you see a lamp going out for want of oil, reflect that thus also one day you will have to bring your life to its end. When you see the graves or remains of the dead, consider that you also have to become like them. When you see the great ones of this world rejoicing in their wealth or distinction, pity their folly, and say, For me God is sufficient: Some trust in chariots, some in horses, but we in the name of the Lord.[1926] Let these glory in such vanity; I will make nothing my glory but the grace of God, and the love of him. When you behold the pompous funerals, or the fine sepulchral monuments of the great ones who are dead, say, If these are damned, what is the good of this pomp to them? When you behold the sea in a calm or a storm, consider the difference that there is between a soul when in the grace and when out of the grace of God. When you see a tree that is withered, consider that a soul without God is serviceable for nothing but to be cast into fire. If you ever happen to see one who has been guilty of some great crime, trembling with shame and. fright in the presence of his judge, or of his father, or of his bishop, consider what the panic of a sinner will be in the presence of Christ his judge. When it thunders, and you become alarmed, reflect how those miserable ones who are damned tremble as they hear continually in hell the thunders of the divine wrath. If you ever see one who has been condemned to suffer a painful death, and who says, Is there, then, no longer any means for my escaping death? consider what will be the despair of a soul when it is condemned to hell, as it says, Is there, then, no longer any means for escaping from eternal ruin? When your eye rests on scenes in the country or along the shore, on flowers or fruits, and you are delighted by the sight and scent of all, say, Behold, how many are the beautiful creatures that God has created for me in this world, in order that I may love him; and what further enjoyments does he not keep prepared for me in Paradise? St. Teresa used to say that when she saw any beautiful hills or slopes, they seemed to reproach her for her own ingratitude to God.

And the Abbot de Rancé, founder of La Trappe, said that the beautiful creatures around him reminded him of his own obligation to love God. St. Augustine also said the same, crying out aloud, "Heaven, and earth, and all things tell me to love Thee."[1927] It is related of a certain holy man, that in passing through the fields he would strike with a little stick the flowers and plants which he found, saying, "Be silent; do not reproach me any longer for my ingratitude to God. I have understood you; be silent; say no more." When St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi held in her hand any beautiful fruit or flower, she used to feel herself smitten by it with divine love, saying to herself, "Behold, my God has thought from eternity of creating this fruit, this flower, in order to give it me as a token of the love which he bears towards me." When you see rivers or brooks, reflect that as the water which you behold keeps running on to the ocean without ever stopping, so ought you to be ever hasting on to God, who is your only good. When you happen to be in a vehicle that is drawn by beasts of burden, say, See what labour these innocent animals go through for my service; and how much pains do I myself take in order to serve and please my God? When you see a little dog, which for a miserable morsel of bread is so faithful to its master, reflect how much greater reason you have to be faithful to God, who has created and preserved and provided for you, and heaps upon you so many blessings. When you hear the birds sing, say, Hearken, O my soul, to the praise which these little creatures are giving to their Creator; and what are you doing? Then do you also praise him with acts of love.

On the other hand, when you hear the cock crow, recall to your memory that there once was a time when you also, like Peter, denied your God; and renew your contrition and your tears. So, likewise, when you see the house or place where you have sinned, turn yourself to God, and say, "The sins of my youth and my ignorance remember not, O Lord."[1928] When you behold any valleys, consider that as their fertility is owing to the waters that run down from the mountains, so from heaven do graces descend upon the souls of the humble, and pass by the proud. When you see a beautifully ornamented church, consider the beauty of a soul in a state of grace, which is a real temple of God. When you behold the sea, consider the immensity and the greatness of God. When you see fire, or candles lighted on an altar, say, How many years is it since I ought to have been cast into hell to burn? But since Thou, O Lord, hast not sent me there, make this heart of mine burn with love for Thee, as that wood or those candles burn. When you look up at the sky, all studded with stars, say with St. Andrew of Avellino, "O my feet, you will one day have those stars beneath you." Then, in order frequently to recall to mind the mysteries of our Saviour's love, when you see hay, a manger, or caves, let the Infant Jesus in the stable of Bethlehem be present to your recollection. When you see a saw, a hammer, a plane, or an axe, remember how Jesus worked like a mere lad, in the shop at Nazareth. Then if you see ropes, thorns, nails, or pieces of wood, reflect on the Passion and Death of our Redeemer. St Francis of Assisi, on seeing a lamb, would begin to weep, saying, "My Lord like a lamb was led to death for me." Again: when you see altars, chalices, or patens, recall to mind the greatness of the love which Jesus Christ has borne us in giving us the Most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist. Frequently during the day make an offering of yourself to God, as St. Teresa used to do, saying, "Lord, here am I; do with me that which pleaseth Thee. Declare to me Thy will, that I may do it for Thee; I wish to do it thoroughly."

Then repeat, as often as you can, acts of love towards God. St. Teresa used also to say that acts of love are the fuel by which holy love is to be kept on fire within the heart. When the Venerable Sister Seraphine of Carpi was one day considering that the mule belonging to the convent had not the power of loving God, she expressed her compassion for it thus: "Poor brute; thou neither knowest nor canst love thy God;" and the mule commenced to weep so that the tears fell in streams from its eyes: so likewise do you, when beholding any animal which has not the capacity for knowing or loving God, animate yourself, who can love him, to make the more abundant acts of love. Whenever you fall into any fault, humble yourself for it immediately; and, with an act of more fervent love, endeavour to rise again. When anything adverse happens, immediately make an offering to God of what you have to suffer, bringing your will into conformity with his own; and ever accustom yourself under all adverse circumstances to repeat these words: "Thus God wills; thus I will too." Acts of resignation are the acts of love that are most precious and acceptable to the heart of God.

When you have to decide upon anything, or to give any counsel of importance, first commend yourself to God, and then set about your undertaking, or give your opinion. As often as you can during the day, after the example of St. Rose of Lima, repeat the prayer, Deus in adjutorium meum intende:

"Lord, come to my assistance; do not leave me in my own hands." And for this end frequently turn to the image of the Crucified, or to that of the Most Holy Mary, which is in your room; and do not omit to make frequent invocations of the names of Jesus and of Mary, especially in time of temptation. Since God is infinite goodness, his desire of communicating his graces to us is perfect. The Venerable Father Alvarez one day saw our Saviour with his hands full of graces, and going about in search of those to whom he might dispense them. But it is his will that we should ask them of him. Ask, and ye shall receive,[1929] otherwise he will draw back his hand; whereas, on the contrary, he will willingly open it to those who call upon him. And who is there, says the Preacher, that hath called upon him and God despised him by not granting his prayer? Who hath called upon Him, and He hath despised him?[1930] And David tells us that the Lord shows not merely mercy, but great mercy, to those who call upon him: For Thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee.[1931] Oh, how good and bountiful is the Lord to him who seeks him lovingly! The Lord is good to the soul that seeks Him.[1932] If he lets himself be found even by him who seeks him not I was found by them that did not seek Me.[1933] how much more willingly will he let himself be found by one who seeks him, and seeks him, too, in order to serve him and to love him! To conclude: St. Teresa says that holy souls in this world have to conform themselves by love to what the souls of the blessed do in heaven. As the saints in heaven occupy themselves only with God, and have no other thought or joy than in his glory and in his love, so also must this be the case with you. While you are in this world, let God be your only happiness, the only object of your affections, the only end of all your actions and desires, until you come to that eternal kingdom where your love will be in all things perfected and completed, and your desires will be perfectly fulfilled and satisfied.

HYMN. DIALOGUE BETWEEN JESUS AND THE LOVING SOUL

(Taken from the Canticles.)

THE DIVINE SPOUSE

Aperi mihi, soror mea (Cant. v. 2).
Open to Me, my sister.
Open to me, my sister, To me thou art all coldness,
Open to me thy heart; Yet still for thee I burn;
My love can bear no longer Ah! see how much I love thee,
To live from thee apart. And love for love return.
Anima mea liquefacta est, ut dilectus locutus est (v. 6).
My soul melted when my Beloved spoke.

THE SOUL

As soon as my Beloved But oh! what tongue could utter Had made me hear his voice, The gladness I had known
Within my breast all melting, Had he but deigned to tarry,
I felt my heart rejoice. And speak with me alone!
Adjuro vos filia: Jerusalem, si inveneritis dilectum meutn, ut nuntietis ei quia amore langueo (v. 8).
I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if you find my Beloved, that you tell him that I languish with love.
My sisters, I entreat you Tell him my heart is mourning
If ye perchance have seen In sadness, night and day;
My Love, as ye were wandering While banished from his presence
Amid the woodlands green, I languish far away.
Dilectus meus candidus et rubicundus, electus ex millibus (v. 10).
My Beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands.
My sisters, do you ask me Who is that lovely One, Whose winning charms have conquered And made my heart his own?
He is that Lord of glory, Whose sweet and lovely face
Is radiant with the beauty Of every heavenly grace!
White is my Love, and ruddy, And all surpassing fair; Among a thousand chosen None can with him compare.
Qua'sivi, et non invent ilium; vocavi, et non respondit mihi (v. 6).
I sought Him, and found Him not; I called, and He did not answer me.
My Spouse, my well-beloved, I seek Thee; dost Thou fly me?
Ah, tell me where Thou art; I call; dost Thou not hear?
Oh, come, and by Thy presence I weep; dost Thou not pity?
Peace to my soul impart. My Spouse, why thus severe?
Fuge, dilecte mi, et assimilare caprea' hinnuloque cervorum super montes aromatum (viii. I4).
Flee away, O my Beloved, and be like to the roe and to the young hart upon the mountains of aromaticaI spices.
But haste away, Beloved, Upon the desert mountains
If love thus makes Thee flee, Hie Thee, my Love, away;
That I may learn to follow, Tis there I will await Thee,
And grow in love for Thee. Alone with Thee to stay.
Trahe me; post te curremus in odorem unguentorum tuorum (i. 3). Draw me; we will run after Thee to the odour of Thy ointments.
By the enticing odour Then, by Thy love all ravished,
Of Thy delights so pure, A captive, chained, but free,
O sweetest Lord of Heaven, My heart with love united
To Thee my soul allure. Shall joyful run to Thee.
Ego flos campi, et liliuin convallium (ii. I).
I am the flower of the field, and the lily of the valleys.

THE DIVINE SPOUSE

To all myself I offer, Like lily of the valley,
Like flow'ret of the field; He only findeth me
To all that seek me truly Who seeketh in the shadow.
My beauty is revealed. Of deep humility.
Hortus conclusus, soror mea, sponsa; emissions tug paradisus (iv. 12, I3). My sister, my spouse, is a garden enclosed; thy plants are a paradise.
And thou, my spouse, a garden Most pleasant dost appear, So fruitful and so lovely, And to my heart so dear:
For thou art closed to creatures, Open to me alone;I, only I, possess thee,
And thou art all mine own.
As from the heavenly gardens Thy fruits are sweet to me; Those acts of love so tender, Which now I draw from thee.
Averte oculos tuos a me, quia, ipsi me avolare fecerunt (vi. 4). Turn away thy eyes from me; for they have made me flee away.
Ah, turn away thine eyes, love, Long since thine eyes had made me
Those tender looks restrain; My throne in heaven resign,
They pierce like darts, they bind me, And come on earth to seek thee
And captive I remain. And join my heart to thine.
Vent, columba mea,in foraminibus petrg,ostende mihi faciem tuam; sonet vox tua, in auribus meis (ii. I3, 14).
Come, my dove, in the clefts of the rocks; show me thy face; let thy voice sound in my ears.
Come, O my spouse, my dearest, Come, O my chosen dove! Within my heart now enter, Take thy repose of love.
Then turn thy face unto me, And whisper in my ear,
For thy sweet voice like music To me was ever dear.
Say to me thou dost love me, That word will joy impart; Say thou art happy with me, And thus console my heart.Fasciculus myrrhg dilectus meus mihi: inter ubera. mea commorabitur (i. I2).
A bundle of myrrh is my Beloved to me: He shall abide between my breasts.

THE SOUL

If Thee, my Spouse, I love not, Who else my heart could woo? For Thou art all-endearing, Most lovely, and most true.
But Thou who ever feedest Among the lilies fair,
And mid the flowers of virtue That bloom with lustre rare,
As sense and feeling languish At the approach of death, And earthly goods and pleasures Fade at his fatal breath;
So sweet to me Thou seemest
That ever shalt Thou rest
Like to a fragrant bundle
Of myrrh upon my breast.
Qui pascitur inter lilia (ii. I6).
Who feedeth among the lilies.
Come to my heart, and with Thee
Come ev'ry flower of spring;
As pledge of Thy affection
Those flowers Thou lovest bring.
Fortis ut mors dilectio (viii. 6).
Love is strong as death.
So Love divine e'er changes
The soul he makes his own,
And then it finds no pleasure
In aught but him alone.
Dura sicut infernus crmulatio; lampades ejus, lampades ignis atque flammarum (viii. 6).
Jealousy is hard as hell; the lamps thereof are fire and flames.
Love is a flame that kindles Such ardour in the breast As makes it prompt to labour And seek no ease nor rest.
Unconquered still, unwearied, It burns with deep desireEn ipse stat post parietem nostrum, respiciens per fenestras, etc. Surge, propera. etc. (ii. 9, I0).
Behold, He standeth behind our wall, looking through the windows, looking through the lattices. Behold, my Beloved speaketh to me: arise, make haste, my Love, my Dove, my beautiful One, and come.
Behold the Spouse stands hidden, Hark! the Beloved speaketh:
His eyes are fixed on me; Arise, my lovely one,
And is my love still burning, Come to thy throne of glory,
Or cold, he looks to see. The storm is past and gone.
Inveni quem diligit anima mea: tenui eum, nec dimittam (iii. 4).
I found Him whom my soul loveth; I held Him, and I will not let Him go.
O lot too sweet, too happy! Then ever, O Beloved!
To make all hearts, all creatures, With love of God on fire.
And as in hell the torment Of fire insatiate glows, So in the ardent lover His love unceasing grows.
O bliss! I now have found Mine ever shalt Thou be;
My Spouse, my Love, my Treasure, No more, no more, my Treasure,
To whom my heart is bound. Shalt Thou depart from me.
Introduxit me in cellam vinariam (ii. 4).
He brought me into the cellar of wine.
Now to the lonely cellar What is that mystic cellar?

All full of mystic wine, Ah! 'tis this Sacred Heart;
The King, my Lover, led me And love, the wine entrancing,
With tenderness divine. He deigneth to impart
Surge, aquilo, et vent, auster,perfla hortum meum, et fluant aromata (iv. 16).
Arise, O north wind, and come, O south wind, blow through my garden, and let the aromatical spices thereof flow.
Ye thoughts of worldly pleasures, Ye wintry winds, depart, And come no more to trouble The peace of my poor heart.
Come, with Thy breath inflaming, Spirit of Love Divine!
Come, fires of love enkindle Within this breast of mine:
For, when Thy heavenly breathings Within my garden blow, With streams of every virtue My soul shall fragrant flow.
Fulcite me floribus, stipate me malis, quid amore langueo (ii. 5).
Stay me up with flowers; compass me about with apples; because I languish with love.
Come, O ye heavenward longings! Come, sweetest fruits of love! Fresh vigour to my spirit Bring to me from above.
I sleep, but, ever watchful, My heart is loving still That sovereign Good who only With joy my heart can fill.
Within my breast is glowing
Such sweet, such loving fire,
That, lo! my soul is fainting,
I languish with desire.
Ego dormio, et cor meum vigilat (v. 2).
I sleep, and my heart watcheth.
What peaceful sleep, what pleasure,
What calm repose is this?
No voice of earth intruding,
Love reigns in silent bliss.
Indica mihi, quem diligit anima wea, ubi pascas, ubi cubes in meridie (i. 6).
Show me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou liest in the mid-day.
Blest spirits, who in heaven Tell me where Thou reposest,
The sight of God enjoy, And with Thy love divine
No fear again to lose him Vouchsafe to feed, O Jesus!
Can e'er your bliss destroy. This heart so loved by Thine.
Ah, when to me my Treasure O Heaven, in Thy bright palaceIn heaven will you give, The Spouse his beauty shows,
For whom I die of longing, And all unveiled, there only,
For whom alone I live? Himself on all bestows.
Ne suscitetis, neque evigilare faciatis dilectam (iii. 5).
Stir not up, nor awake my beloved.

THE DIVINE SPOUSE

Ah, see! My Spouse now slumbers; Tranquil she lies, reposing
My loved one do not wake; In peace of love divine;
That sleep of love entrancing Her loving heart united Oh, dare not yet to break. In closest bonds to mine.
Qua est ista, quæ ascendit per desertum, sicut virgula fumi ex aromatibus myrrhæ et thuris . . . deliciis affluens, innixa super dilectum suum? (iii. 6; viii. 5.)
Who is she that goeth up by the desert, as a pillar of smoke of aromatical spices of myrrh and frankincense . . .
flowing with delights, leaning upon her Beloved?
Before my eyes how charming This soul in beauty shone, Who lived for me so constant, Like turtle-dove alone!
Her heart so true was pining With peaceful keen desire, While love, her prayer inflaming, Consumed her in its fire.Now like a cloud of incense Ascending to the skies,
The hearts of all consoling, Her fragrant odours rise.
With what delights o'erflowing That soul arises blest,Who sought with love confiding On me alone to rest!
Vulnerasti cor meum soror mea,, sponsa, in uno oculorum tuorum; et in uno crine colli tui (iv. 9).
Thou hast wounded my heart, my sister, my spouse, with one of thy eyes, and with one hair of thy neck.
My sister, spouse beloved, This thy desire to please me
Thy dart has pierced me through; Was like a fiery dart;
Now sweetly I invite thee These thoughts of thine so humble
To love thy Lover true. Have pierced and won my heart.
Veni de Libano, sponsa mea, veni, coronaberis (iv. 8).
Come from Libanus, my spouse, come, thou shalt be crowned.
Oh, come, and quit forever A coronet of roses
The land of misery, Entwined with lilies chaste,
Where they who love most truly The crown of faithful spouses,
Must suffer most for me. Shall on thy brow be placed.
Pone me ut signaculum super cor tuum (viii. 6).
Put me as a seal upon thy heart.
Meanwhile, my spouse, if truly Thou bearest in thy breast For me that true affection Thou hast so oft expressed,
Then must thou have my image Engraven in thy heart
By hand of love so deeply That never it depart.

And since thou hast beheld me, No shame nor torments fly; As spouse I now invite thee Upon the cross to die.

V

A SHORT TREATISE ON PRAYER[1934]

ITS EFFICACY, AND THE CONDITIONS REQUISITE FOR ITS DUE PERFORMANCE

I. THE NECESSITY OF PRAYER

It is blasphemy to say with Luther and Calvin that the fall of Adam has made it impossible for men to keep God's law; and it is also an error, condemned by the Church, to say with Jansenius that some precepts are impossible even to the just, with their present strength, and that God does not give them aid to enable them to fulfil them. Now the Council of Trent has declared that God does not command impossibilities, but admonishes us to do what we can with the assistance of the ordinary grace with which we are always furnished, and then pray to him to give us the further grace requisite to enable us to fulfil that which otherwise is beyond our strength, upon which he gives us the assistance which we require. In the words of the Council, God does not command impossible things; but, by commanding, he admonishes thee both to do what thou canst, and to pray for that which is beyond thy strength; and he assists thee, so as to make thee able to do it."[1935]

And hence many sound theologians[1936] teach that God gives, or at least offers, to all men either the grace which immediately enables them actually to fulfil the commandments, or at any rate the remote grace which enables them to pray, and by means of prayer to obtain the proximate grace by which they can actually observe the commandments of God. Yet, for all this, there can be no doubt that the observance of the law, in the present state of our corrupt nature, is very difficult, and even morally impossible without a special assistance of God, and more abundant than that which man required in the state of innocence. Now, ordinarily speaking, says the celebrated Gennade,[1937] God only gives this special assistance to those who pray for it. St. Augustine teaches, that with the exception of the first motions of grace such as the first call to faith or to penance, which come to us without our concurrence all other graces, and especially that of perseverance, are only given to those persons who pray for them: "We believe that no one comes to be saved, except by the call of God. That no one works out his own salvation, except by the assistance of God; and that no one merits this assistance, except by prayer."[1938]

And elsewhere he assumes it as certain, "that God gives us a few things even when we do not pray, such as the beginnings of faith; but that he has provided the rest only for those who pray." From this theologians, such as Suarez, Habert, Layman, F. Segneri, and others, with Clement of Alexandria, St. Basil, St. Augustine, and St. Chrysostom, conclude that prayer is necessary to adults, if not as an end, yet as a means; that is to say, in the ordinary course of Providence, no Christian can be saved without recommending himself to God, and asking him for the graces necessary for his salvation. St. Chrysostom says that as the soul is necessary for the life of the body, so is prayer necessary for the soul to preserve it in the grace of God.[1939] This, too, is the meaning of those words of Jesus Christ: Men ought always to pray, and not to faint.[1940] Men ought it is necessary for them always to pray. St. James teaches us the same thing: You have not because you ask not;[1941] and the same lesson is taught us in that short sentence which our Saviour spoke: Ask, and it shall be given you.[1942] If, then, says St. Teresa, he who asks obtains, he that does not ask does not obtain. God wishes the salvation of all men: He willeth all men to be saved;[1943] but he wills that we should ask him for the graces which are necessary for our salvation. Shall we refuse to do such a little thing as this? Let us conclude this first point by gathering from what we have said, that he who prays is certain to be saved; while he who prays not is certain to be damned. All the saints were saved, and came to be saints by praying; all the accursed souls in hell were lost through neglect of prayer; if they had prayed, it is certain that they would not have been lost. And this will be one of the greatest occasions of their anguish in hell, the thought that they might have saved themselves so easily; that they had only to beg God to help them, but that now the time is past when this could avail them.

II. THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER

The Holy Scriptures are full of texts in which God tells us that he hears all our prayers. In one place he says: He shall cry to Me, and I will hear him.[1944] In an other, Cry to me and I will hear thee.[1945] Again: Call upon Me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee.[1946] Thou shalt cry, and I will deliver thee from the danger of being damned. Again: Who hath called upon Him, and He despised Him?[1947] Has it ever occurred that God has turned a deaf ear to the prayers of any one that called upon him? Again: At the voice of thy cry, as soon as He shall hear, He will answer thee.[1948] He will hear and respond to thy prayer immediately. Again: As they are yet speaking, I will hear.[1949] Before they have time to finish their petitions, I will answer them. Again: Blessed be God, who hath not turned away my prayer nor His mercy from me.[1950]

Our prayer is always accompanied by God's mercy; hence, St. Augustine remarks upon this text, that when we find ourselves calling on God we ought to feel very happy, because when we are praying we ought to feel certain that God is hearing us: "When you see that your prayer is not removed from you, be sure that his mercy is not removed from you either."[1951] Again: You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done to you.[1952] Ask what you like; it is enough to ask, and it shall be granted to you. Hence Theodoret says that prayer is omnipotent: "It is one, but. can obtain all things."[1953] And St. Bonaventure says that by prayer we obtain every good, and are delivered from every evil: "By it is obtained the enjoyment of every good, and deliverance of every ill."[1954] And if, adds St. Bernard, at times God does not give us the grace which we ask, we ought to feel quite convinced that he is giving us in its stead some grace that is more needful to us. O Lord, said David, Thou art full of pity and mercy to all those who pray to Thee: Thou, O Lord, art sweet, and mild, and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee.[1955] And St. James says, If any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all abundantly, and upbraideth not.[1956] To those who pray, God gives with no sparing hand, as do the rich of this world, for their wealth soon comes to an end; but God's riches are infinite, and the more he gives the more he has to give, and therefore he gives abundantly, with unsparing hand, far surpassing aught that we can ask. And upbraideth not; does not cast in our teeth the insults we have offered him when we go to ask favours of him.

The nature of goodness is to be diffusive; and therefore God, whose very essence is infinite goodness ("his nature is goodness,"[1957] says St. Leo*)*, has the greatest possible desire to communicate to us his good things and his own happiness, and is therefore anxious for our good. The Lord is careful for me.[1958] said David; and this made the royal prophet exclaim, In whatsoever day I shall call upon Thee, behold I know that Thou art my God.[1959] O Lord, he would say, whenever I call upon Thee, I at once know that Thou art my God; that is, that Thou art the infinite goodness, who desirest us to pray to Thee, to give Thee an opportunity to shower Thy benefits upon us; for as soon as we begin to ask Thee for grace, Thou dost at once give it. One day a miserable leper presented himself to our Saviour, and said to him, Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean; and Jesus answered, I will; be thou made clean,[1960] as though he had said, Ah, my child, dost thou doubt of my willingness to cure thee? dost thou not know that I am thy God, and that my desire is to see all my creatures happy? And for what cause am I come down from heaven to earth, if not to make all men happy? Yes, I will; be thou healed. Many persons complain that God does not give them the graces which they wish for. But, says St. Bernard, how much reason has God to complain of them that they do not pray, and that by this neglect they close his hand, which he would be so glad to open for their benefit? "Many complain that grace fails them; but much more justly might grace complain that many fail her."[1961]

No, do not complain of me, says our Lord, if you have not received from me the graces of which you stood in need; complain of yourselves for not having asked me for them, which is the real reason why you have not received them; pray for them from this day forward, and ye shall be satisfied to the full: Hitherto ye have not asked anything. Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.[1962] The monks of old once held a council among themselves to examine which was the most useful exercise to secure eternal salvation, and they concluded that it was to beseech God in prayer, with the words, Incline unto my aid, O God![1963] And F. Paul Segneri tells us that when he began the practice of meditation, his chief object was to elicit affections; but that afterwards, when he came to know the great utility and necessity of prayer, he was careful to make it the principal part of his meditation.

III. THE CONDITIONS REQUISITE FOR THE DUE PERFORMANCE OF PRAYER

But how does it come to pass that some persons pray, but yet do not receive? They pray, indeed, but they do not pray as they ought, and this is why they obtain nothing: You ask and receive not, because you ask amiss. [1964] Many persons seek for grace, but do not observe the proper conditions. Let us see, then, what are the necessary conditions of prayer, in order to make it efficacious to obtain the graces we desire.

1. HUMILITY

Prayer must be humble: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. [1965] Here St. James tells us that God does not listen to the prayers of the proud, but resists them; while, on the other hand, he is always ready to hear the prayers of the humble: The prayer of the man that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds, . . . and he will not depart till the Most High behold.[1966] The prayer of an humble soul at once penetrates the heavens and presents itself before the throne of God, and will not depart thence till God regards it and listens to it. However sinful such a soul may be, God can never despise a heart that repents of its sins, and humbles itself: A contrite and humbled heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise.[1967]

2. CONFIDENCE

Prayer must be confident: No one hath hoped in the Lord and been confounded.[1968] The Holy Ghost assures us that it never has happened that any one who placed his trust in God has been deceived. He once said to St. Gertrude that a person who prays to him with confidence does him, in a certain way, such violence that he cannot but listen to him and grant all his requests. "Prayer," said St. John Climacus, "is a pious way of forcing God."[1969] Prayer does violence to him; but a violence which he loves and delights in. "This violence is pleasing to God."[1970]

In the "Our Father," which is the prayer which Jesus Christ himself taught us as a means whereby to obtain all the graces necessary for our salvation, how are we made to address God? Not as Lord, not as Judge, but as Father, "our Father," because he wishes us to ask God for grace with the same confidence as a son, when he is hungry or ill, asks his own father for food or medicine. If a son is famished, he has only to tell his father, and he will be immediately fed; if he has been bitten by a venomous serpent, he has only to show the wound, and his father will apply the best remedy that he has. For this cause, our Saviour has told us: All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[1971] We have, then, only to pray to God with confidence in order to obtain all that we desire. And how could our Lord have exhorted us so earnestly to pray for grace, unless he had wished to give it? "He would not have exhorted us (says St. Augustine) to ask, unless he had been willing to grant."[1972] The woman of Canaan whose daughter was possessed by a devil went to beseech Jesus Christ to deliver her from him, and said, " Have mercy on me, my daughter is grievously vexed by a devil." Jesus answered, I am not sent except to the sheep of Israel;[1973] my mission is not to you Gentiles, only to the Jews. Yet she did not lose heart, but confidently repeated her prayer: O Lord, Thou canst console me: Lord help me![1974] Jesus replied, But the children's bread must not be given to dogs: It is not good to take the bread of the children, and to give it to dogs,[1975]

But, Lord, she replied, even the dogs are allowed the crumbs of bread which fall from the table: "Even the whelps eat of the crumbs." Upon which our Lord, having proved the great confidence of the woman, praised her for it, and did what she asked: O woman, great is thy faith; be it done to thee as thou wilt; and her daughter was healed from that hour. [1976] Thus, confidence is necessary to obtain what we ask of God. But on what, it may be said, are we to found this confidence? On what? on the goodness of God, and on the promise which lie made when he said, Ask, and you shall receive.[1977] "Who," says St. Augustine, "fears to be deceived when the Truth promises?[1978] Who can ever fear that what is promised will not be given to him, when it is God, the sovereign truth, who has promised?

3. PERSEVERANCE

Prayer should be persevering, otherwise it will not obtain eternal life. The grace of salvation is not a single grace, but is a chain of graces all united with the grace of final perseverance. Now to this chain of graces there must be a corresponding chain of prayers on our part. There is in St. Luke (chap, xi.) a parable of a man who, to rid himself of the importunity of his friend, got out of bed, and gave him the loaves which he. wanted. On this St. Augustine says: "Now, if this man, simply to rid himself of the importunity of his friend, would, against his will, give him the bread which he asked for, how much more will the good God give, who exhorts us to ask him?[1979]

How much more will God, who has such a desire to make us partakers of his good things, dispense to us his graces when we ask him for them! Especially as he commands us to beg of him, and is displeased when we do not do so. God then wishes to grant us eternal life, and all the graces necessary for its attainment; but he also wishes us to be persevering in prayer. As Cornelius à Lapide says on this parable, "he wishes us to be persevering in prayer, so as to be even importunate."[1980] Men cannot endure importunity; but God not only endures it, but wishes us to be importunate in begging for his grace, and especially for the grace of final perseverance. It is true that we cannot merit final perseverance, as the Council of Trent has declared;[1981] for it is a gift that God gives us quite gratuitously; nevertheless St. Augustine tells us that perseverance may, in a certain way, be merited by prayer: "This gift of God maybe merited in the way of begging; that is, it may be obtained by supplication."[1982] So that the man who asks for perseverance, though he cannot merit it, will yet, as Suarez says, infallibly obtain it. But, says Bellarmine, "it is not enough to ask for it once, we must ask it daily, in order to obtain it daily."[1983] And therefore Jesus Christ says, Men ought always pray, and not to faint.[1984] We must never cease from prayer; for when we do so, temptation may overcome us: Watch ye therefore, praying at all times, that you may be accounted wo rthy to escape all these things that are to come, and to stand before the Son of Man.[1985]

"Be watchful in continual prayer," says Jesus Christ, "that I may not have to drive you from Me when you stand before My judgment-seat." Well, therefore, does St. Paul admonish his disciples: Pray without ceasing.[1986] Pray, and never cease to pray. Blessed is the man that heareth Me, and that watcheth daily at My doors.[1987] God pronounces him to be blessed who continually watches at the doors of his mercy. And therefore, in the following words of the Gospel, Jesus Christ not only exhorts us, but also commands us, to pray (for prayer is not only a counsel, but a precept): Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you.[1988] It might seem enough to have said "ask," without adding "seek" and "knock." But no, this repetition is not superfluous; for this was our Saviour's way of teaching us to do like the poor beggars, who, if they do not at once receive the relief they demand and are turned away, still keep on demanding it over and over again, and then begin knocking at the door, and insist on seeing the master of the house, and, indeed, make themselves exceedingly importunate and troublesome. This is how our Lord wishes us to do; to pray, and pray again, and never cease praying him to assist us, to keep his hand over us, and never to permit us to separate ourselves from him by sin. And this we should do, not only when we rise in the morning, but oftentimes during the day: when we hear Mass, when we make our meditation, when we make our thanksgiving after Communion, when we pay our visit to the Blessed Sacrament, when we examine our conscience at night, but, above all, when we are assailed by any temptation, especially if it is a temptation to impurity; the man who does not in this case have recourse to God, and at least invoke the holy names of Jesus and Mary, will scarcely be able to avoid falling.

IV. GOD HEARS EVEN THE PRAYERS OF SINNERS

But a person might say, I am a sinner, and God does not hear sinners, as we read in St. John's Gospel: God doth not hear sinners.[1989] I answer, that these words were not spoken by our Lord, but by the man who had been born blind. And the proposition, if taken absolutely, is false; there is only one case in which it is true, as St. Thomas says, and that is when sinners pray as sinners;[1990] that is, ask something that they require to assist them in their sin; as, for instance, if a man asked God to help him to take vengeance of his enemy; in such cases God certainly will not hear. But when a man prays and asks for those things that are requisite for his salvation, what matters it whether he is a sinner or not? Suppose he were the greatest criminal in the world, let him only pray, he will surely obtain all that he asks. The promise is general for all men; every one that seeks obtains: Everyone that asketh receiveth.[1991] "It is not necessary," says St. Thomas, " that the man who prays should merit the grace for which he asks." "By prayer we obtain even those things which we do not deserve."[1992] In order to receive, it is enough to pray. The reason is (in the words of the same holy Doctor), "merit is grounded on justice, but the power of prayer (impetration) is grounded on grace."[1993]

The power of prayer to obtain what we ask does not depend on the merit of the person who prays, but on the mercy and faithfulness of God, who has gratuitously, and of his own mere goodness, promised to hear the man who prays to him. When we pray, it is not necessary that we should be friends of God in order to obtain grace; indeed, the act of prayer, as St. Thomas says, makes us his friends: "Prayer itself makes us of the family of God."[1994] And that which we cannot obtain through friendship, we may (as St. Chrysostom in a similar way affirms) obtain by prayer: "That which friendship could not accomplish, has been accomplished by prayer."[1995] And Jesus Christ, to give us more encouragement to pray, and to assure us of obtaining grace when we pray, has made us that great and special promise: Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[1996] As though he had said, Come, sinners, you have no merits of your own for which My Father should listen to you. But this is what you must do; when you want grace, ask for it in My name, and through My merits, and I promise you ("Amen, amen, I say to you," amounts to a kind of oath) you may depend on it, that whatever you ask, you shall obtain from My Father: Whatever you shall ask, He will give it you. Oh, what a sweet consolation for a poor sinner, to know that his sins are no hindrance to his obtaining every grace he asks for, since Jesus Christ has promised that whatever we ask of God, through his merits, he will grant it all!

V. GOD HAS PLEDGED HIMSELF TO GRANT US NOT TEMPORAL BUT SPIRITUAL GOODS

It is, however, necessary to understand that our Lord's promise to hear our prayers does not apply to our petitions for temporal goods, but only to those for spiritual graces necessary, or at any rate useful, for the salvation of the soul; so that we can only expect to obtain the graces which we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, as we said just now. "But," as St. Augustine says, "if we ask anything prejudicial to our salvation, it cannot be said to be asked in the name of the Saviour."[1997] That which is injurious to salvation cannot be expected from the Saviour; God does not and cannot grant it; and why? because he loves us. A physician who has any regard for a sick man will not permit him to have food which he knows will injure him. And how many people would be prevented from committing the sins which they do commit if they were poor or sick? Many people ask for health or riches, but God does not give them, because he sees they would be an occasion of sin, or at least of growing lukewarm in his service. So when we ask these temporal gifts, we ought always to add this condition, if they are profitable for our souls. And when we see that God does not give them, let us rest assured that he refuses them only because he loves us, and because he sees that the things which we ask would only damage our spiritual well-being. And often we ask God to deliver us from some trouble some temptation, which would persuade us to forfeit his grace; but God does not deliver us, in order that our soul may be more closely united in love with him.

It is not temptations or bad thoughts that hurt us, and separate us from God, but consent to evil. When the soul, through the assistance of God's grace, resists a temptation, it makes a great advance in the way of perfection. St. Paul tells us that he was very much troubled with temptations to impurity, and that he prayed God thrice to deliver him from them: A sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan, was given me to buffet me; for which thing I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me.[1998] And what did the Lord answer? He told him, It is enough for you to have my grace: My grace is sufficient for thee.[1999] Thus should we, in the temptations which assault us, pray God to deliver us from them, or at least to help us to resist them. And when we thus pray, we should be quite certain that God is already helping us to resist them: Thou didst call upon Me in affliction, and I delivered thee. I heard thee in the secret place of tempest.[2000] Often does God leave us in the storm for our greater good; but still he hears us in secret, and gives us his grace to strengthen us to resist and to be resigned. So, I repeat, all temporal gifts which are not necessary for salvation ought to be asked conditionally; and if we see that God does not give them, we must feel sure that he refuses them for our greater good. But with regard to spiritual graces, we must be certain that God gives them to us when we ask him. St. Teresa says that God loves us more than we love ourselves.

And St. Augustine has declared that God has a greater desire to give us his grace than we have to receive it: "He is more willing to bestow his favours upon you, than you are desirous of receiving them."[2001] And after him, St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi has said that God feels a kind of obligation to the soul that prays, and, as it were, says to it, "Soul, I thank thee that thou askest me for grace." For then the soul gives him an opportunity of doing good to it, and of thus satisfying his desire of giving his grace to all. And how can it ever happen that God will not hear a soul that asks for the things which he most delights to give? When the soul says, "Lord, I ask Thee not for riches, honours, the goods of this world, but I only beg for Thy grace; deliver me from sin, give me a good death, give me Paradise, and meanwhile give me Thy love" (which is the grace that, as St. Francis de Sales says, we ought to pray for above all others), "give me resignation to Thy will" (which is the virtue in which the whole of the love of God consists), when the soul prays thus, how is it possible that God should refuse to hear it? And what prayers, O my God, wilt Thou ever hear (says St. Augustine), if Thou hearest not those which are made as Thou wishest them to be made: "If Thou hearest not these, what dost thou hear?"[2002] And St. Bernard says, that when we ask for spiritual graces of this kind, the desire of obtaining them can only come to us from God himself; so the saint turns to God, and says to him, "Wherefore hast Thou given the desire, unless Thou wert willing to satisfy it?"[2003] Since Thou, O Lord, dost put into my heart to ask for these graces, I ought to be certain that Thou art willing to hear my prayer.

But above all, the words of Jesus Christ ought to revive our confidence, when we are praying for spiritual graces: If you, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father from heaven give the Good Spirit to them that ask him? [2004] If you, who are full of evil, and of self-love, are unable to refuse your children the good things which they ask, how much more will your heavenly Father, who loves you more than any earthly father can love his family, grant you his spiritual gifts, when you ask him for them?

VI. CONCLUSION

Let us pray, then, and let us always be asking for grace, if we wish to be saved. Let prayer be our most delightful occupation; let prayer be the exercise of our whole life. And when we are asking for particular graces, let us always pray for the grace to continue to pray for the future; because if we leave off praying we shall be lost. There is nothing easier than prayer. What does it cost us to say, Lord, stand by me! Lord, help me! give me Thy love! and the like? What can be easier than this? But if we do not do so, we cannot be saved. Let us pray, then, and let us always shelter ourselves behind the intercession of Mary: "Let us seek for grace, and let us seek it through Mary,"[2005] says St. Bernard. And when we recommend ourselves to Mary, let us be sure that she hears us and obtains for us whatever we want. She cannot lack either the power or the will to help us, as the same saint says: "Neither means nor will can be wanting to her."[2006]

And St. Augustine addresses her: "Remember, O most pious Lady, that it has never been heard that any one who fled to thy protection was forsaken."[2007] Remember that the case has never occurred of a person having recourse to thee, and having been abandoned. Ah, no, says St. Bonaventure, he who invokes Mary, finds salvation; and therefore he calls her "the salvation of those who invoke her." Let us, then, in our prayers always invoke Jesus and Mary; and let us never neglect to pray. I have done. But before concluding, I cannot help saying how grieved I feel when I see that though the Holy Scriptures and the Fathers so often recommend the practice of prayer, yet so few other religious writers, or confessors, or preachers, ever speak of it; or if they do speak of it, just touch upon it in a cursory way, and leave it. But I, seeing the necessity of prayer, say, that the great lesson which all spiritual books should inculcate on their readers, all preachers on their hearers, and all confessors on their penitents, is this, to pray always; thus they should admonish them to pray; pray, and never give up praying. If you pray, you will be certainly saved; if you do not pray, you will be certainly damned.

A PRAYER TO OBTAIN FINAL PERSEVERANCE

Eternal Father, I humbly adore Thee, and thank Thee for having created me, and for having redeemed me through Jesus Christ. I thank Thee most sincerely for having made me a Christian, by giving me the true faith, and by adopting me as Thy son, in the sacrament of baptism. I thank Thee for having, after the numberless sins I had committed, waited for my repentance, and for having pardoned (as I humbly hope) all the offences which I have offered to Thee, and for which I am now sincerely sorry, because they have been displeasing to Thee, who art infinite goodness. I thank Thee for having preserved me from so many relapses, of which I would have been guilty if Thou hadst not protected me. But my enemies still continue, and will continue till death, to combat against me, and to endeavour to make me their slave. If Thou dost not constantly guard and succour me with thy aid, I, a miserable creature, shall return to sin, and shall certainly lose Thy grace. I beseech Thee, then, for the love of Jesus Christ, to grant me holy perseverance unto death. Jesus, Thy Son, has promised that Thou wilt grant whatsoever we ask in his name. Through the merits, then, of Jesus Christ, I beg, for myself and for all the just, the grace never again to be separated from Thy love, but to love Thee forever, in time and eternity. Mary, Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me.

HYMN. DESCRIPTION OF THE LIFE OF A SOUL, THE TRUE SPOUSE OF JESUS, FROM THE WORDS OF ST. BERNARD

"Servus timet, mercenarius sperat, films honorat; at ego, quia sponsa sum, amo amare, amo amari, amo amorem.

"Exigit Deus timen ut Dominus, honorari ut Pater, ut Sponsus amari, Serm. 83 ain Ctn.

The slave fears, the hireling hopes, the son honours; but I, because I am a spouse, love to love, I love to be loved, I love love.

God requires that we fear him as our Lord, that we honour him as our Father, that we love him as our Spouse.

To love is the only true life of a spouse; For love, love alone, her Beloved she serves; One dread, and one only, her fears can arouse, The dread of not loving him as he deserves.

To forfeit her treasure, the love of her Lord,

Were the greatest misfortune she ever could fear:

She seeks no reward for to love is reward,

And to love is the hope which her love holds most dear.

But merely to love the dear Spouse of her heart, To a soul once espoused can never give rest; So, of all that can serve him, or pleasure impart, The spouse who is true ever gives him the best.

Each action she does, every good she may seek, Is to please her dear King and her fealty to prove; To the heart of a spouse her best love seems but weak; When she loves him the most, then she longs most to love.

How great is the joy such a Spouse must impart,

When the light of his presence shines clear in her breast!

But when he withdraws, then her desolate heart Is pining in darkness, and cannot find rest.

She esteems not their lot whom the worldly call great, 'Tis compassion, not envy, she feels in her breast; But she envies their happy and glorious fate Who, united to Jesus, can love him the best.

When she thinks of the spouses departed in peace, Who yet are detained in the prison of pain,

She labours with joy for their speedy release,

That in heaven with God these dear spouses may reign,

She would that all hearts, who yet dwell here below, With the love of her Spouse should so ardently burn, That as much as he merits, so each heart should glow, Or at least with such love as that heart can return.

And when she sees others offend her Belov'd, Oh! for them with what fervour she pleads at his feet, That, hearts so rebellious and proud may be moved, And return to the love of a Saviour so sweet!

Far more does she weep when she sees her own heart Unfaithful sometimes to the love of her Lord; She welcomes his scourges, she dreads not their smart, But she weeps for displeasing her Saviour adored.

O worldlings! souls made for a kingdom above!

She watches her heart, lest some creature should steal A share of that love which to him is all due; For she well knows how jealous her Jesus can feel Of the love of a spouse who has sworn to be true.

Wherever he leads, the spouse follows him still; He speaks, and the spouse, ever faithful, obeys; And such is her pleasure in doing his will, That obedience alone is the joy of her days.

She seeks not for pleasures, no wishes has she, No will of her own does she take for her guide; For the will of her Spouse the sole pleasure must be Of a soul that is chosen by Christ for his bride.

Since to suffer with joy every pain here below Is the best proof of love while on earth we remain, The spouse who desires her affection to show Seeks only and always for suff'ring and pain.

From that world which deceives you forever depart; Be foolish no longer give Him all your love, Who only and ever brings peace to the heart.

No spouse will I own but my Saviour and King: Yet it is not the glory I seek, nor the name;

'Tis the faith and the love of a spouse I would bring, And that faith and that love my whole life shall proclaim.

And since my sweet Jesus in heaven bestows Himself as a Spouse to the spouse of his love, Here I long but to suffer, I ask not repose; I await my repose there, in heaven above.

VI

INTERIOR TRIALS

I. REST FOR SCRUPULOUS SOULS IN OBEDIENCE TO THEIR DIRECTOR

All the anxiety of scrupulous persons consists in the fear lest, in what they do, they are not acting with scruple merely, but with real doubt as to the act being simple, and are therefore incurring sin. But the chief thing they ought to consider is this: that he who acts in obedience to a learned and pious confessor, acts not only with no doubt, but with the greatest security that can be had upon earth, on the divine words of Jesus Christ, that he who hears his ministers is as though he heard himself: He that heareth you heareth Me;[2008] whence St. Bernard says, "Whatever man enjoins in the place of God, provided it be not certainly displeasing to God, is altogether to be received as though enjoined by God."[2009] It is certain that, as to the personal direction of conscience, the confessor is the lawful superior, as St Francis de Sales, with all spiritual instructors, declares, while F. Pinamonti, in his Spiritual Director, says: "It is well to make the scrupulous perceive, that submitting their will to the ministers of the Lord provides them the greatest security in all that is not manifestly sin. Let them read the lives of the saints, and they will find that they know no safer road than obedience."

The saints plainly trusted more to the voice of their confessor than to the immediate voice of God; and yet the scrupulous would lean more on their own judgment than on the Gospel, which assures them, "He that heareth you heareth Me."[2010] The Blessed Henry Suso says, that "God demands no account from us of things done under obedience." St. Philip Neri says the same: "Let such as desire to advance in the way of God submit themselves to a learned confessor, and obey him in God's stead; let him who thus acts assure himself that he will have to render no account to God for his actions."[2011] He says, moreover, that one should have all faith in one's confessor, on the ground that God would not permit him to err; and that there is nothing that more surely cuts asunder the snares of the devil than to do the will of another in what is good, nor anything more full of danger than to be guiding ourselves according to what seems best to us; which is confirmed by St. John of the Cross, who says, in the name of the Lord: "When thou art unfaithful to confessors, thou art so unto Me, who have said, He that despiseth you despiseth Me." And again: "Not to rest satisfied with what the confessor says is pride and failure in faith." We are, therefore, to have this certain confidence, that each person, in obeying his spiritual Father, may be sure of not sinning. "The sovereign remedy for the scrupulous," says St. Bernard, "is a blind obedi ence to their confessor." John Gerson relates, that the same St. Bernard told one of his disciples, who was scrupulous, to go and celebrate, and take his word for it. He went, and was cured of his scruples.

"But a person may answer," says Gerson, "Would to God I had a St. Bernard for my director! but mine is one of indifferent wisdom." And he answers, "Thou dost err, whoever thou art that so speakest; for thou hast not given thyself into the hands of the man because he is well read, etc., but because he is placed over thee; wherefore obey him not as man, but as God."[2012] For this reason St. Teresa well said, " Let the soul accept the confessor with a determination to think no more of personal excuses, but to trust in the words of the Lord, He that heareth you heareth Me. The Lord so highly values this submission, that when, in spite of a thousand inward conflicts, and considering the decision to be an absurd one, we execute it nevertheless, cost us what it may, the Lord so assists us,"[2013] etc.; and she goes on to say, that we then comply with his divine will. Hence St. Francis de Sales, speaking of direction from a spiritual Father in order to walk securely in the way of God, says, "This is the very counsel of all counsels."[2014] "Search as much as you will," says the devout Avila, "you will in no way discover the will of God so surely as by the path of that humble obedience which is so much recommended and practised by the devout of former times." Thus, too, Alvarez said, "Even if the spiritual Father should err, the obedient soul is secure from error, because it rests on the judgment of him whom God has given it as a superior." And F. Nieremberg writes to the same effect: "Let the soul obey the confessor; and then, although the thing itself were matter of fault, he does not sin who does it with the intention of obeying him who holds to him the place of God, persuading himself (as is, indeed, the case) that he is bound to obey him;" forasmuch as (according to the words of F. Rogacci and F. Lessius) the confessor is to us the interpreter of the divine will.

And this is confirmed also by the gloss: "But if what is prescribed be of a doubtful kind, the virtue of obedience exempts from sin, although the thing in itself be evil;"[2015] and in the chapter Inquisitioni de Sent, exc., from the same text, obedience to the confessor is enjoined, when it says that scruples "ought to be dismissed at the judgment of one's pastor." [2016] St. Francis de Sales gives three maxims of great consolation to the scrupulous: "1 An obedient soul has never been lost; 2. We ought to rest satisfied with knowing from our spiritual Father that we are going on well, without seeking a personal knowledge of it; 3. The best thing is to walk on blindly through all the darkness and perplexity of this life, under the providence of God."[2017] And therefore all the doctors of morals conclude, in general, with St. Antoninus, Navarro, Silvester, etc., that obedience to the confessor is the safest rule for walking well in the ways of God. F. Tirillo and F. La Croix [2018] say that this is the common doctrine of the holy Fathers and masters of the spiritual life. In the second place, the scrupulous should know, not only that they are safe in obeying, but that they are bound to obey, their director, and to despise the scruple, acting with all freedom in the midst of their doubts. This is the teaching of Natalis Alexander: "That scruples ought to be despised when one has the judgment of a prudent, pious, and learned director; and that one ought to act against them is plain from the chapter Inquisitioni, etc.,[2019] as above; and of Father Wigandt: "He who acts against scruples does not sin; nay, sometimes it is a precept to do so, especially when backed by the judgment of the confessor."[2020]

So do these authors speak, although they belong to the rigid school; so, too, the doctors in general;[2021] and the reason is, that if the scrupulous man lives in his scruples, he is in danger of placing grievous impediments in the way of satisfying his obligations, or, at least, of making any spiritual progress; and, moreover, of going out of his mind, losing his health, and destroying his conscience by despair or by relaxation. Hence St. Antoninus agrees with Gerson in thus reproving the scrupulous, who, through a vain fear, is not obedient in overcoming his scruples: "Beware lest, from overmuch desire to walk securely, thou fall and destroy thyself." [2022] For this reason F. Wigandt also says, that the scrupulous man ought to obey his director in all cases where the precept is not plainly sin, "unless the director enjoins what is manifestly against God;"[2023] and it is the general and undoubted decision among Doctors, that in things doubtful each one is bound to obey him who is placed over him, if it be not evidently a sin. This is proved by St. Bernard in a passage quoted at the commencement; and by St. Ignatius Loyola, who says: "There must be obedience in all things in which no sin is perceived, that is, in which there is not manifest sin."[2024]

Also by Blessed Humbert, General of the Friars Preachers, who says: "Unless the precept be plainly evil, it is to be received as though enjoined by God."[2025] Moreover, by Blessed Denis the Carthusian: "In things doubtful as to whether or not they are against the divine precept, one must stand by the precept of him who is set over one; because, although it should be against the precept of God, yet, in virtue of obedience, the person under direction sins not."[2026] Of the same opinion is St. Bonaventure. This makes Gerson say: "The scrupulous are to act against their scruples, and plant their feet firmly in resisting them. We cannot set scruples to rest better than by despising them; and, as a general rule, not without the advice of another, and especially our Superior. Otherwise, either ill-regulated fear or inconsiderate presumption will be our fall." "With a firm foot," says he, "they ought to overcome the scruple."[2027] And so the remedy that St. Philip Neri gave the scrupulous was, to make them despise their scruples. It is thus written in his life: "Moreover, besides the general remedy of committing one's self altogether and for everything to the judgment of the confessor, he gave another, by exhorting his penitents to despise their scruples. Hence he forbade such persons to confess often; and when, in confession, they entered upon their scruples, he used to send them to Communion without hearing them."[2028] So, then, in conclusion, the scrupulous man ought to set before himself obedience, and look upon his scrupulous fear as vain, and so act with freedom.

Nor does this require (say the Doctors Busembaum,[2029] with Sanchez and others) that in each particular act he should expressly determine that the thing is a scruple, and that he ought to obey his confessor in despising it; it is enough that he act against it in virtue of a judgment made beforehand, since, from his past experience, the same judgment resides in his conscience habitually or virtually, though dim and confused. Hence La Croix[2030] and Tamburini, together with Vasquez, Val., etc., [2031] add, that if he who is scrupulous be unable amid that darkness to lay aside his scruple at once, or call clearly to mind the obedience laid on him by the confessor, which some anxious consciences are disabled from doing, perplexed as they are how to put by their scruple, by reason of the fear that weighs upon them, in that case he does not sin, though he act with a positive fear of sinning; and for this reason that as he has already passed a like judgment upon former scruples, and on the duty of obeying the injunction given him to despise them, he ought assuredly to believe himself to possess it now also, though, from the force of his fear, he does not perceive it. But the scrupulous ought at such a time to despise the fear, inasmuch as it forms no true verdict of conscience.

Hear how Gerson openly confirms this point, and what advice he gives: "A formed conscience is, when, after discussion and deliberation, a definite sentence of the reason judges that a thing is to be done or to be avoided; and to act against this is a sin: but fear or scruple of conscience is, when the mind wavers in doubt, not knowing which of two things it is bound to do, and yet would not omit whatever it could ascertain to be agreeable to the divine will; and this fear is as much as possible to be cast away and quenched."[2032] In fact, then, Gerson says that a person sins by acting under a practical doubt, when the doubt proceeds from a formed conscience; but that this formed conscience exists when, after examining the circumstances, he deliberately judges with a definitive sentence on what he is obliged and what he is forbidden to do; and he sins by acting against such a conscience as this. But that, when the mind is doubtful and wavering, and yet would not do anything that was displeasing to God, this, says Gerson, is no true doubtfulness, but a vain fear, which ought as much as possible to be cast away and despised. So that when there certainly exists in the scrupulous person the habitual will not to offend God, it is certain (according to Gerson) that while he acts in his doubtfulness he does not sin; and with reason, since it is then not a true doubt, although he may apprehend it to be a doubt, but a vain fear. On the other hand, it is certain, that for the commission of a mortal sin there is required a full perception on the part of the reason, and a complete deliberate consent on the part of the will, and to will something which grievously offends God. This doctrine is undoubted, and common to all the theologians,[2033] and even to the most rigid, as Juenin, Habert, and that most rigorous of all, Genet, who speaks thus: "But if (the act) contain only an imperfect degree of deliberation, the sin will be venial, not mortal."[2034] And this, too, is the teaching of all the rest, with St. Thomas, who says: "That which is mortal may be venial, owing to the act being imperfect, since it does not absolutely amount to the perfection of a mortal act, being not deliberate, but sudden."[2035]

Let scrupulous souls, then, suffer this cross of theirs with resignation, and not perplex themselves in the greatest distresses which God may send or permit. It is for their profit, to the end that they may be humbler, may guard better against such occasions as are beyond doubt and seriously dangerous, may commend themselves oftener to the Lord, and put a more entire trust in the divine goodness. Meanwhile let them often have recourse to the most holy Virgin Mary, who is called, and is in truth, the Mother of Mercy, and comforter of the afflicted. Let them, indeed, fear to offend God, wherever they do in truth discern what will offend him; but if only they are steadfast in resolving rather to die a thousand times than lose the grace of God, let them, above all things, fear lest they fail in obedience to their directors. On the other hand, while they blindly obey, they may assure themselves of not being abandoned by that Lord who will have all men saved, and who, loving good-will as he does, never suffers a really obedient soul to perish. "No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded,[2036] Casting all your care upon Him, for He hath care of you."[2037] The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?[2038] In peace in the self—same I will sleep and I will rest; for Thou, O Lord, singularly hast settled me in hope?[2039] In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; let me never be confounded?[2040]

II. COUNSELS, FROM WHICH A SOUL, WHEN IN DESOLATION, MAY DERIVE COMFORT AND CONFIDENCE

A SPIRITUAL CONFERENCE—BETWEEN THE AUTHOR AND ONE WHO SEEKS HIS ADVICE WHEN SUBJECTED BY GOD TO SPIRITUAL TRIBULATIONS

Question. Let me hear what these troubles of conscience are, which, as you tell me, keep you in a state of such affliction.

Answer. Father, it is now about three years since I began to suffer such dryness and desolation of spirit as to prevent my finding God either in prayer or before the Sacrament of the Altar, or in my Communions. I seem to be a soul without love, without hope, and without faith, abandoned, in short, by God. Neither the Passion of Jesus Christ nor the Holy Eucharist any longer affects me; I am become insensible to devotion of every kind. I confess that it is all on account of my sins, for which I deserve nothing short of hell.

Q. You tell me, in short, that you have now been for a long time in a state of aridity. In order to give you an answer adequate to your need, it is necessary that I should know whether this aridity of yours is voluntary or involuntary. Let me explain myself. "It is voluntary aridity" when a person commits voluntary and deliberate faults, and takes no pains to amend. This is not, properly speaking, to be called aridity, but tepidity, from which if—the soul does not exert itself to get free, it will ever be going on from bad to worse; and God grant that, in course of time, it may not fall into more serious disasters: aridity of this kind is a slow fever, which does not cause death immediately, but to a certainty brings it on. Whereas aridity is "involuntary" when a person makes it his study to walk in the way of perfection, keeps on his guard against deliberate faults, frequently prays, and goes to the Sacraments; and, with all this, feels himself dry of spirit. To come to our present case: you have mentioned the sins of your past life; and, I ask, have you not made these sins the subject of confession?A. Yes, Father; I have not only made a general confession of them, but I have confessed them many times.

Q. And what does your director say?

A. He has forbidden me to make further mention of what belongs to my past life; but I always feel disquieted, continually fearing that I may not have explained myself sufficiently. I am, moreover, tormented by thousands of temptations to unbelief, impurity, and pride. I drive them away; but still am ever in fear lest I may in some way have tacitly consented to them.

Q. And what does your director say with regard to this other head of bad thoughts?A. He wishes me not to confess them, excepting when I could with certainty make oath, at first sight, that I had consented to them. What do you, Father, tell me? Give me some instruction for my comfort.

Q. What do I tell you? I tell you that you ought more implicitly to trust in obedience to your director. Have you read that instruction of St. Philip Neri, that he who acts in obedience to his confessor may rest assured that he will not have to render an account to God of the things which he does? The saint used to say, besides, that "one should have faith in one's confessor, for God would not leave him in error; and that there is nothing more sure to defeat the designs of the devil than obedience to one's spiritual father as regards what relates to God; whereas, on the contrary, there is nothing more dangerous than the will to be guided by one's own opinion." Have you read what St. Francis de Sales says, when speaking on the subject of obedience to onēs director? "Of all counsels this is the chief." "Search as much as you will," says the devout Avila, "and you will never so surely find out the will of God as by the way of this humble obedience, which was so much recommended and practised by all the devout in the early ages." We find the same also in the writings of St. Teresa, who says: [2041] "Let the soul choose its confessor with the determination to take no further thought for itself, but to place its trust in the words of the Lord, He that heareth you heareth Me. [2042] So great is the value which God sets on this submission, that, even in spite of a thousand conflicts, and though it appears to ourselves that his judgment is wrong, let us, whether it costs us suffering or not, act according to it, and thus fulfil the divine will." St. John of the Cross, too, says (speaking in the name of Jesus Christ): "When you are unfaithful to your confessor, you are so to Me, who have said, He that despiseth you despiseth Me. And then he adds these words: "Not to rest satisfied with what one's confessor says is pride and want of faith." The saint speaks thus on account of those words of Jesus Christ, which have been quoted above, "He that heareth you heareth Me;" and hence, too, it was that St. Francis de Sales[2043] set down these other most useful maxims: "1. One who is truly obedient is never lost. 2. We should rest satisfied with knowing from our spiritual Father that we are going on well, without searching for the reasons on which that judgment of his is formed." (An excellent instruction this for those scrupulous people who wish to find out the reasons for what their spiritual Father enjoins them.) 3. St. Francis adds another excellent maxim, as a consequence of the foregoing, saying, "It is best for us in this life to go on blindly, under divine providence, in a state of darkness and perplexity."

This instruction to be obedient to onēs spiritual Father in doubts of conscience is, moreover, that which is given by all the Doctors of the Church, and by all the holy Fathers; for all the rest of whom let St. Bernard suffice, saying, as he does, that whatever is imposed by man acting on behalf of God, provided only it be not certainly a sin, should not be regarded otherwise than as the command of God himself: "Whatever precept is given by man when representing God, and is not such as certainly to be displeasing unto him, is to be by no means otherwise received than as the precept of God." [2044] In short, obedience to his consecrated ministers is the one safest remedy that Jesus Christ has left us for quieting the doubts of conscience, and we ought to return him the greatest thanks for it; for how could a scrupulous soul, in its doubts, find perfect rest otherwise? This tribulation of scruples and for those who love God it has far greater torments than all other afflictions of infirmity, persecutions, and the like is what almost all the saints have had to suffer, St. Teresa, St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, St. Frances of Chantal, and many others besides; and how have they obtained tranquillity, excepting by obedience? Now, what have you to say? Are you satisfied that, in obeying your director, you are going on safely?

A. Yes, Father, I am persuaded of this; but how does it happen that in a course of obedience persevered in for even two whole years, I experience nothing in the way of devotion?

Q. Now, then, I understand what is your defect, and why it is that, as you say, you do not find peace. Is the will of God the object of your search, or are not consolations and spiritual sweetnesses the things that you are seeking for? If you wish to sanctify yourself, seek only, from this day forth, the will of God, whose will it is that you become a saint, but who will not maintain you in this life in a state of consolation. If you have not consolation itself, console yourself with the hope of having with you him who is the Consoler. Is it of having suffered two years of dryness that you complain? It was forty years of dryness that St. Frances of Chantal suffered. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi suffered five years of pains and temptations without the smallest alleviation; and, at the end of those five years, she herself prayed to God that he would not grant her, in this world, any more sensible consolations. St. Philip Neri was so much inflamed with divine love, and yet he used to say, "My Jesus, I have never yet loved Thee, and I would wish to love Thee." At another time he would say, "As yet I do not know Thee, O my Jesus! for I am seeking Thee." Again, he would say, "I would wish to love Thee, O my Jesus! and I find not the way. I seek for Thee, and I find Thee not." This is the way in which the saints speak; and why do you alarm yourself so because you are in a state of dryness, and do not find God as you would wish to find him?

A. But these were saints; whereas I know not whether God has yet pardoned the many sins whereby I have offended him, as I cannot be sure of having had a true sorrow for them.

Q. But what is the matter now? Perhaps it is that you take complacency in the thought of the sins that you have committed?

A, No; I detest them; I hate them more than death.

Q. And why do you fear that God may not have pardoned you? The holy Fathers say that he who hates the sins he has committed is sure of forgiveness from God; and, besides, it is certain, as St. Teresa says, that "he who is resolved to die rather than offend God is, without a doubt, penitent for his past offences against him." Tell me, are you resolved to endure sufferings of every description rather than lose the divine grace?

A. Yes, my Father; by the grace of God, I am resolved to let myself be torn to pieces sooner than commit, with eyes open to it, a single sin, even though it were a venial one.

Q. Well, then, what reason is there why God should hate you? You are afraid lest God hate you. Oh, if you only saw the love which he now bears towards you, you would this very moment drop down dead here where you are standing, out of mere consolation! Do you not know that Jesus Christ is that good Shepherd who has come into the world to give life, and to save every poor sheep of his flock, even though voluntarily lost? And how, then, is it his will to abandon one of those sheep of his who is ready to die sooner than deliberately cause him the least possible displeasure?

A. But who knows whether I may not have consented to some grievous sin, and God may have abandoned me on this account?

Q. No; you are not speaking well. Mortal sin is so horrible a monster that it is impossible for a sin of this kind to be in the soul, without the souls being aware of it. No sinner who is out of God's grace has any doubts about it, but is certain that he has lost it; and therefore it is an established maxim with all the masters of the spiritual life that when a person who fears God doubts whether he has not lost the divine grace, it is certain that he has not lost it; for the very reason that no one loses God without knowing it for certain; and thus, whenever you are in doubt about having lost God, be sure that you have not lost him.

A. But why is it that I feel so devoid of confidence?

Q. Listen. You know that true confidence consists not in feeling it, but in willing it. Have you the will to put your trust in God? If you have the will to confide in him, you have already confidence itself.

A. But where is my love for God?

Q. As regards love for God, the same rule holds good which holds with regard to confidence. Love, too, is in the will. Have you the will to love God? If it is your will to love him, understand that you already love him. You would like to have the consolation of feeling the confidence and the love; but God, for your greater good, does not will that you should be consoled by feeling this confidence and this love of yours. Be content, therefore, to possess without feeling it. I tell you the same thing with regard to faith also: it is enough that you have the will to believe whatsoever the Church teaches you, without desiring to feel that you believe. There will come a time when the clouds will clear away, and the light will arise, which will make your consolation twofold. Meanwhile, be content to remain in the dark, and to abandon yourself to the hand of God's divine will and mercy. Let us take the divine Scriptures for our comfort during this interval. In one place God says: Turn to me, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will turn to you.[2045] If, then, we wish for God, let us take our leave of creatures; let us turn with love to him, and he will straightway turn with love to us. To all he says: Come to Me, all you that labour and are burdened and I will refresh you.[2046]

O ye who are afflicted, come unto Me; and it shall be my care to raise you up. In another passage he says, Come and accuse me, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow.[2047] He goes so far as to say, "Come, ye sinners, come as penitents; and if I do not pardon you, accuse Me, accuse Me, and treat Me as a liar. But no; howsoever blackened your consciences may be, I will, through My grace, cause them to become white as snow." He goes after sinners as one weeping out of compassion over their ruin, saying, And why will ye die, O house of Israel?[2048] As though he said, "And why will you involve yourselves in damnation, My children, when you have in Me one who is ready to save you, if you will have recourse to Me?" Now, if he speaks in this way to those who are obstinate, how is it possible that he should drive away a soul that wishes to love him? Tell me honestly, are you attached to any earthly affection, to any person, to anything in the shape of property, to the ambition of excelling, of being preferred before others? Take heed to what is said by St. John of the Cross, that "every attachment, however trifling, every thread has power to prevent you from winging your way to God, and from being all his own."

A. No; by the grace of God, I think that I have no attachment to anything in this world, so as to be willing to commit for it any deliberate fault; but I see, nevertheless, that I am full of defects. I dislike to be despised; and on such occasions I sometimes show resentment.

Q. And after this resentment, what is it that you do?

A. I humble myself, I pray to God to forgive me, and I resolve not to fall into the same error again, trusting in Jesus Christ to give me strength; but notwithstanding this, I remain altogether in a state of fear and disquiet. Then it seems as though it were impossible for me to possess the power of sanctifying myself; nay, the very pretending to it appears to me to be pride.

Q. All is well; persevere in acting thus. It is only not well to remain in a state of disquiet. If you fall, so to say, a hundred times in the day, always do the same, make an act of contrition, and a resolution, through God's assistance, not to fall again, together with an act of confidence in Jesus Christ; and then remain in peace. You must know, likewise, that it is not pride, even after a fault, for us to hope to sanctify ourselves; rather it would be pride to despond after the fault, and to be troubled, as though the resolutions we had made had secured us against any subsequent fall. Humble yourself then, and have confidence in God. Enough now. I already understand and comprehend the substance of all your fears, which arise from not knowing whether you will obtain your salvation, and whether you are at present in the grace of God. What you have told me is enough; do not propose to me any more doubts and questions about these troubles of yours. I know your conscience already; and I wish to leave with you some reflections, which I hope will give you peace whenever you are troubled. Peace, I say, but not that peace which is free from every shade of fear; for this is the peace which God reserves for us in heaven. But while we are in this world, it is his will that we should ever have a certain degree of fear, that so we may not leave off waiting upon and praying for the divine assistance, and confiding in the divine mercy, otherwise we should often be forgetting to have recourse to God; and therefore it is that he permits us to be harassed by fears, in order that we may not give up having recourse to him.

III. REASONS FOR HAVING CONFIDENCE IN THE DIVINE MERCY THROUGH THE MERITS OF JESUS CHRIST

There are, then, according to what you have told me, two great fears by which, principally, you are distressed, the first, that salvation may not be yours; the second, that God may not have pardoned your sins.

1. With regard to the former of these, whether your name is or is not inscribed in the Book of Life, this is a secret which it is not the will of God that any should know; that so, through the fear of damnation, every one should be diligent by means of good works to secure his salvation. Thus St. Peter writes: Wherefore, brethren, labour the more, that by good works you may make sure your calling and election.[2049] It is true that our conversion and salvation must be the work of God; but it is requisite for us, too, to strive on our own part to convert ourselves to God, and then he will not fail to save us: Be converted unto me and you shall be saved.[2050] It was Calvin's detestable blasphemy which asserted that God creates some people for the express purpose of sending them to hell; and the same infamous heretic went on to say that God himself constrained them to sin, in order that they might be damned; whereas it is certain that it is God's will for all to be saved: Who will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth.[2051]

And he declares, even with respect to the wicked, who richly deserve everlasting death, that he would wish them too to be converted and saved: As I live, saith the Lord, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live.[2052] It is observed by Tertullian that the words which stand first in this sentence ("As I live") are an oath which is taken by God, in order that we may believe him without hesitation: "Swearing even, saying, As I live, desiring to be believed."[2053] And hence that most learned writer, Petavius, expresses himself in terms of great astonishment that there should be any one to doubt that truth, that God's will is for all to be saved; and therefore he says that if this Scripture, which God has confirmed by an oath, were ever permitted to be vilified and wrested into any other signification, what will there remain in matters of faith sufficiently clear to be safe against being called in question? "What is there so clearly set forth in decrees of faith as to be henceforth safe from cavils?"[2054] And why is it that God has so great a desire to save all mankind? It is because he himself has created them, by reason of the love which he has borne towards them from all eternity. I have loved thee with an everlasting love, this is what the Lord says to every man, therefore have I drawn thee, taking pity upon thee.[2055]

Moreover, the Lord, knowing our weakness, has patience with sinners, as St. Peter tells us, because he wills not that they should perish, but do penance for their sins, and obtain salvation: But dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[2056] That Redeemer who has ransomed us from eternal death at the price of his own blood, says St. Augustine, does not desire to see those souls of ours lost which have cost him so much: "He who has redeemed us at so great a price does not wish those whom lie has purchased to perish."[2057] In short, God would wish to save all; and when he sees any who are constraining him by their sins to sentence them to hell, he, as it were, weeps in compassion over them, and says, And wherefore will ye die, O house of Israel? Return ye and live.[2058] As though he were to say, "But, My children, why will you destroy and damn yourselves in eternity, when I have died upon the cross in order to save you? If you have gone astray from Me, return to Me as penitents, and I will restore to you the life that you have lost." Now from this you may infer whether it is not God's desire to see you saved; and therefore, from this day forth, never again say, "But who knows whether God wills that I be saved? Who knows whether he does not will that I be damned for the offences which I have given him?" Drive all thoughts like these utterly away, seeing, as you do, that God is assisting you with his grace, and calling you by so many motives to his love.

2. Moreover, as regards your other fear, that the Lord may not yet have pardoned the sins of your past life, I have already told you at the outset that, in respect of this, you ought to quiet yourself by the obedience which your confessor has given you, to think no further about confessing what has happened during your past life, after the confessions which you have already made. Recollect, as I told you, what St. Teresa says, that one who obeys his confessor, "whether with suffering or without it," may rest assured that he is doing God's will. And I would also put you in mind of what St. John of the Cross says, "That not to rest satisfied with what one's confessor says is a want of faith;" since, in truth, Jesus Christ has said that he who is obedient to his ministers is obedient to himself, and he who despises his ministers despises him: He that heareth you heareth Me; he that despiseth you despiseth Me.[2059] And so from this day forth, let us place every thought about our salvation in the hands of our Lord, and leave it there; for lie (as St. Peter says) has taken us into his care: Casting all your care upon Him: for He hath care of you.[2060] Moreover, in order to keep ourselves in the grace of God, we must have an utter distrust of our own strength; since, without the aid of grace, we could not do anything that is good, and, on the contrary, might fall into all that is evil; and therefore it is that our entire safety lies in recommending ourselves continually unto God, because being, as we are, in continual danger of falling, so we have continual need of procuring, through prayer, the assistance of God. This assistance, says St. Bernard, offers itself to all; and no one remains without it except he who despises it: "It is offered to all; and no one is devoid of it save he who refuses it."[2061] The divine aid, then, is offered to all; but it is God's will that he who desires it should ask him for it, Ask, and ye shall receive.[2062]

And he who is careless about asking for it will remain without it, and will involve himself in destruction. When the devil, then, is frightening us by the thought of our weakness, let us not give ourselves up to despair, but hope to receive the power to resist all his temptations from that God who is omnipotent, and who strengthens us to hope, paying, with the apostle, I can do all things in Him who strengthened me.[2063] And if we place our confidence in God, how shall it be possible for us to be put to confusion? No; it is written in the Book of Ecclesiasticus, No one hath hoped in the Lord, and been confounded.[2064] The mere name of Jesus is sufficient to vanquish all the powers of hell. St. Paul says that God has given to Jesus Christ a name which is above every name, since it is at that name that everything is made to humble itself: He hath given Him a name which is above all names; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those that are in heaven, on earth, and under the earth.[2065] In contending with the enemies of our salvation, it often avails more to victory to call to our aid the name of Jesus than to say many long prayers.

IV. OTHER SPECIAL COUNSELS

Further, while upon this point, I wish to leave with you for your consolation some other instructions as to particulars, which, I think, may prove to be of great use to your conscience.

1. I repeat my recommendation to you to be obedient to your confessor, because, by what I have been able to ascertain with respect to this obedience, you have not had up to this time an entire faith, and therefore have often been disquieted. What I have said to you above on this matter is sufficient. Hold it for certain that one who goes on under obedience is journeying safely to Paradise.

2. Then, when things go contrary, be careful to receive it all as from the hands of God; and especially in times of sickness be scrupulously obedient to your medical adviser, in taking the remedies he prescribes, making known to him without exaggeration all that you are suffering; and then remain in peace. Forbear to ask for acts of compassion from those who come to see you; and whenever any one expresses for you more than a moderate amount of compassion, let your reply be made in the words of Jesus Christ: The chalice which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?[2066] Say, "God sends me this evil, not because he wishes me evil, but because he wishes well to me; and shall I not accept it with peace?" In time of sickness it is perceived whether a person is spiritual or not. There are some devout people who, when they are in health, are all sweetness and humility; but if they are in any way invalided, they straightway become impatient and proud, complaining of all about them, and especially if they have not, to a moment, the medicine or the attendance which they require. In sickness, then, suffer all without making complaints; and in all circumstances, too, which savour of adversity say, with Job, As it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord.[2067] Be also careful to endure contempt without resentment; it is by this that one knows whether a person is humble, namely, if he receives contempt patiently.

3. God is all goodness to one who seeks him: The Lord is good to the soul that seeketh Him.[2068] No one has ever put his trust in God, and had to remain abandoned by him: None hath hoped in the Lord, and been confounded.[2069] God lets himself be found even by those who seek him not, as St. Paul observes: I was found by them that did not seek Me,[2070] With how much greater ease will he not allow himself to be found by one who does seek him! From this day forth, then, forbear to say that God has abandoned you; the Lord abandons none but the obstinate only, who desire to live in sin; neither does he altogether abandon even these, but is ever going after them up to the time of their death, giving them portions of light for their succour, that so he may not see them lost.

4. When a soul is seeking to love him, he cannot but love it, as he has himself declared: I love them that love Me.[2071] And whenever he hides himself from these loving souls, he does so for their advantage only, that he may see them yet more desirous of finding his grace, and more closely united with himself. Behold what St. Catharine of Genoa used to say, when suffering aridity to such a degree that it seemed to her as if God had abandoned her, and that nothing remained to her as a ground for hope; it was then that she would say: "How happy I am in this state, so deplorable even as it is! May my heart be broken down to ruins, provided that my Love be glorified! O my dearest Love! if from this unhappy state of mine is produced but a single atom of glory for Thee, I pray that Thou wouldst leave me thus for all eternity!" And saying this, she would burst into a flood of tears in the midst of her desolation.

5. You must know that souls which love the Crucified enter, in time of desolation, in to a closer union with God in the interior of their heart. There is nothing which occasions so diligent a search for God as does desolation; neither is there anything that attracts God to the heart so much as desolation, since the acts of conformity to the divine will which are made in desolation are more pure and perfect than others; and hence, the greater the desolation, the greater is the humility, the purer is the resignation, the purer is the confidence, the purer are the prayers, and so the more abundant are the divine graces and assistances.

6. In order to arrive at perfection, attend above all things to the exercise of divine love; the love of God, when he makes our heart his abode, is that which of itself despoils it of every irregular affection; nevertheless, let it be your endeavour to make frequent repetitions of acts of divine love, saying, My God, I love Thee, I love Thee, I love Thee; and I hope to die with these words on my lips, My God, I love Thee. The saints tell us that a soul ought not to make fewer acts of love than of respiration.

7. Moreover, in time of prayer, make an unreserved offering of yourself to God many times over. Say to him in all sincerity: My Jesus, I give myself up to Thee without reserve. I wish to be all Thine own, all Thine own; and if I know not how to give myself up as I ought, do Thou, my Jesus, take me, and make me all Thine own. St. Teresa made an entire offering of herself to God fifty times every day. This is a practice which even you can follow. Therefore make a continual offering to him of your will, in those words of St. Paul: Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?[2072] This one act was enough to transform St. Paul from a persecutor of the Church into a vessel of election.

For this purpose, too, pray to God frequently in the words of David: Teach me to do Thy will.[2073] To this end should be directed all the prayers that you offer to God and to the Mother of God, to your guardian angel, and to all your patron saints, that they would obtain for you the grace perfectly to do the will of God; in short, let this one expression, Fiat voluntas Tua, serve you as a remedy for all your evils, and as a means of attaining all that is good.

8. And when you experience more aridity than usual, exercise yourself by delighting in the infinite joy which your God, whom you love, is enjoying, which is an act of love the most perfect that is exercised by the saints in heaven, who rejoice not so much for their own beatitude as for that of God, loving him all the while, as they do, immeasurably beyond themselves.

9. Then, with reference to the subject of prayer, always meditate on the Passion of Jesus Christ. Jesus suffering out of his love for us is the object which most forcibly attracts our hearts. If, while meditating on the mysteries of the Passion, the Lord grants you any feeling of tenderness, receive it with thankfulness; but whenever you do not experience this, you must know that you will always derive from the practice great comfort for your soul. Frequently go, more especially, to the garden of Gethsemani, after the example of St. Teresa, who used to say that she found him there alone; and on considering him when in affliction so great that he falls into an agony, sweats blood, and declares his sorrow to be such as to be enough to cause him to die, you will readily find comfort in any afflictions of your own, seeing that he endures it all out of his love for you.

And at that sight of Jesus preparing himself to die for you, do you likewise prepare yourself to die for him; and when you experience in your distresses more affliction than usual, then say what St. Thomas the Apostle said to the other disciples: Let us also go, that we may die with Him.[2074] Let us die with Jesus. Go likewise to Calvary, where you will find him expiring on the Cross, consumed by suffering; and on seeing him in that condition, it were impossible for you not to rest content willingly to suffer pain of every kind for a God who is dying of sufferings undergone through his love for you. St. Paul protested that he neither knew nor wished to know anything in this life save Jesus crucified: For I judged not myself to know anything among you but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.[2075] St. Bonaventure says that one who would maintain a continued devotion towards Jesus Christ ought, with the eye of his understanding, to be ever contemplating him dying upon the Cross: "Let him who would preserve devotion within his soul, ever keep the eyes of his heart fixed upon Christ dying upon the Cross."[2076] And thus, in all your fears, look at Jesus crucified, and take courage, and brace yourself up to suffer through love for him.

10. Above everything, prayer is that which I recommend to you; when you cannot tell what else to say, it would be enough for you to say, Lord, help me, and help me quickly: Lord, come to my assistance; make haste, O Lord, to help me.[2077] You are already aware how often the Church repeats this prayer in the office which priests and religious have to recite. And St. Philip Neri made the recital of the same prayer sixty-three times, in the fashion of a rosary, a subject of his instruction.

The Lord has promised to grant us whatsoever we ask him for: Ask, and it shall be given unto you.[2078] St. Bernard went off into an ecstasy while thinking upon those words of Jesus Christ to the two sons of Zebedee, who said to him, Master, we desire that whatsoever we shall ask, Thou wouldst do it for us;[2079] and the reply of Jesus was: What would you that I should do for you?[2080] And all the graces which you ask of God, ask for them always in the name of Jesus Christ. Whatsoever we receive from God, we receive it all through the merits of Jesus Christ; and our Redeemer has himself promised us that whatsoever we ask of the Father in his name, the Father will give it us all: "Amen, Amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you."[2081] Now, when you are afraid lest it should be God's will to send you to hell, think with yourself whether it be possible for him who says, "Ask of Me what you will, and I will give it you," to have the will to send you to hell.

11. And why, then, when you are in a state of desolation, are you disposed to entertain the suspicion that God hates you? You ought not to grieve, but rather to be consoled, by seeing that God is dealing with you as he deals with the souls of those of his servants who are the most dear to himself. And how has he not dealt with his own Son, of whom it is written in Holy Scripture: The Lord was pleased to bruise Him in infirmity.[2082] It was his will to behold him consumed and crushed under sufferings and torments.

12. When you are frightened by the thought that it may be God's will to abandon you on account of your ingratitude, do that which was done by the two disciples, who, as they were going to Emmaus, were accompanied by Jesus in the guise of a pilgrim; and when they were near the place, Jesus gave signs that it was his will to go further (He made as though He would go further[2083]), but they, the Gospel tells us, constrained him, saying, Stay with us because it is towards evening,[2084] And then He was pleased to enter into the house, and to remain with them: And He went in with them,[2085] And thus, when it seems to you as if it were the Lord's will to leave you, do you constrain him to remain with you, saving to him. My Jesus, stay with me, remain with me; I wish that Thou wouldst not leave me; if Thou dost leave me, to whom shall I have to go for consolation and salvation? Lord, to whom shall we go?[2086] as was said by St. Peter. And so go on to pray to him lovingly and tenderly; and do not fear but that, to a certainty, he will not leave you. Then say with the apostle: Neither death, nor life . . . nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God,[2087] which is in Christ Jesus our Lord? Say to him: My Saviour, show thyself as much displeased with me as Thou wilt; but know that not the fear of death, nor a desire for life, nor any other of this world's creatures, shall ever have power to separate me from my love for Thee. Or, again, say what was said by St. Francis de Sales, when a young man and in a state of aridity, in answer to the devil, who suggested to him that he was destined to go to hell: "And since I shall not be able to love my God in eternity, I wish to love him, at least in this life, as much as lies in my power." And so he recovered his cheerfulness.

13. Again: when you feel yourself more than usually oppressed by fears or dryness, do not omit to have recourse to Most Holy Mary, whom God has given us as a consoler for those who are in affliction. Jesus Christ is the foundation of all our hopes; but the Church desires us to call Mary our hope: "Spes nostra, salve." All graces in their origin, come to us from God; but St. Bernard says that they all pass through Mary's hand; and consequently he who does not recommend himself to the Blessed Virgin closes against himself the channel of grace; while, on her part, she does not neglect to give succour to every one who calls upon her to aid him. And therefore it is that all the saints have been careful to recommend themselves continually to this divine Mother, who has all power with God.

14. Moreover, all the time that you have the intention of loving God, keep your heart open: Open thy mouth, and I will fill it.[2088] The meaning of what is here said by God, "Open thy mouth, and I will fill it, is, that the more we hope for from God, the more we shall receive from him. He has declared that he shows favour towards those who place confidence in him: He is the protector of all that trust in Him.[2089] And represent to yourself, whenever you feel doubts about the Lord's hearing you, that he is chiding you as he did St. Peter, and saying to you: O thou of little faith, why didst thou doubt?[2090] Why dost thou doubt My hearing thee, knowing as thou dost the promise which I have made, to grant the requests of every one that prays to Me?

And because he is willing to grant us our requests, it is his will that we believe that he certainly does grant them whenever we ask him for graces: All things whatsoever you ask, when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[2091] Observe the words, believe that you shall receive; for they show that we must ask God for graces with a sure, unhesitating confidence that we shall receive them; as St. James also exhorts us: But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering.[2092] In dealing with this God, who is all goodness, have a great confidence, and rid yourself of everything like sadness. He who serves God and is sad, instead of honouring him, treats him rather with dishonour. St. Bernard tells us that he wrongs God who represents him to himself as cross and severe; being, as he is, goodness and mercy itself. "How can you entertain a doubt," says the saint, "of Jesus pardoning your sins, when he has affixed them to the cross, whereon he died for you, with the very nails by which his own hands were pierced?" God declares that it is his delight to be with us: My delights are to be with the children of men.[2093] If, then, it is God's delight to treat with us, it is only just that all our delights should consist in treating with him; and this thought should give us courage to treat with God with every confidence, endeavouring to spend all that remains of life to us with this God of ours, who loves us so much, and with whom we hope to be in company in heaven for all eternity. Let us, then, treat him with all confidence and love, as our most dear and affectionate friend, who loves us more than any other does.

Alas! souls that are scrupulous treat God as a tyrant, from whose subjects reserve and fear only are required; and consequently they are apprehensive that, at every word inconsiderately spoken, at every thought which crosses their mind, he may enter into his wrath with them, and be disposed to cast them into destruction in hell. No; God does not take his grace away from us excepting when we consciously and deliberately despise him and turn our backs upon him; and when, by some venial fault, we slightly offend him, he is certainly displeased by it, but does not therefore deprive us of the love which he bears towards us; whence, by an act of contrition or of love, he is at once appeased. His infinite majesty may justly claim all reverence and self-abasement from us; but he is better pleased that the souls which love him should treat him with loving confidence rather than with timid servility. So do not treat God as a tyrant any more. Recall to your mind the graces which he has bestowed upon you, even after the offences and acts of ingratitude which you have committed against him; recollect the loving treatment which he has dealt out towards you, in order to extricate you from the disorders of your past life, and the extraordinary lights which he has given you, by means of which he has so often called you to his holy love; and so treat him from this day forth with great confidence and affection, as being your dearest object. Now, to proceed to another point.

15. It were unnecessary for me here to recommend to you the frequentation of the Sacraments, frequenting them as you do already. Go to confession no less frequently than twice, or at least once, during the week; and with regard to Communion, act in obedience to your director; but even when you feel to be in a state of aridity, do not neglect to ask for it, since it is a rule with directors to allow Communion more or less frequently according to the desire which they perceive in the penitent. When your director sees that you do not ask him for it, nor show a desire for it, he will hardly of his own accord prescribe it; and when you do not make an actual Communion, at least make a spiritual one, which you are able to do, and make it frequently in the course of the day.

16. Moreover, let the dearest objects of your affection be these two great mysteries, the Sacrament of the Altar and the Passion of Jesus Christ. If the love of all hearts were to gather itself together into one heart only, this would certainly not be able to correspond, even in the smallest measure, to the love which Jesus Christ has shown us in these two mysteries of the Passion and the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar.

17. Finally, if you love Jesus Christ, do not fail to recommend him every day unfortunate sinners. St. Teresa and St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi always prayed for sinners. If we know how much God is offended by infidels, heretics, and so many others, and we neglect to pray to the Lord for their conversion, this would be a sign that our love for God is very feeble.

V. EXAMPLE: ST. LIDWINE

Let it, then, be your endeavour, during the remainder of your life, to love and have confidence in him; and do not become sad when you find yourself in afflictions and tribulations; for this is a sign, not of his hatred, but of the love which God bears towards you. And therefore, in reference to this point, and as a conclusion to this little treatise, I will here cite for you the example of the virgin St. Lidwine; and I know not whether there is to be met with among the annals of the saints an instance of any other soul suffering so great affliction and desolation as did this holy virgin.

She was born of poor parents, in a town of Holland called Schiedam. One day, while she was yet a little girl, in walking on the ice, she fell and broke a rib; and as, in consequence of their poverty, it was not afterwards cured, there was formed upon the broken rib an abscess, which broke of itself, and infected her whole body, so that it became paralyzed. Her parents left her to herself, without taking any care of her, while-she continued full of pain, with all the limbs of her body, excepting only her head and left arm, contracted. Her right arm was, consequently, utterly useless; and at the same time she was seized with St. Anthony's fire to such a degree that her very bones were gradually eaten away; and during all this she did not venture even to speak of the evils from which she was suffering, lest her parents might do something to increase them. She suffered continual and excruciating pains in her head. On her forehead she had a large sore; and in her chin there was a wound extending to the mouth, full of congealed blood, which prevented her from speaking and eating. One of her eyes had retreated inwards and become useless; the other was so full of bad humours that she could not bear the light of the sun, and scarcely even that of a lamp. She suffered so much from toothache that the pain brought her down even to death's door. She had a continual flow of blood from the mouth, nostrils, eyes, or ears. In her throat she had a tumour, which prevented her even from breathing freely; she had to bear the torment of a perpetual fever; she suffered continually from vomiting, throwing up a great quantity of bloody water after taking even the smallest amount of food. She was at one and the same time dropsical, feverish, and consumptive, destitute of everything; and she received assistance from no one. There might sometimes be one who, out of compassion, would hand her some medicine; but that only made her sufferings two fold; and she would take it with all the obedience of a lamb, never making complaints about it. Her parents, being poor, and wearied out by her calamities, which were so great, used to grumble at her, saying that she was born only to be a torment to them, and to consume whatever little supplies their home might furnish; so that it would be better if death were to take her. She used to weep, not for her own afflictions, but for the inconvenience which she caused to others.

Being unable to move, she was obliged constantly to lie upon her back, which was all in such a state of putrefaction that the skin stuck to the bed, that is to say, to that poor straw on which she lay abandoned; so that whenever any one, out of compassion, raised her up, her skin would remain adhering to the straw; and her body became, as it were, excoriated. In short, the appearance of that poor maiden of fifteen years of age upon her bed was the same as that of a corpse lying all but breathless upon a bier; and such was the state in which this holy virgin lived for thirty-eight years. It is also related that four soldiers entered her room one day; and, after using much abusive language to her, calling her a hypocrite and a witch, the truth about whom would in due time be discovered, they took away from her the poor blanket which covered her half-dead body. Before taking their departure, too, they beat her, and even wounded her with their swords. There was added to all these external evils an interior desolation, an affliction from which she suffered for years; since God, for her greater purification, withdrew from her (as is his wont in the case of those souls which are most precious in his sight) his sensible assistance, so that she found herself bereft of her usual loving confidence in God; and then the devil tormented her fiercely, suggesting to her that such great evils as those by which she was oppressed were a sure sign that the Lord had abandoned her, and that she would die in a state of despair.

Nevertheless, assailed although she was by so much sickness and by such interior tribulations, she suffered it all with resignation, blessing God for dealing with her so; and in order to appease him, she girt herself with a cincture of horse-hair, which penetrated into her sores.

Such was the state of desolation in which the saint lived for four years; but all her sufferings she bore with resignation to the divine will, ever blessing God for treating her in this manner. All that she had to undergo she united to the Passion of Jesus Christ; and this was the way in which, throughout the whole of that time, she sustained that fearful storm. But then God began to give her great consolation; and however great might be the sufferings which she might experience after wards, she would nevertheless say: "When I see my Jesus Christ hanging upon the cross, I feel my pains no longer. My sufferings urge me to cry out; but my heart urges me to say, Jesus, my love, increase my pains, but increase my love." To others, when condoling with her, she would say: "All the evil from which I am suffering is a mere nothing, being, as I am, in the hands of a goodness which is infinite, such as my God is, whose bowels of compassion exceed those of one's father or mother." Take courage, I pray you, from all that you have now heard, and bear your aridity with fortitude; and when you feel more than usually oppressed, offer up the following prayer:

PRAYER FOR A LOVING SOUL WHEN IN DESOLATION

O my crucified Jesus! Thou dost already know that, out of love for Thee, I have left all; but after that Thou hast caused me to leave my all. I find that Thou Thyself hast left me too. But what am I saying, O my Love? Have pity upon me; it is not I who speak; it is my weakness that makes me speak thus. For myself, I deserve every kind of suffering, for such great sins as mine have been. Thou hast left me, as I have deserved, and hast withdrawn from me that loving assistance of Thine where with Thou hast so often consoled me; notwithstanding, however disconsolate and abandoned I may be by Thee, I protest that it is my will ever to love Thee and to bless Thee. Provided that Thou dost not deprive me of the grace of being able to love Thee, deal with me as Thou pleasest. I will say to Thee, in the words of that beloved servant of Thine:

I love Thee, though I seem
An enemy in Thy sight:
Repel me as Thou wilt,
I will ever follow Thee."

Lord, take not Thyself from me, and then take from me all besides, as may seem good in Thy sight. "Draw me after Thee." My Love, draw me after Thee, and then it matters not though Thou take from me the consolation of being conscious of it; but let it be forcibly that Thou drawest me, dragging me out of the mire of my sins. Help Thy servants, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious Blood. I wis h to be all Thine own, cost me what it may; I wish to love Thee with all my strength; but what can I do myself? Thy blood is my hope. O Mary, Mother of God, my refuge! neglect not to pray for me in all my tribulations. First of all in the blood of Jesus Christ, and then in Thy prayers, do I trust for my eternal salvation. "In thee, O Lady, have I hoped, I will say to thee with St. Bonaventure, "I shall not be confounded forever." Obtain for me the grace ever to love my God in this life and in eternity, and I ask for nothing more.

HYMN. THE LOVING SOUL IN DESOLATION

Alas! forsaken and alone
Myself I ever see,
And in my bitter agony
No one can comfort me.
Death, death itself with cruel spite
Torments, but does not kill;

O dark and solitary grove,
Whose sombre shades impart
A gloom that makes thee well accord
With my sad lonely heart;
Come, bear me friendly company,
Compassionate my woe,

And suffer thus without restraint
My sobs and tears to flow.
I weep, and ever still must weep,
Nought can my tears restrain,
Until my God, my best beloved,
At length I find again.
Ah! where art Thou, my only good?
Ah! whither hast Thou gone?
Far, far away, thus leaving me
Disconsolate, alone.
Where is that happy time, O God,
That time of joy and grace,
When the loved Spouse consoled my heart
With his sweet heavenly face;
When, in that sweetest sleep of soul,
He aimed the flaming dart,
Inflicting first a wound of love,
Then ravishing my heart;
When, all inflamed with love divine,
My sighs were breaths of fire;
And while I loved, still more and more
To love was my desire.
Alas! how soon the cruel storm
Succeeds that calm so dear!
The very light of heaven above
Now fills my soul with fear.
Horrors I see and feel around,
Where'er I look or go;
And everything inspires with dread,
And adds fresh pain and woe.

The gates are shut, I cannot flee,

I live a captive still.
I fain would flee, but where to find
A hand to set me free,
If He whose life alone can give
Flies far away from me?
O my Beloved! help Thou me;
If Thou hast gone, return;
See how I sigh disconsolate,
And for Thy presence yearn.
Ah! be at length appeased with me,
My Life! return again;
And since 'tis Thou hast pierced me thus,
Heal Thou my hidden pain.
Good cause hast Thou, dear Lord, I own,
Forever to depart;
Yet see, ah! see, Thy chains remain
Entwined around my heart.
And should there be, alas! no hope
Of pardon yet for me,
Still know, dear Jesus, I am Thine,
And Thine will ever be.
I love Thee, though I seem to be
But hateful in Thy sight;
And I will ever follow Thee
Where'er Thou turn Thy flight.

VII. SURE SIGNS BY WHICH WE MAY KNOW WHETHER WE HAVE THE DIVINE LOVE IN US

Divine love is compared in the Scriptures to fire. Our Lord, in declaring to us in the Gospel that he had come on earth to bring down the divine love, expresses himself by saying that he had come on earth to bring fire: I am come to cast fire on the earth.[2094] And God himself, in the Apocalypse, counsels a soul to provide itself with burnt gold: I counsel thee, O soul, to buy of Me gold fire-tried;[2095] that is, divine love. Now, fire has these two properties, it resists what is contrary to itself I mean to say, that instead of being put out by winds and gusts, it is thereby augmented and it is operative; if it is fire it will act. Here are therefore, two sure signs by which we may find out if we have ourselves the holy love of God works and patience. Do we always work for our God, at least by means of a pure right intention of doing his divine will in all things, of finding his divine good pleasure in all things? Do we voluntarily suffer for his sake everything that is against our inclination, poverty, tribulations, sickness, and everything else? And instead of such things making us go far from him, do they bring us nearer to him? If they do, then we have the holy love of God.

Our love is a fire which acts, which opposes what is contrary to itself, otherwise we have it not; our love towards God will be not true, but false; it will be a love of the lips, but not of the heart. St. John also warns us against this: My little children (see how he makes use of the very expressions of love), let us not love in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth.[2096] St. Gregory says, "If there is no work, there is no love."[2097] And Jesus Christ: He that hath My commandments and keepeth them (he who keeps my commandments and observes them faithfully), he it is that loveth Me.[2098] And St. Augustine adds, "The bitterest and most disagreeable things are rendered comparatively easy, and almost of no account, by love." [2099] So that if we always act in the manner laid down above, that is, for our God, if we keep his divine commandments, if we observe them faithfully (and with the divine commandments come also those of the holy Church, the obligations of our state, and each one's own duty), if we overcome with generosity and even with cheerfulness, for our God, everything that is contrary to our nature, though it be most distasteful to us, we have in us the holy love of God. Our love is then a fire which acts, which resists what is contrary to itself; otherwise we have it not: our love towards God will certainly not be true, but false; it will be a love of the lips, not a love of the heart: "My little children, let us not love in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth,"[2100] Let us give some more practical example.

Suppose you have an opportunity of making such and such profit, but it is dishonest to do so; or an opportunity occurs for you to indulge yourself in some pleasure, but that pleasure is unlawful; the duties of your state trouble you, or the labours of your employment weary you; and for the sake of your God you do not care to make that profit, you renounce that pleasure, do your duty, and continue your work, then you have the holy love of God, your love is a fire which operates; otherwise you have it not, your love towards God will not be true love, but false; it will be a love of the lips, and not a love of the heart: "My little children, let us not love in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth."

Further, suppose some tribulation comes upon you suddenly, that an action is brought against you unexpectedly, on which all you have depends, that you suddenly lose some person in whom were all your hopes, and who was your whole support. Do you with promptness offer it all to our Lord; do you even bear all with joy? If so, you have the holy love of God. Your love is a fire which resists what is contrary to itself; otherwise you have it not: your love will not be true, it will be false a love of the lips, not a love of the heart: "My little children, let us not love in word, nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth." But it is a still surer sign of love to suffer than to act; because in acting, a person employs himself in favour of the person beloved, and so far gives a sign of love; but in suffering, a person has no care for himself, and thinks of nothing but the person beloved, and therefore gives a sign of greater love.

And by this mark God was pleased singularly to try the great love of holy Job towards him. The holy man Job was certainly a great lover of God; but when did he show himself most truly to be so? Was it when he was surrounded by a numerous family? When he was in the enjoyment of an abundance of earthly goods? When he was in perfect health? Yes, even then; for even then he acknowledged that all came from God; he thanked him for all these things, offered sacrifices, and fulfilled his duty; giving good advice to his sons, and by continually praying for them, that they might never sin and offend their Lord: Lest, perhaps, my sons have sinned.[2101] But his love of God showed itself really great, when God, on purpose to try his great love for him, despoiled him of all his possessions at once; caused all his sons to die at the same time; deprived him entirely, in one moment, of his health; so that he was reduced to such a state, that, covered with ulcers from head to foot, he sat on a dunghill, and scraped with a potsherd the corrupt matter from all his members; with all these horrible misfortunes, and in the midst of all these unheard-of afflictions, he did nothing but repeat continually, with invincible and more than wonderful patience, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; as it hath pleased the Lord, so be it done; blessed be the name of the Lord.[2102] But why speak of the holy Job? Jesus Christ himself said to his apostles, as he was going to his Passion, That the world may know that I love the Father, etc. . . . Arise, let us go hence.[2103] Here, then, we have the surest and most incontestable proof of the true love of God patience, patience; the voluntary suffering of anything for him. The sayings and doings of the saints on this matter are also known to all. St. Teresa said, "either to suffer or to die;" St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, "to suffer, and not to die;" St. John of the Cross, "to suffer, and be silent."

The holy martyrs invited their executioners to torment them, and the wild beasts to devour them, St. Lidwine willingly suffered a painful illness for thirty-three years. St. Frances of Rome willingly suffered the unjust banishment of her husband, and the confiscation of all their property; and St. John of the Cross already named willingly endured a cruel imprisonment for nine months, with numberless other inconveniences and hardships. See, see, the surest and most incontestable mark of the true love of God, patience, patience; suffering, willingly suffering everything for him. And oh, happy and blessed is he who by these two sure marks of works and patience, of acting and suffering for our great God, discovers in himself the holy love of God! All the gold in the world, when compared with the smallest degree of the holy love of God, is nothing but a handful of sand: All gold in comparison of her is as a little sand.[2104] All the riches even of the world, compared with the least degree of the holy love of God, are as nought, as the Wise Man says in the Scripture: I esteemed riches nothing, in comparison of her.[2105] But why talk about all the gold or all the riches of the world, while all the greatest of the supernatural gifts are worth nothing without the holy love of God?

This is the language of the holy Apostle Paul, who possessed the holy love of God in such abundance, and who therefore so well knew its value. If, said he, I had the gift of all tongues, and could speak not only in all the languages of men, but also in that wonderful language with which the angels speak to one another: If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels; and had not the holy love of God, and have not charity, I should be no better than a cymbal that was out of tune: I am become as sounding brass or as a tinkling cymbal.[2106] If I had the highest gift of prophecy, so that I could penetrate the depths of the most abstruse mysteries, "And if I should have prophecy, and should know all mysteries;" if I had the gift of all sciences, and such a great faith that I could remove mountains, from one place to another; "if I should have all knowledge, and all faith, so that I could remove mountains," and had not the holy love of God: "And have not charity;" I am good for nothing: I "am nothing." This beautiful virtue of charity, or holy love of God, is the queen of all the other virtues, and reigns, and will reign, for all eternity. After death faith will have its reward, because it will see that in which it has believed; but the virtue of faith will have no place in Paradise. After death hope will have its reward, because it will possess that which it hoped in; but there will be no virtue of hope in heaven. After death, charity or love towards God will have its reward, and will reign eternally, because with infinite beatitude it will continue to love throughout all eternity that same God whom it loved here on earth.

Therefore, oh, how happy, oh, how blessed is he who, by these two most certain marks of works and patience, voluntarily acting and suffering for his God, is able to recognize in himself the holy and true love of God! Let us, then, all love our God, and let us all love him in the manner and according to the rule here given. In all our works let us have God before our eyes, in everything fulfilling always his divine will, his divine good pleasure; and let us bear not only patiently but also joyfully all that is contrary to our self-love and to our human sensibilities. It is for this one only end, that of loving our God, that we have been created and put into this world by him. To the accomplishment of this one only end let us turn all our care, all our solicitude. On his love alone let us set any value, let us often ask him to give us his holy love alone: "Thy holy love alone" (let all and each of us say constantly); "give us Thy holy love alone, O Lord, together with Thy holy grace, and I am rich enough; nor will I ask anything else of Thee;" as that great saint who was so filled with the love of God, the great St. Ignatius, continually prayed.

A Short Act of Perfect Love towards God, to be repeated very often.

My God, I love Thee above all things, and in all things, with my whole soul, because Thou art worthy of all love!

HYMN. THE SOUL INTRODUCED INTO THE WINE-CELLAR, AND ALREADY INEBRIATED WITH DIVINE LOVE

"He brought me into the cellar of wine, he set in order charity in me." Cant. ii. 4

Oh! where am I? What cell is this
In which I breathe an air of bliss
So heavenly that I burn and pine,
Consumed with flames of love divine?
Who led me to this garden fair,
So rich with flowers of beauty rare,
Whose thousand-scented breaths impart
A perfume sweet which fills the heart?
A sleep unearthly calms my heart;
Vain creatures, wake me not, depart!
Ah! leave me, leave me, I entreat,
To sleep yet on, in peace so sweet.
A love all-pure embraces me,
And sets my soul's affections free
From earthly things; my heart, so blest,.
Now finds in God alone its rest.
I burn, and yet no fire is near;
A captive, yet no chains are here;
No dart, yet I am pierced through;
Tis past belief, and still tis true.
A thousand chains my soul have bound,
A thousand darts my heart have found;
A thousand wounds of love it feels;
The Archer still himself conceals.
Sweet flames of love consume me now,
They death inflict, yet love bestow;
Dying, I live, yet would I not
For lives a thousand change my lot.
Silence and solitude I seek,
And yet of love would ever speak;
I would repose, yet soar above,
And draw with me all hearts to love.
When most alone, 'tis then I see
My best companion is with me;
And to my Love I most am bound
When most detached from all around.
I seek abasement, yet I reign!
Though leaving all, my All I gain;
I shun all pleasures, yet I find
A joy beyond all joys combined.

I burn, and evermore would burn;
I yearn for God, and still would yearn;
I wish to live, I long to die,
I know not well for what I sigh!
I seek in vain I know not what;
I love, yet comprehend it not;
Scarce only in my love, I seem
To know I love the Good Supreme.

Come, ye enamoured souls, and say
What comfort can your pain allay,
When sick with love, you feel the smart
Of those sweet flames that burn the heart.
But no one hears, not one replies;
And Thou, my Love, these burning sighs,
These bitter tears which Thou dost see,
But make Thee yet more deaf to me.
Come, Love! for I am now Thy prey;
Who art Thou? and what will Thou? say!
Let me but see Thy beauty nigh,
Then, if Thou wilt, then let me die.
Ah! let me speak, great God above!
Thou knowest all, save how to love;
For Thou art pitiless to me,
A heart that loves and pleases Thee.
If, then, so great Thy love has been,
Why pierce my heart with dart so keen,
And leave me thus in bitter pain,
Apart from Thee to pine in vain?
Ah! cruel, cruel One! but no,
Beloved! yes, I call Thee so;
Thou know'st my one, one only thought
Is but to please Thee as I ought.
'Tis love thus leads my tongue astray;
Senseless, I know not what I say:
That piercing dart of charity
Makes me thus mad through love of Thee.
Dear object of my love alone,
Thou one, one only love I own;
My God! my All! O Loveliness!
My Good, my Life, my Happiness!
My Treasure! ah! what can I do,
Thy sweet and noble heart to woo?
Oh, speak, and tell me how I may Thy love with my poor love repay.
'Twere little in love's fiercest fire
For Thee to languish of desire;
Nor pain nor death could pay the debt;
To be consumed were little yet.
And now, since words can say no more,
Accept, Beloved, I implore,
This unreserved gift from me,
All, all I am I give to Thee.

VIII. RULE OF LIFE. (ABRIDGED[2107])

I. On rising in the morning make the following acts:

1. "O my God! I adore Thee. I love Thee with my whole heart, and thank Thee for all Thy benefits, particularly for having preserved me this night."

2. "I offer to Thee all that I shall do or suffer throughout the day, in union with the actions and sufferings of Jesus and Mary, intending to gain all the indulgences in my power."

3. "I purpose, O Lord! to avoid this day every offence against Thee; but do Thou extend Thy protecting hand over me, that I may not betray Thee. Most Holy Mary, take me under thy protection. My angel guardian and patron saints, assist me."

Then say one Our Father, one Hail Mary, and the Creed; with the Hail Mary three times in honour of the purity of the Blessed Virgin.

II. Take care to make half an hour's meditation as soon as possible in the day. For though meditation is not absolutely necessary, it is morally necessary, in order to obtain the grace of perseverance. Those who neglect it will find it very difficult to persevere in the grace of God. The reasons for this are twofold: the first is, because the eternal truths cannot be seen by the eyes of the flesh, but by the eye of the understanding, which is reflection. Hence he does not perceive them who does not meditate; and for want of perceiving them he will hardly arrive at a due appreciation of the importance of salvation, of the means which secure it, and of the obstacles which hinder it; so that his salvation will be placed in imminent risk. The second reason is, because the soul that does not practise meditation will also be backward to practise prayer. Now, prayer is necessary, not merely as a precept, but as a means to observe the commandments, since, as a general rule, and speaking of adults, God only gives his grace to those who ask for it. But without meditation a person has a very faint notion of his own spiritual wants, and he is moreover but slightly impressed with the necessity of praying, in order to overcome temptations and to save his soul: thus he is led to pray but little or nothing, and for want of prayer is eventually lost. The eminent Bishop Palafox said, "How will the Lord give us perseverance, unless we ask him for it? And how shall we ask him for it without prayer?" On the other hand, St. Teresa declares that it is hardly possible for a man that prays to remain long in sin; he will either forsake prayer or forsake sin: prayer and sin are incompatible.

With regard to practice, meditation has three parts: preparation, consideration, and conclusion. In the preparation must be made three acts: 1, Of the presence of God; 2, Of humility; 3, Of petition for light. We say, 1, "My God, I believe Thou art here present, and I adore Thee;" 2, "I deserve at this moment to be burning in hell. O my God, I am sorry for having offended Thee!" 3, "Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus and Mary, grant me light in this meditation, that I may profit by it." Then say a Hail Mary to the divine Mother, and a Glory be to the Father, etc., in honour of our angel guardian. Then read the point of meditation, and be sure to meditate, at least occasionally, on the Passion of Jesus Christ. It must also be understood that the fruit of prayer does not so much consist in meditating, but rather 1, In producing affections for instance, of humility, confidence, love, sorrow, offering, resignation, and the like; 2, In making petitions, and especially imploring God to grant us perseverance and his holy love; 3, In making the resolution to avoid some particular sin, and of practising some particular virtue.

Finally, the conclusion is made thus: 1"I thank Thee, O God, for the lights thou hast given me;" 2, "I purpose to keep the resolutions I have made;" 3, "and I beg Thy grace to fulfil them." Nor must we ever forget to recommend to God the holy souls in purgatory, and all poor sinners. We must never omit our accustomed meditation, whatever coldness and weariness we may feel over it; for St. Teresa says, "To do so would be to cast ourselves into hell with our own hands." Moreover, let all bear in mind that Benedict XIV. granted a plenary indulgence to every one who makes a meditation of half an hour, or at least a quarter of an hour, every day for a month, with confession, Communion, and prayers to the intention of the Church, and partial indulgences are also granted every day to those who meditate. This indulgence is applicable to the souls in purgatory.

III. Do not omit to hear Mass daily. But what is of the greatest importance is that those who hear Mass should make a special application to their own souls of the merits of the Passion of Jesus Christ. Mass should be heard for the same ends for which it was instituted; namely, 1, To honour Almighty God; 2, To thank him for his benefits; 3, To make atonement for the punishment due to our sins; 4, To obtain divine grace. So that we ought then to pray as follows: "Eternal Father, in this Mass I offer Thee Jesus Christ, with all the merits of his Passion: 1, To honour Thy Majesty; 2, To thank Thee for all Thy benefits towards me; 3, In satisfaction for my sins, and for those of all the living, and of those who died in Thy grace; 4, To obtain all the graces necessary for salvation." At the elevation of the Host, we may say, "By the blood of Jesus Christ, grant me to love Thee in this life and in the next." When the priest communicates, make the spiritual Communion thus: "My Jesus, I love Thee, and I long for Thee in my soul; I embrace Thee, and wish nevermore to be separated from Thee."IV. In addition to this, read some spiritual book for half an hour, or at least a quarter; and it will be best to make use of the lives of the saints.

Moreover, do not fail to pay every day a visit to the Most Holy Sacrament, when you should make at least the following acts: 1, "O Lord, I thank Thee for Thy love in leaving Thyself to me in this holy Sacrament;" 2, "With my whole heart I love Thee, O God! above all other good; and because I love Thee I am sorry for all my offences against Thee, whether great or small;" 3, "I beseech Thee to grant me perseverance in Thy grace and Thy holy love." At the same time make a visit to our Blessed Lady, before one of her images, and beg of her also the same graces of perseverance and the love of God.

VII. VI. In the evening make the examination of conscience, and then add the Christian acts.Frequent the holy sacraments of confession and Communion at least once a week, and oftener if possible.

With regard to confession, say beforehand: "I thank Thee O my God! for having waited for me until now! I hope, through the merits of Jesus Christ, for the pardon of all my offences against Thee! I am sorry for them, and repent of them with my whole heart, because by them I have lost heaven and have deserved hell; but, above all, I am grieved to my inmost soul, and hate and detest my sins more than all evils, because they have offended Thy infinite goodness. I purpose in future rather to die than offend Thee any more." After confession, thank Almighty God for the pardon which you hope to have received, and renew your good resolution never more to offend him, and to avoid all occasions of sin; and pray to Jesus and Mary for perseverance.

VIII. As to the Holy Communion, we must know that it is the grand medicine, as the Council of Trent terms it, which purifies us from our daily venial faults, and preserves us from mortal ones. He who communicates most frequently will be freest from sin, and will make farthest progress in divine love; only let him communicate with a good desire. But, in order to derive more abundant fruits from Communion, he should manage to spend half an hour after receiving in producing devout acts, or at least in praying out of some spiritual book; however, let no one make this more frequent Communion without the counsel of his spiritual director, and on this account.It is well to make choice of a good confessor, and to follow his direction in all spiritual matters, and even in temporal matters of importance; nor should he be left without a good reason. St. Philip Neri spoke thus: "Let those who are desirous of advancing in the way of God put themselves under an enlightened confessor; and let them obey him, as occupying the place of God. Whoever does this may feel assured that he will never have to render an account to God of what he does." And this is only conformable to the words of Jesus Christ, that whosoever hears his ministers hears himself: He that heareth you heareth Me.[2108] A general confession should be made, if it has not hitherto been made, for it is a most excellent means of, bringing one's life into good order; and it is advisable to make it to the director himself, that he may be the better able to guide us.

IX. Avoid idleness, dissipated companions, immodest conversations, and, more than all, evil occasions, especially where there is danger of incontinency; and for this reason one cannot be too cautious in keeping one's eyes from dwelling on any dangerous objects. For a person that does not avoid the voluntary occasions of sin, especially those which have frequently proved fatal to his innocence, it is morally impossible to persevere in the grace of God: He that loves the danger shall perish in it.[2109]

X. In temptations trust not to yourself, nor to all the good resolutions and promises which you have made, but rely solely on the divine assistance; and for this reason have immediate recourse to God and the Blessed Virgin. Especially in temptations against purity, the greatest care must be taken not to remain to dispute with the temptation. In such moments some are accustomed to set their will to make acts of the contrary virtue; but they run considerable risk.

The best plan to adopt on these occasions is to renew the firm purpose rather to die than to offend God, and forthwith to make the sign of the cross without remonstrance, and to call on God and the divine Mother, making frequent invocations of the most holy names of Jesus and Mary, which have a wonderful efficacy against filthy suggestions, and should therefore be invoked continually till the temptations are over. Of ourselves we have not strength to overcome the attacks of the flesh, our most cruel enemy; but God readily supplies the strength to all who ask him; but he that fails to do so, almost invariably falls a prey to the enemy. The same is to be observed in combating temptations against faith, protesting at such times, without remaining in dispute, that we are ready to die for the holy faith; and instead of then eliciting acts of faith, it is better to elicit other acts, as of love, contrition, and hope.

XI. If you commit a venial fault, make an act of the love of God and of contrition, purpose of amendment, and forthwith resume your wonted, tranquillity. To remain troubled after a fault is the greatest fault that a person can commit, for a troubled soul is incapable of doing the least good. If, by mischance, the fault has been grievous, then immediately make an act of contrition (which is sufficient to recover the divine grace), resolve never to be guilty of the same again, and take the first opportunity of going to confession.

XII. Endeavour to hear all the sermons in your power. And it would be most advisable to make a spiritual retreat once a year in some religious house; or if that be impracticable, at least in your own house, by applying yourself for eight days to prayer and spiritual reading. During this time all company and conversation on secular matters should be avoided. In like manner make a retreat of one day every month, with confession and Communion. If your state of life allow it, become a member of some confraternity in which the Sacraments are frequented, and there make your eternal salvation the grand and sole aim. Whoever enters a confraternity for the sake of managing, directing, or out of party spirit, will derive more harm than good from it. If a person would really profit by it, he must enter it solely with a view to his spiritual interests.

XIII. In all the vicissitudes of life, such as illnesses, losses, and persecutions, be ever mindful to bow with resignation to the will of God, and repose on these words: "God wills it so, and so I will it likewise." Or thus: "God will have it so; so be it done." He that behaves in this manner stores up immense rewards for heaven, and always lives in peace. On the contrary, he that refuses to bow to the will of God only redoubles his afflictions; for he must endure them whether he will or not; and, more over, by his impatience he lays up for himself an additional punishment.

XIV. Be especially careful to preserve a tender and marked devotion to most holy Mary, by performing daily in her honour some exercise of piety. Never omit the first thing in the morning and the last at night to say three times the Hail Mary in honour of her purity, imploring her to keep you from all sin. Read every day something, be it only a few lines, on the Blessed Virgin. Say her Litanies, and the Rosary, meditating on the mysteries. When you leave or enter the house, ask her blessing with a Hail Mary; and on passing by any of her images, salute her in the same way. When the clock strikes, say the Hail Mary; and then, "Jesus and Mary, I love you! Do not permit me to offend you." With the advice of your confessor, fast on Saturdays, on the vigils of the seven festivals of our Blessed Lady, and make the novenas for the said feasts, as also for Christmas, Pentecost, and for the feast of your patron saint.

PRAYER TO JESUS CHRIST, TO OBTAIN HIS HOLY LOVE

My crucified Love, my dear Jesus! I believe in Thee, and confess Thee to be the true Son of God and my Saviour. I adore Thee from the abyss of my own nothingness, and I thank Thee for the death Thou didst suffer for me, that I might obtain the life of divine grace. My beloved Redeemer, to Thee I owe all my salvation. Through Thee I have hitherto escaped hell; through Thee have I received the pardon of my sins. But I am so ungrateful, that, instead of loving Thee, I have repeated my offences against Thee. I deserve to be condemned, so as not to be able to love Thee any more: but no, my Jesus, punish me in any other way, but not in this. If I have not loved Thee in time past, I love Thee now; and I desire nothing but to love Thee with all my heart. But without Thy help I can do nothing. Since Thou dost command me to love Thee, give me also the strength to fulfil this Thy sweet and loving precept. Thou hast promised to grant all that we ask of Thee: You shall ask whatever you will and it shall be done unto you. Confiding, then, in this promise, my dear Jesus, I ask, first of all, pardon of all my sins; and I repent, above all things, because I have offended Thee, O Infinite Goodness! I ask for holy perseverance in Thy grace till my death. But, above all, I ask for the gift of Thy holy love. Ah, my Jesus, my Hope, my Love, my All, inflame me with that love which Thou didst come on earth to enkindle! "Tui amoris me ignem accende." For this end, make me always live in conformity with Thy holy will. Enlighten me, that I may understand more and more how worthy Thou art of our love, and that I may know the immense love Thou hast borne me, especially in giving Thy life for me. Grant, then, that I may love Thee with all my heart, and may love Thee always, and never cease to beg of Thee the grace to love Thee in this life; that, living always and dying in Thy love, I may come one day to love Thee with all my strength in heaven, never to leave off loving Thee for all eternity. O Mother of beautiful love, my advocate and refuge, Mary, who art of all creatures the most beautiful, the most loving, and the most beloved of God, and whose only desire it is to see him loved! ah, by the love thou bearest to Jesus Christ, pray for me, and obtain for me the grace to love him always, and with all my heart! This I ask and hope for from thee. Amen.

FINIS

DIES IRA:, DIES ILLA,

Solvet sa:clum in favilla:
Teste David cum Sybilla.
Quantus tremor est futurus,
Quando Judex est venturus,
The day of wrath, that dreadful day,
Shall the whole world in ashes lay,
As David and the Sybil say.
What horror must invade the mind
When the approaching Judge shall find,
Few venial faults in all mankind!
Cuncta stricte discussurus!
Tuba mirum spargens sonum
Per sepulchra regionum,
Coget omnes ante thronum.
Mors stupebit, et natura,
Cum resurget creatura,
Judicanti responsura.
Liber scriptus proferetur,
In quo totum continetur,
Unde mundus judicetur.
Judex ergo cum sedebit,
Quidquid latet, apparebit:
Nil inultum remanebit.
Quid sum, miser! tunc dicturus,
Quem patronum rogaturus.
Cum vix Justus sit securus?
Rex tremenda: majestatis!
Qui salvandos salvas gratis
Salva me, fons pietatis.
Recordare, Jesu pie,

Quod sum causa tua: via:,
Ne me perdas illa die.
Qua:rens me, sedisti lassus:
Redemisti, crucem passus:
Tantus labor non sit cassus.
Juste Judex ultionis,
Donum fac remissionis,
Ante diem rationis.
Ingemisco tanquam reus,
Culpa rubet vultus meus
Supplicanti parce, Deus.
Qui Mariam absolvisti,
Et latronem exaudisti,
Mihi quoque spem dedisti.
Preces mea: non sunt digna:,
Sed tu bonus fac benigne,
Ne perenni cremer igne.
Inter oves locum pra:sta,
Et ab ha:dis me sequestra,
Statuens in parte dextra.
Confutatis maledictis,
Flammis acribus addictis,
Voca me cum benedictis.
Oro supplex et acclinis,
Cor contritum quasi cinis,
Gere curam mei finis.
Lacrymosa dies illa,
Qua resurget ex favilla
Judicandus homo reus.
Huic ergo parce Deus:
Pie Jesu Domine, dona eis requiem. Amen.
The last loud trumpet's wondrous sound
Shall through the rending tombs rebound,
And wake the nations under ground.
Nature and death shall with surprise
Behold the trembling sinner rise,
To view his Judge with conscious eyes.
Then shall with universal fear,
The seven-seal'd judgment book appear,
To scan the whole of life' s career.
The Judge ascends His awful throne,
Each secret sin shall here be known.
All must with shame confess their own.
Ah, wretched! what shall I then say,
What patron find, my fears t'allay,
When even the just shall dread that day?
Thou mighty, formidable King!
Of mercy unexhausted spring!
Save me! save! and comfort bring.
Remember what my ransom cost;
Let not my dear-bought soul be lost,
In storms of guilty terrors tos't.
In search of me why feel such pain;
Why on Thy cross such pangs sustain,
If now those sufferings must be vain?
Avenging Judge, Whom all obey,
Cancel my debt, too great to pay,
Before the sad accounting day.
O'erwhelmed, oppressed with doubts and fears,
Their load my soul in anguish bears?;
I sigh, I weep—accept my tears.
Thou, Who wast moved at Mary's grief,
Who didst absolve the dying thief,
Dost bid me hope, O grant relief.
Reject not my unworthy prayer,

Preserve me from the dangerous snare,
Which death and gaping hell prepare.
Give my immortal soul a place
Among Thy chosen right-hand race,
The sons of God, and heirs of grace.
From that insatiate abyss,
Where flames devour and serpents hiss,
Deliver me, and raise to bliss.
Prostrate my contrite heart I rend,
My God, my Father and my Friend!
Do not forsake me in the end.
Well may they curse their second birth,
Who rise to a surviving death.
Thou great Creator of mankind,
Let all Thy faithful mercy find. Amen.

DEDICATION TO JESUS AND MARY

O INCARNATE WORD, Thou hast given Thy Blood and Thy Life to confer on our prayers that power by which, according to Thy promise, they obtain for us all that we ask. And we, O God, are so careless of our salvation, that we will not even ask Thee for the graces that we must have if we should be saved! In prayer Thou hast given us the key of all Thy divine treasures; and we, rather than pray, choose to remain in our misery. Alas! O Lord, enlighten us, and make us know the value of prayers, offered in Thy name and by Thy merits, in the eyes of Thy Eternal Father. I consecrate to Thee this my book; bless it, and grant that all those into whose hands it falls may have the will to pray always, and may exert themselves to stir up others also to avail themselves of this great means of salvation.

To thee also do I recommend my little work, O Mary, great Mother of God: patronize it, and obtain for all who read it the spirit of prayer, and of continual recourse in all their necessities to thy Son, and to thee, who art the Dispenser of graces, the Mother of mercy, and who never leavest unsatisfied him who recommends himself to thee, O mighty Virgin, but obtainest from God for thy servants whatever thou askest.

THIS book, which was published in 1759, is one of the most important works of Saint Alphonsus. He himself explains, in the Introduction and the Conclusion, what it has cost him, and the value that he sets upon it. In his preface to the "Preparation for Death," he speaks thus: "This book, though small, has cost me a great deal of labor. I regard it as of extreme utility to all sorts of persons; and I unhesitatingly assert that among all spiritual treatises, there is none, and there can be none, more necessary than that which treats on prayer as a means of obtaining eternal salvation."—ED.

INTRODUCTION

NECESSARY TO BE READ

I HAVE published several spiritual works,—on visiting the Blessed Sacrament, on the Passion of Jesus Christ, on the Glories of Mary, and, besides, a work against the Materialists and Deists, with other devout little treatises. Lately I brought out a work on the Infancy of our Saviour, entitled Novena for Christmas; and another entitled Preparation for Death, besides the one on the Eternal Maxims, most useful for meditation and for sermons, to which are added nine discourses suitable during seasons of divine chastisements. But I do not think that I have written a more useful work than the present, in which I speak of prayer as a necessary and certain means of obtaining salvation, and all the graces that we require for that object. If it were in my power, I would distribute a copy of it to every Catholic in the world, in order to show him the absolute necessity of prayer for salvation.

I say this, because, on the one hand, I see that the absolute necessity of prayer is taught throughout the Holy Scriptures, and by all the holy Fathers; while, on the other hand, I see that Christians are very careless in their practice of this great means of salvation. And, sadder still, I see that preachers take very little care to speak of it to their flocks, and confessors to their penitents; I see, moreover, that even the spiritual books now popular do not speak sufficiently of it; for there is not a thing preachers, and confessors, and spiritual books should insist upon with more warmth and energy than prayer; not but that they teach many excellent means of keeping ourselves in the grace of God, such as avoiding the occasions of sin, frequenting the sacraments, resisting temptations, hearing the Word of God, meditating on the eternal truths, and other means, "all of them, I admit, most useful; but, I say, what profit is there in sermons, meditations, and all the other means pointed out by masters of the spiritual life, if we forget to pray? since our Lord has declared that he will grant his graces to no one who does not pray. Ask and ye shall receive.[2110] Without prayer, in the ordinary course of Providence, all the meditations that we make, all our resolutions, all our promises, will be useless. If we do not pray, we shall always be unfaithful to the inspirations of God, and to the promises we make to him. Because, in order actually to do good, to conquer temptations, to practise virtues, and to observe God's law, it is not enough to receive illumination from God, and to meditate and make resolutions, but we require, moreover, the actual assistance of God; and, as we shall soon see, he does not give this assistance except to those who pray, and pray with perseverance. The light we receive, and the considerations and good resolutions that we make, are of use to incite us to the act of prayer when we are in danger, and are tempted to transgress God's law; for then prayer will obtain for us God's help, and we shall be preserved from sin; but if in such moments we do not pray, we shall be lost.

My intention in prefacing my book with this sentiment is, that my readers may thank God for giving them an opportunity, by means of this little book, to receive the grace of reflecting more deeply on the importance of prayer; for all adults who are saved, are ordinarily saved by this single means of grace. And therefore I ask my readers to thank God; for surely it is a great mercy when he gives the light and the grace to pray. I hope, then, that you, my beloved brother, after reading this little work, will never from this day forward neglect to have continual recourse to God in prayer, whenever you are tempted to offend him. If ever in times past you have had your conscience burdened with many sins, know that the cause of this has been the neglect of prayer, and not asking God for help to resist the temptations that assailed you. I pray you, therefore, to read it again and again with the greatest attention; not because it is my production, but because it is a means that God offers you for the good of your eternal salvation, thereby giving you to understand that he wishes you to be saved. And after having read it yourself, induce as many of your friends and neighbors as you can to read it also. Now let us begin in the name of the Lord.

DEFINITION OF PRAYER

The Apostle writes to Timothy: I beseech, therefore, that first of all supplications, petitions, and thanksgivings be made.[2111] St. Thomas explains, that prayer is properly the lifting up of the soul to God.[2112] Petition is that kind of prayer which begs for determinate objects; when the thing sought is indeterminate (as when we say, "Incline to my aid, O God!") it is called supplication. Obsecration is a solemn adjuration, or representation of the grounds on which we dare to ask a favor; as when we say, "By Thy cross and Passion, O Lord, deliver us!" Finally, thanksgiving is the returning of thanks for benefits received, whereby, says St. Thomas, we merit to receive greater favors. Prayer, in a strict sense, says the holy Doctor, means recourse to God; but in its general signification it includes all the kinds just enumerated. It is in this latter sense that the word is used in this book.

PLAN OF THE WORK

In order, then, to attach ourselves to this great means of salvation, we must first of all consider how necessary it is to us, and how powerful it is to obtain for us all the graces that we can desire from God, if we know how to ask for them as we ought. Hence, in the first part, we will speak first of the necessity and power of prayer; and next, of the conditions necessary to make it efficacious with God. Then, in the second part, we will show that the grace of prayer is given to all; and there we will treat of the manner in which grace ordinarily operates.

PART I

The Necessity, Power, and Conditions of Prayer

Chapter I

THE NECESSITY OF PRAYER

I

PRAYER IS A MEANS NECESSARY TO SALVATION

ONE of the errors of Pelagianism was the assertion that prayer is not necessary for salvation. Pelagius, the impious author of that heresy, said that man will only be damned for neglecting to know the truths necessary to be learned. How astonishing! St. Augustine said: "Pelagius discussed everything except how to pray,"[2113] though, as the saint held and taught, prayer is the only means of acquiring the science of the saints; according to the text of St. James: If any man want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all abundantly, and upbraideth not.[2114] The Scriptures are clear enough in pointing out how necessary it is to pray, if we would be saved. We ought always to pray, and not to faint.[2115] Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.[2116] Ask, and it shall be given you.[2117] The words "we ought," "pray," "ask," according to the general consent of theologians, impose the precept, and denote the necessity of prayer. Wickliffe said, that these texts are to be understood, not precisely of prayer, but only of the necessity of good works, for in his system prayer was only well-doing; but this was his error, and was expressly condemned by the Church. Hence Lessius wrote that it is heresy to deny that prayer is necessary for salvation in adults; as it evidently appears from Scripture that prayer is the means, without which we cannot obtain the help necessary for salvation.[2118]

The reason of this is evident. Without the assistance of God's grace we can do no good thing: Without Me, ye can do nothing.[2119] St. Augustine remarks on this passage, that our Lord did not say, "Without Me, ye can complete nothing," but "without Me, ye can do nothing;[2120] giving us to understand, that without grace we cannot even begin to do a good thing. Nay more, St. Paul writes, that of ourselves we cannot even have the wish to do good. Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God.[2121] If we cannot even think a good thing, much less can we wish it. The same thing is taught in many other passages of Scripture: God worketh all in all. I will cause you to walk in My commandments, and to keep My judgments, and do them.[2122] So that, as St. Leo I. says, "Man does no good thing, except that which God, by his grace, enables him to do,"[2123] and hence the Council of Trent says: "If any one shall assert, that without the previous inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and his assistance, man can believe, hope, love, or repent, as he ought, in order to obtain the grace of justification, let him be anathema."[2124]

The author of the Opus Imperfectum says, that God has given to some animals swiftness, to others claws, to others wings, for the preservation of their life; but he has so formed man, that God himself is his only strength.[2125] So that man is completely unable to provide for his own safety, since God has willed that whatever he has, or can have, should come entirely from the assistance of his grace.

But this grace is not given in God's ordinary Providence, except to those who pray for it; according to the celebrated saying of Gennadius. "We believe that no one approaches to be saved, except at the invitation of God; that no one who is invited works out his salvation, except by the help of God; that no one merits this help, unless he prays."[2126] From these two premises, on the one hand, that we can do nothing without the assistance of grace; and on the other, that this assistance is only given ordinarily by God to the man that prays, who does not see that the consequence follows, that prayer is absolutely necessary to us for salvation? And although the first graces that come to us without any co-operation on our part, such as the call to faith or to penance, are, as St. Augustine says, granted by God even to those who do not pray; yet the saint considers it certain that the other graces, and specially the grace of perseverance, are not granted except in answer to prayer: "God gives us some things, as the beginning of faith, even when we do not pray. Other things, such as perseverance, he has only provided for those who pray."[2127]

Hence it is that the generality of theologians, following St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, Clement of Alexandria, St. Augustine, and other Fathers, teach that prayer is necessary to adults, not only because of the obligation of the precept (as they say), but because it is necessary as a means of salvation. That is to say, in the ordinary course of Providence, it is impossible that a Christian should be saved without recommending himself to God, and asking for the graces necessary to salvation. St. Thomas teaches the same: "After baptism, continual prayer is necessary to man, in order that he may enter heaven; for though by baptism our sins are remitted, there still remain concupiscence to assail us from within, and the world and the devil to assail us from without."[2128] The reason then which makes us certain of the necessity of prayer is shortly this, in order to be saved we must contend and conquer: He that striveth for the mastery is not crowned except he strive lawfully.[2129] But without the divine assistance we cannot resist the might of so many and so powerful enemies: now this assistance is only granted to prayer; therefore without prayer there is no salvation.

Moreover, that prayer is the only ordinary means of receiving the divine gifts is more distinctly proved by St. Thomas in another place, where he says, that whatever graces God has from all eternity determined to give us, he will only give them if we pray for them. St. Gregory says the same thing: "Man by prayer merits to receive that which God had from all eternity determined to give him."[2130] Not, says St. Thomas, that prayer is necessary in order that God may know our necessities, but in order that we may know the necessity of having recourse to God to obtain the help necessary for our salvation, and may thus acknowledge him to be the author of all our good.[2131] As, therefore, it is God's law that we should provide ourselves with bread by sowing corn, and with wine by planting vines; so has he ordained that we should receive the graces necessary to salvation by means of prayer: Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find.[2132]

We, in a word, are merely beggars, who have nothing but what God bestows on us as alms: But I am a beggar and poor.[2133] The Lord, says St. Augustine, desires and wills to pour forth his graces upon us, but will not give them except to him who prays. "God wishes to give, but only gives to him who asks."[2134] This is declared in the words, Seek, and it shall be given to you. Whence it follows, says St. Teresa, that he who seeks not, does not receive. As moisture is necessary for the life of plants, to prevent them from drying up, so, says St. Chrysostom, is prayer necessary for our salvation. Or, as he says in another place, prayer vivifies the soul, as the soul vivifies the body: "As the body without the soul cannot live, so the soul without prayer is dead and emits an offensive odor."[2135] He uses these words, because the man who omits to recommend himself to God, at once begins to be defiled with sins. Prayer is also called the food of the soul, because the body cannot be supported without food; nor can the soul, says St. Augustine, be kept alive without prayer: "As the flesh is nourished by food, so is man supported by prayers."[2136] All these comparisons used by the holy Fathers are intended by them to teach the absolute necessity of prayer for the salvation of every one.

II

Moreover, prayer is the most necessary weapon of defence against our enemies; he who does not avail himself of it, says St. Thomas, is lost. He does not doubt that the reason of Adam's fall was, because he did not recommend himself to God when he was tempted: "He sinned because he had not recourse to the divine assistance."[2137] St. Gelasius says the same of the rebel angels: "Receiving the grace of God in vain, they could not persevere, because they did not pray."[2138] St. Charles Borromeo, in a pastoral letter, observes, that among all the means of salvation recommended by Jesus Christ in the Gospel, the first place is given to prayer; and he has determined that this should distinguish his Church from all false religions, when he calls her "the house of prayer:" My house is a house of prayer.[2139] St. Charles concludes that prayer is "the beginning and progress, and the completion of all virtues."[2140] So that in darkness, distress, and danger, we have no other hope than to raise our eyes to God, and with fervent prayers to beseech his mercy to save us: As we know not, said king Josaphat, what to do, we can only turn our eyes to Thee.[2141] This also was David's practice, who could find no other means of safety from his enemies, than continual prayer to God to deliver him from their snares: My eyes are ever towards the Lord; for He shall pluck my feet out of the snare.[2142] So he did nothing but pray: Look Thou upon me, and have mercy on me; for I am alone and poor. I cried unto Thee, O Lord; save me that I may keep Thy commandments.[2143] Lord, turn Thine eyes to me, have pity on me, and save me; for I can do nothing, and beside Thee there is none that can help me.

And, indeed how could we ever resist our enemies and observe God's precepts, especially since Adam's sin, which has rendered us so weak and infirm, unless we had prayer as a means whereby we can obtain from God sufficient light and strength to enable us to observe them? It was a blasphemy of Luther's to say, that after the sin of Adam the observance of God's law has become absolutely impossible to man. Jansenius also said that there are some precepts which are impossible even to the just, with the power which they actually have, and so far his proposition bears a good sense; but it was justly condemned by the Church for the addition he made to it, when he said that they have not the grace to make the precepts possible.[2144] It is true, says St. Augustine, that man, in consequence of his weakness, is unable to fulfil some of God's commands with his present strength and the ordinary grace given to all men; but he can easily, by prayer, obtain such further aid as he requires for his salvation: "God commands not impossibilities, but by commanding he suggests to you to do what you can, to ask for what is beyond your strength; and he helps you, that you may be able."[2145] This is a celebrated text, which was afterwards adopted and made a doctrine of faith by the Council of Trent.[2146] The holy Doctor immediately adds, "Let us see whence?" (i. e., how man is enabled to do that which he cannot). "By medicine he can do that which his natural weakness renders impossible to him."[2147] That is, by prayer we may obtain a remedy for our weakness; for when we pray, God gives us strength to do that which we cannot do of ourselves.

We cannot believe, continues St. Augustine, that God would have imposed on us the observance of a law, and then made the law impossible. When, therefore, God shows us that of ourselves we are unable to observe all his commands it is simply to admonish us to do the easier things by means of the ordinary grace which he bestows on us, and then to do the more difficult things by means of the greater help which we can obtain by prayer. "By the very fact that it is absurd to suppose that God could have commanded us to do impossible things, we are admonished what to do in easy matters, and what to ask for in difficulties."[2148] But why, it will be asked, has God commanded us to do things impossible to our natural strength? Precisely for this, says St. Augustine, that we may be incited to pray for help to do that which of ourselves we cannot do. "He commands some things which we cannot do, that we may know what we ought to ask of him."[2149] And in another place: "The law was given, that grace might be sought for; grace was given that the law might be fulfilled."[2150] The law cannot be kept without grace, and God has given the law with this object, that we may always ask him for grace to observe it. In another place he says: "The law is good, if it be used lawfully; what then, is the lawful use of the law?" He answers: "When by the law we perceive our own weakness, and ask of God the grace to heal us."[2151] St. Augustine then says: We ought to use the law; but for what purpose? to learn by means of the law, which we find to be above our strength, our own inability to observe it, in order that we may then obtain by prayer the divine aid to cure our weakness.

St. Bernard's teaching is the same: "What are we, or what is our strength, that we should be able to resist so many temptations? This certainly it was that God intended; that we, seeing our deficiencies, and that we have no other help, should with all humility have recourse to his mercy."[2152] God knows how useful it is to us to be obliged to pray, in order to keep us humble, and to exercise our confidence; and he therefore permits us to be assaulted by enemies too mighty to be overcome by our own strength, that by prayer we may obtain from his mercy aid to resist them; and it is especially to be remarked, that no one can resist the impure temptations of the flesh, without recommending himself to God when he is tempted. This foe is so terrible that, when he fights with us, he, as it were, takes away all light; he makes us forget all our meditations, all our good resolutions; he makes us also disregard the truths of faith, and even almost lose the fear of the divine punishments. For he conspires with our natural inclinations, which drive us with the greatest violence to the indulgence of sensual pleasures. He who in such a moment does not have recourse to God is lost. The only defence against this temptation is prayer, as St. Gregory of Nyssa says: "Prayer is the bulwark of chastity;"[2153] and before him Solomon: And as I knew that I could not otherwise be continent except God gave it, I went to the Lord and besought Him.[2154] Chastity is a virtue which we have not strength to practise, unless God gives it us; and God does not give this strength except to him who asks for it. But whoever prays for it will certainly obtain it.

Hence St. Thomas observes (in contradiction to Jansenius), that we ought not to say that the precept of chastity, or any other, is impossible to us; for though we cannot observe it by our own strength, we can by God's assistance. "We must say, that what we can do with the divine assistance is not altogether impossible to us."[2155] Nor let it be said that it appears an injustice to order a cripple to walk straight. No, says St. Augustine, it is not an injustice, provided always means are given him to find the remedy for his lameness; for after this, if he continues to go crooked, the fault is his own. "It is most wisely commanded that man should walk uprightly, so that when he sees that he cannot do so of himself, he may seek a remedy to heal the lameness of sin."[2156] Finally, the same holy Doctor says, that he will never know how to live well who does not know how to pray well. "He knows how to live aright who knows how to pray aright;"[2157] and, on the other hand, St. Francis of Assisi says, that without prayer you can never hope to find good fruit in a soul.

Wrongly, therefore, do those sinners excuse themselves who say that they have no strength to resist temptation. But if you have not this strength, why do you not ask for it? is the reproof which St. James gives them: You have it not, because you ask it not.[2158] There is no doubt that we are too weak to resist the attacks of our enemies. But, on the other hand, it is certain that God is faithful, as the Apostle says, and will not permit us to be tempted beyond our strength: God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able; but will make also with the temptation issue, that ye may be able to bear it.[2159] "He will provide an issue for it," says Primasius, "by the protection of his grace, that you may be able to withstand the temptation."[2160] We are weak, but God is strong; when we ask him for aid, he communicates his strength to us; and we shall be able to do all things, as the Apostle reasonably assured himself: I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me.[2161] He, therefore, who falls has no excuse (says St.

Chrysostom), because he has neglected to pray; for if he had prayed, he would not have been overcome by his enemies. "Nor can any one be excused who, by ceasing to pray, has shown that he did not wish to overcome his enemy."[2162]

III

INVOCATION OF THE SAINTS

1. IS IT GOOD AND USEFUL TO HAVE RECOURSE TO THE INTERCESSION OF THE SAINTS?

Here a question arises, whether it is necessary to have recourse also to the intercession of the saints to obtain the grace of God.

That it is a lawful and useful thing to invoke the saints, as intercessors, to obtain for us, by the merits of Jesus Christ, that which we, by our demerits, are not worthy to receive, is a doctrine of the Church, declared by the Council of Trent. "It is good and useful to invoke them by supplication, and to fly to their aid and assistance to obtain benefits from God through his Son Jesus Christ."[2163]

Such invocation was condemned by the impious Calvin, but most illogically. For if it is lawful and profitable to invoke living saints to aid us, and to beseech them to assist us in prayers, as the Prophet Baruch did: And pray ye for us to the Lord our God[2164] and St. Paul: Brethren, pray for us;[2165] and as God himself commanded the friends of Job to recommend themselves to his prayers, that by the merits of Job he might look favorably on them: Go to my servant Job, . . . and my servant Job shall pray for you; his face I will accept;[2166] if, then, it is lawful to recommend ourselves to the living, how can it be unlawful to invoke the saints who in heaven enjoy God face to face? This is not derogatory to the honor due to God, but it is doubling it; for it is honoring the king not only in his person but in his servants. Therefore, says St. Thomas, it is good to have recourse to many saints, "because by the prayers of many we can sometimes obtain that which we cannot by the prayers of one."[2167] And if any one object. But why have recourse to the saints to pray for us, when they are already praying for all who are worthy of it? The same Doctor answers, that no one can be said to be worthy that the saints should pray for him; but that "he becomes worthy by having recourse to the saint with devotion."[2168]

2. IS IT GOOD TO INVOKE ALSO THE SOULS IN PURGATORY?

Again, it is disputed whether there is any use in recommending one's self to the souls in purgatory. Some say that the souls in that state cannot pray for us; and these rely on the authority of St. Thomas, who says that those souls, while they are being purified by pain, are inferior to us, and therefore "are not in a state to pray for us, but rather require our prayers."[2169] But many other Doctors, as Bellarmine,[2170] Sylvius,[2171] Cardinal Gotti,[2172] Lessius,[2173] Medina and others, affirm with great probability, that we should piously believe that God manifests our prayer to those holy souls, in order that they may pray for us; and that so the charitable interchange of mutual prayer may be kept up between them and us. Nor do St. Thomas's words present much difficulty; for, as Sylvius and Gotti say, it is one thing not to be in a state to pray, another not to be able to pray. It is true that those souls are not in a state to pray, because, as St. Thomas says, while suffering they are inferior to us, and rather require our prayers; nevertheless, in this state they are well able to pray, as they are friends of God. If a father keeps a son whom he tenderly loves in confinement for some fault; if the son then is not in a state to pray for himself, is that any reason why he cannot pray for others? and may he not expect to obtain what he asks, knowing, as he does, his father's affection for him? So the souls in purgatory, being beloved by God, and confirmed in grace, have absolutely no impediment to prevent them from praying for us. Still the Church does not invoke them, or implore their intercession, because ordinarily they have no cognisance of our prayers. But we may piously believe that God makes our prayers known to them; and then they, full of charity as they are, most assuredly do not omit to pray for us. St. Catharine of Bologna, whenever she desired any favor, had recourse to the souls in purgatory, and was immediately heard. She even testified that by the intercession of the souls in purgatory she had obtained many graces which she had not been able to obtain by the intercession of the saints.

3. IT IS OUR DUTY TO PRAY FOR THE SOULS IN PURGATORY

But here let me make a digression in favor of those holy souls. If we desire the aid of their prayers, it is but fair that we should mind to aid them with our prayers and good works. I said it is fair, but I should have said it is a Christian duty; for charity obliges us to succor our neighbor when he requires our aid, and we can help him without grievous inconvenience. Now it is certain that amongst our neighbors are to be reckoned the souls in purgatory, who, although no longer living in this world, yet have not left the communion of saints. "The souls of the pious dead," says St. Augustine, "are not separated from the Church,"[2174] and St. Thomas says more to our purpose, that the charity which is due to the dead who died in the grace of God is only an extension of the same charity which we owe to our neighbor while living: "Charity, which is the bond which unites the members of the Church, extends not only to the living, but also to the dead who die in charity."[2175] Therefore, we ought to succor, according to our ability, those holy souls as our neighbors; and as their necessities are greater than those of our other neighbors, for this reason our duty to succor them seems also to be greater.

But now, what are the necessities of those holy prisoners? It is certain that their pains are immense. The fire that tortures them, says St. Augustine, is more excruciating than any pain that man can endure in this life: "That fire will be more painful than anything that man can suffer in this life."[2176] St. Thomas thinks the same, and supposes it to be identical with the fire of hell: "The damned are tormented and the elect purified in the same fire."[2177] And this only relates to the pains of sense. But the pain of loss (that is, the privation of the sight of God), which those holy souls suffer, is much greater; because not only their natural affection, but also the supernatural love of God, wherewith they burn, draws them with such violence to be united with their Sovereign Good, that when they see the barrier which their sins have put in the way, they feel a pain so acute, that if they were capable of death, they could not live a moment. So that, as St. Chrysostom says, this pain of the deprivation of God tortures them incomparably more than the pain of sense: "The flames of a thousand hells together could not inflict such torments as the pain of loss by itself."[2178] So that those holy souls would rather suffer every other possible torture than be deprived for a single instant of the union with God for which they long. So St. Thomas says, that the pain of purgatory exceeds anything that can be endured in this life: "The pain of purgatory must exceed all pain of this life."[2179] And Dionysius the Carthusian relates, that a dead person, who had been raised to life by the intercession of St. Jerome, told St. Cyril of Jerusalem that all the torments of this earth are refreshing and delightful when compared with the very least pain of purgatory: "If all the torments of the world were compared with the least that can be had in purgatory they would appear comfortable."[2180] And he adds, that if a man had once tried those torments, he would rather suffer all the earthly sorrows that man can endure till the Day of Judgment, than suffer for one day the least pain of purgatory. Hence St. Cyril wrote to St. Augustine: "That as far as regards the infliction of suffering, these pains are the same as those of hell—their only difference being that they are not eternal."[2181] Hence we see that the pains of these holy souls are excessive, while, on the other hand, they cannot help themselves; because as Job says: they are in chains, and are bound with the cords of poverty.[2182] They are destined to reign with Christ; but they are withheld from taking possession of their kingdom till the time of their purgation is accomplished. And they cannot help themselves (at least not sufficiently, even according to those theologians who assert that they can by their prayers gain some relief,) to throw off their chains, until they have entirely satisfied the justice of God. This is precisely what a Cistercian monk said to the sacristan of his monastery: "Help me, I beseech you, with your prayers; for of myself I can obtain nothing." And this is consistent with the saying of St. Bonaventure: "Destitution prevents solvency."[2183] That is, those souls are so poor, that they have no means of making satisfaction.

On the other hand, since it is certain, and even of faith, that by our suffrages, and chiefly by our prayers, as particularly recommended and practised by the Church, we can relieve those holy souls, I do not know how to excuse that man from sin who neglects to give them some assistance, at least by his prayers. If a sense of duty will not persuade us to succor them, let us think of the pleasure it will give Jesus Christ to see us endeavoring to deliver his beloved spouses from prison, in order that he may have them with him in paradise. Let us think of the store of merit which we can lay up by practising this great act of charity; let us think, too, that those souls are not ungrateful, and will never forget the great benefit we do them in relieving them of their pains, and in obtaining for them, by our prayers, anticipation of their entrance into glory; so that when they are there they will never neglect to pray for us. And if God promises mercy to him who practises mercy towards his neighbor—Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy[2184]—he may reasonably expect to be saved who remembers to assist those souls so afflicted, and yet so dear to God. Jonathan, after having saved the Hebrews from ruin by a victory over their enemies, was condemned to death by his father Saul for having tasted some honey against his express commands; but the people came before the king, and said, Shall Jonathan then die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel?[2185] So may we expect, that if any of us ever obtains, by his prayers, the liberation of a soul from purgatory, that soul will say to God: "Lord, suffer not him who has delivered me from my torments to be lost." And if Saul spared Jonathan's life at the request of his people, God will not refuse the salvation of a Christian to the prayers of a soul which is his own spouse. Moreover, St. Augustine says that God will cause those who in this life have most succored those holy souls, when they come to purgatory themselves, to be most succored by others. I may here observe that, in practice, one of the best suffrages is to hear Mass for them, and during the Holy Sacrifice to recommend them to God by the merits and Passion of Jesus Christ. The following form may be used: "Eternal Father, I offer Thee this Sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, with all the pains which he suffered in his life and death; and by his Passion I recommend to Thee the souls in Purgatory, and especially that of," etc. And it is a very charitable act to recommend, at the same time, the souls of all those who are at the point of death.

4. IS IT NECESSARY TO INVOKE THE SAINTS?

Whatever doubt there may be whether or not the souls in purgatory can pray for us, and therefore whether or not it is of any use to recommend ourselves to their prayers, there can be no doubt whatever with regard to the saints. For it is certain that it is most useful to have recourse to the intercession of the saints canonized by the Church, who are already enjoying the vision of God. To suppose that the Church can err in canonizing, is a sin, or is heresy, according to St. Bonaventure, Bellarmine, and others; or at least next door to heresy, according to Suarez, Azorius, Gotti, etc.; because the Sovereign Pontiff, according to St. Thomas is guided by the infallible influence of the Holy Ghost in an especial way when canonizing the saints.[2186]

But to return to the question just proposed: are we obliged to have recourse to the intercession of the saints? I do not wish to meddle with the decision of this question; but I cannot omit the exposition of a doctrine of St. Thomas. In several places above quoted, and especially in his book of Sentences, he expressly lays it down as certain that every one is bound to pray; because (as he asserts) in no other way can the graces necessary for salvation be obtained from God, except by prayer: "Every man is bound to pray, from the fact that he is bound to procure spiritual good for himself, which can only be got from God; so it can only be obtained by asking it of God."[2187] Then, in another place of the same book, he proposes the exact question, "Whether we are bound to pray to the saints to intercede for us?"[2188] And he answers as follows—in order to catch his real meaning, we will quote the entire passage: "According to Dionysius, the order which God has instituted for his creatures requires that things which are remote may be brought to God by means of things which are nearer to him. Hence, as the saints in heaven are nearest of all to him, the order of his law requires that we who 'remaining in the body are absent from the Lord,' should be brought to him by means of the saints; and this is effected by the divine goodness pouring forth his gifts through them. And as the path of our return to God should correspond to the path of the good things which proceed from him to us, it follows that, as the benefits of God come down to us by means of the suffrages of the saints, we ought to be brought to God by the same way, so that a second time we may receive his benefits by the mediation of the saints. Hence it is that we make them our intercessors with God, and as it were our mediators, when we ask them to pray for us." Note well the words—"The order of God's law requires;" and especially note the last words—"As the benefits of God come down to us by means of the suffrages of the saints, in the same way we must be brought back to God so that a second time we may receive his benefits by the mediation of the saints."[2189] So that, according to St. Thomas, the order of the divine law requires that we mortals should be saved by means of the saints, in that we receive by their intercession the help necessary for our salvation. He then puts the objection, that it appears superfluous to have recourse to the saints, since God is infinitely more merciful than they, and more ready to hear us. This he answers by saying: "God has so ordered, not on account of any want of mercy on his part, but to keep the right order which he has universally established, of working by means of second causes. It is not for want of his mercy, but to preserve the aforesaid order in the creation.[2190]

In conformity with this doctrine of St. Thomas, the Continuator of Tourneley and Sylvius writes, that although God only is to be prayed to as the Author of grace, yet we are bound to have recourse also to the intercession of the saints, so as to observe the order which God has established with regard to our salvation, which is, that the inferior should be saved by imploring the aid of the superior. "By the law of nature we are bound to observe the order which God has appointed; but God has appointed that the inferior should obtain salvation by imploring the assistance of his superior."[2191]

IV

THE INTERCESSION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN

And if this is true of the saints, much more is it true of the intercession of the Mother of God, whose prayers are certainly of more value in his sight than those of all the rest of the inhabitants of heaven together. For St. Thomas says, that the saints, in proportion to the merits by which they have obtained grace for themselves, are able also to save others; but that Jesus Christ, and so also his Mother, have merited so much grace, that they can save all men. "It is a great thing in any saint that he should have grace enough for the salvation of many beside himself; but if he had enough for the salvation of all men, this would be the greatest of all; and this is the case with Christ, and with the Blessed Virgin,"[2192] And St. Bernard speaks thus to Mary: "Through thee we have access to thy Son, O discoverer of grace and Mother of salvation, that through thee he may receive us, who through thee was given to us."[2193] These words signify, that as we only have access to the Father by means of the Son, who is the Mediator of justice, so we only have access to the Son by means of the Mother, who is mediator of grace, and who obtains for us, by her intercession, the gifts which Jesus Christ has merited for us. And therefore St. Bernard says, in another place, that Mary has received a twofold fulness of grace. The first was the Incarnation of the Word, who was made Man in her most holy womb; the second is that fulness of grace which we receive from God by means of her prayers. Hence the saint adds: "God has placed the fulness of all good in Mary, that if we have any hope, any grace, any salvation, we may know that it overflows from her who 'ascendeth abounding with delights.' "[2194] She is a garden of delights, whose odors spread abroad and abound; that is, the gifts of graces. So that whatever good we have from God, we receive all by the intercession of Mary. And why so? Because, says St. Bernard, it is God's will: "Such is his will, who would have us receive everything through Mary."[2195] But the more precise reason is deduced from the expression of St. Augustine, that Mary is justly called our Mother, because she co-operated by her charity in the birth of the faithful to the life of grace, by which we become members of Jesus Christ, our head: "But clearly she is the mother of his members (which we are); because she co-operated by her charity in the birth of the faithful in the Church, and they are members of that Head."[2196] Therefore, as Mary co-operated by her charity in the spiritual birth of the faithful, so also God willed that she should co-operate by her intercession to make them enjoy the life of grace in this world, and the life of glory in the next; and therefore the Church makes us call her and salute her, without any circumlocution, by the names, "our life, our sweetness, and our hope."[2197]

Hence St. Bernard exhorts us to have continual recourse to the Mother of God; because her prayers are certain to be heard by her Son: "Go to Mary, I say, without hesitation; the Son will hear the Mother." And then he says: "My children, she is the ladder of sinners, she is my chief confidence, she is the whole ground of my hope."[2198] He calls her "ladder," because, as you cannot mount the third step except you first put your foot on the second, nor can you arrive at the second except by the first, so you cannot come to God except by means of Jesus Christ, nor can you come to Christ except by means of his Mother. Then he calls her "his greatest security, and the whole ground of his hope;" because, as he affirms, God wills that all the graces which he gives us should pass through the hands of Mary. And he concludes by saying, that we ought to ask all the graces which we desire through Mary; because she obtains whatever she seeks, and her prayers cannot be rejected. "Let us seek grace, and let us seek it through Mary; because what she seeks she finds, and she cannot be disappointed."[2199] The following saints teach the same as St. Bernard: St. Ephrem, "We have no other confidence than from thee, O purest Virgin!"[2200] St. Ildephonsus, "All the good things that the divine Majesty has determined to give them, he has determined to commit to thy hands; for to thee are intrusted the treasures and the wardrobes of grace."[2201] St Germanus, "If thou desertest us, what will become of us, O life of Christians?"[2202] St. Peter Damian, "In thy hands are all the treasures of the mercies of God."[2203] St. Antoninus, "Who seeks without her aid, attempts to fly without wings."[2204] St. Bernardine of Sienna, "Thou art the dispenser of all graces; our salvation is in thy hands."[2205] In another place, he not only says that all graces are transmitted to us by means of Mary, but he also asserts that the Blessed Virgin, from the time she became Mother of God, acquired a certain jurisdiction over all the graces that are given to us. "Through the Virgin the vital graces are transfused from Christ, the Head, into his mystical body."[2206] From the time when the Virgin Mother conceived in her womb the Word of God, she obtained a certain jurisdiction (if I may so speak) over every temporal procession of the Holy Ghost; so that no creature could obtain any grace from God, except by the dispensation of his sweet Mother."[2207] And he concludes, "Therefore all gifts, virtues, and graces are dispensed through her hands to whom she wills, and as she wills."[2208] St. Bonaventure says the same: "Since the whole divine nature was in the womb of the Virgin, I do not fear to teach that she has a certain jurisdiction over all the streams of grace; as her womb was, as it were, an ocean of the divine nature, whence all the streams of grace must emanate."[2209] On the authority of these saints, many theologians have piously and reasonably defended the opinion, that there is no grace given to us except by means of the intercession of Mary; so Mendoza, Vega, Paciucchelli, Segneri, Poirè, Crasset, and others, as also the learned Alexander Natalis who says: "It is God's will that we should look to him for all good things, to be procured by the most powerful intercession of the Blessed Virgin, when we invoke her, as it is fit."[2210] And he quotes in confirmation the passage of St. Bernard: "Such is his will, who has determined that we should receive all through Mary."[2211] Contenson says the same, in a comment on the words addressed by Jesus on the cross to St. John, "Behold thy Mother:" As though he had said, "No one shall be partaker of my blood except by the intercession of my Mother.[2212] My wounds are fountains of grace; but their streams shall flow to no one, except through the canal of Mary. O my disciple John, I will love you as you love her!"[2213] For the rest, it is certain, that if God is pleased when we have recourse to the saints, he will be much more pleased when we avail ourselves of the intercession of Mary, that she, by her merits, may compensate for our unworthiness, according to the words of St. Anselm: "That the dignity of the intercessor may supply for our poverty. So that, to invoke the Virgin, is not to distrust God's mercy, but to fear our own unworthiness."[2214] St. Thomas, speaking of her dignity, calls it, as it were, infinite: "From the fact that she is the Mother of God, she has a certain infinite dignity."[2215] So that it may be said with reason, that the prayers of Mary have more power with God than those of all heaven together.

CONCLUSION OF THE CHAPTER

Let us conclude this first point by giving the gist of all that has been said hitherto. He who prays is certainly saved. He who prays not is certainly damned. All the blessed (except infants) have been saved by prayer. All the damned have been lost through not praying; if they had prayed, they would not have been lost. And this is, and will be, their greatest torment in hell, to think how easily they might have been saved, only by asking God for his grace; but that now it is too late,—the time of prayer is over.

Chapter II

THE POWER OF PRAYER

I

EXCELLENCE OF PRAYER AND ITS POWER WITH GOD

OUR prayers are so dear to God, that he has appointed the angels to present them to him as soon as they come forth from our mouths. "The angels," says St. Hilary, "preside over the prayers of the faithful, and offer them daily to God."[2216] This is that smoke of the incense, which are the prayers of saints, which St. John saw ascending to God from the hands of the angels;[2217] and which he saw in another place represented by golden phials full of sweet odors, very acceptable to God. But in order to understand better the value of prayers in God's sight, it is sufficient to read both in the Old and New Testaments the innumerable promises which God makes to the man that prays. Cry to Me, and I will hear thee.[2218] Call upon Me, and I will deliver thee.[2219] Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. He shall give good things to them that ask Him.[2220] Everyone that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth.[2221] Whatsoever they shall ask, it shall be done for them by My Father.[2222] All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive them, and they shall come unto you.[2223] If you ask Me anything in My name, that will I do.[2224] You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you. Amen, amen, I say unto you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[2225] There are a thousand similar texts; but it would take too long to quote them.

God wills us to be saved; but for our greater good, he wills us to be saved as conquerors. While, therefore, we remain here, we have to live in a continual warfare; and if we should be saved, we have to fight and conquer. "No one can be crowned without victory," says St. Chrysostom.[2226] We are very feeble, and our enemies are many and mighty; how shall we be able to stand against them, or to defeat them? Let us take courage, and say with the Apostle, I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me.[2227] By prayer we can do all things; for by this means God will give us that strength which we want. Theodoret says, that prayer is omnipotent; it is but one, yet it can do all things: "Though prayer is one, it can do all things."[2228] And St. Bonaventure asserts that by prayer we obtain every good, and escape every evil: "By it is obtained the gain of every good, and liberation from every evil."[2229] St. Laurence Justinian says, that by means of prayer we build for ourselves a strong tower, where we shall be secure from all the snares and assaults of our enemies: "By the exercise of prayer man is able to erect a citadel for himself."[2230] "The powers of hell are mighty," says St. Bernard; "but prayer is stronger than all the devils."[2231] Yes; for by prayer the soul obtains God's help, which is stronger than any created power. Thus David encouraged himself in his alarms: Praising I will call upon the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies.[2232] For, as St. Chrysostom says, "prayer is a strong weapon, a defence, a port, and a treasure."[2233] It is a weapon sufficient to overcome every assault of the devil; it is a defence to preserve us in every danger; it is a port where we may be safe in every tempest; and it is at the same time a treasure which provides us with every good.

II

POWER OF PRAYER AGAINST TEMPTATION

God knows the great good which it does us to be obliged to pray, and therefore permits us (as we have already shown in the previous chapter) to be assaulted by our enemies, in order that we may ask him for the help which he offers and promises to us. But as he is pleased when we run to him in our dangers, so is he displeased when he sees us neglectful of prayer. "As the king," says St. Bonaventure, "would think it faithlessness in an officer, when his post was attacked, not to ask him for reinforcements, he would be reputed a traitor if he did not request help from the king;"[2234] so God thinks himself betrayed by the man who, when he finds himself surrounded by temptations, does not run to him for assistance. For he desires to help us; and only waits to be asked, and then gives abundant succor. This is strikingly shown by Isaias, when, on God's part, he told the king Achaz to ask some sign to assure himself of God's readiness to help him: Ask thee a sign of the Lord Thy God.[2235] The faithless king answered: I will not ask, and I will not tempt the Lord;[2236] for he trusted in his own power to overcome his enemies without God's aid. And for this the Prophet reproved him: Hear, therefore, O house of David; is it a small thing for you to be grievous to men, that you are grievous to my God also?[2237] because that man is grievous and offensive to God who will not ask him for the graces which he offers.

Come to Me, all you that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. [2238] "My poor children," says our Saviour, "though you find yourselves assailed by enemies, and oppressed with the weight of your sins, do not lose heart but have recourse to me in prayer, and I will give you strength to resist, and I will give you a remedy for all your disasters." In another place he says, by the mouth of Isaias, Come and accuse Me, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow.[2239] O men, come to me; though your consciences are horribly defiled, yet come; I even give you leave to reproach me (so to speak), if after you have had recourse to me, I do not give you grace to become white as snow.

What is prayer? It is, as St. Chrysostom says, "the anchor of those tossed on the sea, the treasure of the poor, the cure of diseases, the safeguard of health."[2240] It is a secure anchor for him who is in peril of shipwreck; it is a treasury of immense wealth for him who is poor; it is a most efficacious medicine for him who is sick; and it is a certain preservative for him who would keep himself well. What does prayer effect? Let us hear St. Laurence Justinian: "It pleases God, it gets what it asks, it overcomes enemies, it changes men."[2241] It appeases the wrath of God, who pardons all who pray with humility. It obtains every grace that is asked for; it vanquishes all the strength of the tempter, and it changes men from blind into seeing, from weak into strong, from sinners into saints. Let him who wants light ask it of God, and it shall be given. As soon as I had recourse to God, says Solomon, he granted me wisdom: I called upon God, and the Spirit of wisdom came to me.[2242] Let him who wants fortitude ask it of God, and it shall be given. As soon as I opened my mouth to pray, says David, I received help from God: I opened my mouth, and drew in the Spirit.[2243] And how in the world did the martyrs obtain strength to resist tyrants, except by prayer, which gave them force to overcome dangers and death?

"He who uses this great weapon," says St. Chrysostom, "knows not death, leaves the earth, enters heaven, lives with God."[2244] He falls not into sin; he loses affection for the earth; he makes his abode in heaven; and begins, even in this life, to enjoy the conversation of God. How then can you disquiet such a man by saying: "How do you know that you are written in the book of life?" How do you know whether God will give you efficacious grace and the gift of perseverance? Be nothing solicitous, says St. Paul, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your petitions be known unto God.[2245] What is the use, says the Apostle, of agitating yourselves with these miseries and fears? Drive from you all these cares, which are of no use but to lessen your confidence, and to make you more tepid and slothful in walking along the way of salvation. Pray and seek always, and make your prayers sound in God's ears, and thank him for having promised to give you the gifts which you desire whenever you ask for them, namely efficacious grace, perseverance, salvation, and everything that you desire. The Lord has given us our post in the battle against powerful foes; but he is faithful in his promises, and will never allow us to be assaulted more violently than we can resist: God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which ye are able.[2246] He is faithful, since he instantly succors the man who invokes him. The learned Cardinal Gotti writes, that God has bound himself not only to give us grace precisely balancing the temptation that assails us, but that he is obliged, when we are tempted, and have recourse to him, to afford us, by means of that grace which is kept ready for and offered to all, sufficient strength for us actually to resist the temptation. "God is bound, when we are tempted, and fly to his protection, to give us by the grace prepared and offered to all such strength as will not only put us in the way of being able to resist, but will also make us resist; 'for we can do all things in him who strengthens us' by his grace, if we humbly ask for it."[2247] We can do all things with God's help, which is granted to every one who humbly seeks it; so that we have no excuse when we allow ourselves to be overcome by a temptation. We are conquered solely by our own fault, because we would not pray. By prayer all the snares and power of the devil are easily overcome. "By prayer all hurtful things are chased away," says St. Augustine.[2248]

III

GOD IS ALWAYS READY TO HEAR US

St. Bernardine of Sienna says that prayer is a faithful ambassador, well known to the King of Heaven, and having access to his private chamber, and able by his importunity to induce the merciful heart of the King to grant every aid to us his wretched creatures, groaning in the midst of our conflicts and miseries in this valley of tears. "Prayer is a most faithful messenger, known to the King, who is used to enter his chamber, and by his importunity to influence the merciful mind of the King, and to obtain us assistance in our toils."[2249] Isaias also assures us, that as soon as the Lord hears our prayers, he is moved with compassion towards us; and does not leave us to cry long to him, but instantly replies, and grants us what we ask: Weeping, thou shalt not weep; He will surely have pity upon thee: the voice of thy cry as soon as He shall hear, He will answer thee.[2250] In another place he complains of us by the mouth of Jeremias: Am I become a wilderness to Israel, or a lateward springing land? Why then have My people said, we are revolted, and will come to Thee no more![2251] Why do you say that you will no more have recourse to me? Has my mercy become to you a barren land, which can yield you no fruits of grace? or a cold soil, which yields its fruit too late! So has our loving Lord assured us that he never neglects to hear us, and to hear us instantly When we pray; and so does he reproach those who neglect to pray through distrust of being heard.

If God were to allow us to present our petitions to him once a month, even this would be a great favor. The kings of the earth give audiences a few times in the year, but God gives a continual andience. St. Chrysostom writes, that God is always waiting to hear our prayers, and that a case never occurred when he neglected to hear a petition offered to him properly: "God is always prepared for the voice of his servants, nor did he ever, when called upon as he ought to be, neglect to hear."[2252] And in another place he says, that when we pray to God, before we have finished recounting to him our supplications, he has already heard us: "It is always obtained, even while we are yet praying."[2253] We even have the promise of God to do this: As they are yet speaking I will hear.[2254] The Lord, says David, stands near to every one who prays, to console, to hear, and to save him: The Lord is nigh to all them that call upon Him; to all that call upon Him in truth (that is, as they ought to call). He will do the will of them that fear Him; and He will hear their prayer and will save them.[2255] This it was in which Moses gloried, when he said: There is not another nation so great, that has gods so nigh them, as our God is present to all our petitions.[2256] The gods of the Gentiles were deaf to those who invoked them, for they were wretched fabrications, which could do nothing. But our God, who is Almighty, is not deaf to our prayers, but always stands near the man who prays, ready to grant him all the graces which he asks: In what day soever I shall call upon Thee, behold I shall know that Thou art my God.[2257] Lord, says the Psalmist, hereby do I know that Thou, my God, art all goodness and mercy, in that, whenever I have recourse to Thee, Thou dost instantly help me.

IV

WE SHOULD NOT LIMIT OURSELVES TO ASKING FOR LITTLE THINGS. TO PRAY IS BETTER THAN TO MEDITATE

We are so poor that we have nothing; but if we pray we are no longer poor. If we are poor, God is rich; and God, as the Apostle says, is all liberality to him that calls for his aid: Rich unto all who call upon Him.[2258] Since, therefore (as St. Augustine exhorts us), we have to do with a Lord of infinite power and infinite riches, let us not go to him for little and valueless things, but let us ask some great thing of him: "You seek from the Almighty,—seek something great."[2259] If a man went to a king to ask some trumpery coin, like a farthing, methinks that man would but insult his king. On the other hand, we honor God, we honor his mercy, and his liberality, when, though we see how miserable we are, and how unworthy of any kindness, we yet ask for great graces, trusting in the goodness of God, and in his faithfulness to his promises of granting to the man who prays whatever grace he asks: Whatsoever you will, ask, and it shall be done unto you.[2260] St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said, "that God feels himself so honored and is so delighted when we ask for his grace, that he is, in a certain sense, grateful to us; because when we do this we seem to open to him a way to do us a kindness, and to satisfy his nature, which is to do good to all." And let us be sure that, when we seek God's grace, he always gives us more than we ask: If any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all abundantly, and upbraideth not.[2261] Thus speaks St. James, to show us that God is not like men, parsimonious of his goods; men, though rich and liberal, when they give alms, are always somewhat close-handed, and generally give less than is asked of them, because their wealth, however great it be, is always finite; so that the more they give the less they have. But God, when he is asked, gives his good things "abundantly," that is, with a generous hand, always giving more than is asked, because his wealth is infinite, and the more he gives the more he has to give: For Thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild; and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon Thee.[2262] Thou, O my God, said David, art but too liberal and kind to him that invokes Thee; the mercies which thou pourest upon him are super-abundant, above all he asks.

On this point, then, we have to fix all our attention, namely, to pray with confidence, feeling sure that by prayer all the treasures of heaven are thrown open to us. "Let us attend to this," says St. Chrysostom, "and we shall open heaven to ourselves."[2263] Prayer is a treasure; he who prays most receives most. St. Bonaventure says that every time a man has recourse to God by fervent prayer, he gains good things that are of more value than the whole world: "Any day a man gains more by devout prayer than the whole world is worth."[2264] Some devout souls spend a great deal of time in reading and in meditating, but pay but little attention to prayer. There is no doubt that spiritual reading, and meditation on the eternal truths, are very useful things; "but," says St. Augustine, "it is of much more use to pray." By reading and meditating we learn our duty; but by prayer we obtain the grace to do it. "It is better to pray than to read: by reading we know what we ought to do; by prayer we receive what we ask."[2265] What is the use of knowing our duty, and then not doing it, but to make us more guilty in God's sight? Read and meditate as we like, we shall never satisfy our obligations, unless we ask of God the grace to fulfil them.

And, therefore, as St. Isidore observes, the devil is never more busy to distract us with the thoughts of worldly cares than when he perceives us praying and asking God for grace: "Then mostly does the devil insinuate thoughts, when he sees a man praying."[2266] And why? Because the enemy sees that at no other time do we gain so many treasures of heavenly goods as when we pray. This is the chief fruit of mental prayer, to ask God for the graces which we need for perseverance and for eternal salvation; and chiefly for this reason it is that mental prayer is morally necessary for the soul, to enable it to preserve itself in the grace of God. For if a person does not remember in the time of meditation to ask for the help necessary for perseverance, he will not do so at any other time; for without meditation he will not think of asking for it, and will not even think of the necessity for asking it. On the other hand, he who makes his meditation every day will easily see the needs of his soul, its dangers, and the necessity of his prayer; and so he will pray, and will obtain the graces which will enable him to persevere and save his soul. Father Segneri said of himself, that when he began to meditate, he aimed rather at exciting affections than at making prayers. But when he came to know the necessity and the immense utility of prayer, he more and more applied himself, in his long mental prayer, to making petitions.

As a young swallow, so will I cry, said the devout king Hezekias.[2267] The young of the swallow does nothing but cry to its mother for help and for food; so should we all do, if we would preserve our life of grace. We should be always crying to God for aid to avoid the death of sin, and to advance in his holy love. Father Rodriguez relates, that the ancient Fathers, who were our first instructors in the spiritual life, held a conference to determine which was the exercise most useful and most necessary for eternal salvation; and that they determined it was to repeat over and over again the short prayer of David, Incline unto my aid, O God![2268] "This," says Cassian, "is what every one ought to do who wishes to be saved: he ought to be always saying, My God, help me! my God help me!" We ought to do this the first thing when we awake in the morning; and then to continue doing it in all our needs, and when attending to our business, whether spiritual or temporal; and most especially when we find ourselves troubled by any temptation or passion. St. Bonaventure says, that at times we obtain a grace by a short prayer sooner than by many other good works: "Sometimes a man can sooner obtain by a short prayer what he would be a long time obtaining by pious works."[2269] St. Ambrose says, that he who prays, while he is praying obtains what he asks, because the very act of prayer is the same as receiving: "He who asks of God, while he asks receives; for to ask is to receive."[2270] Hence St. Chrysostom wrote, that "there is nothing more powerful than a man who prays,"[2271] because such a one is made partaker of the power of God. To arrive at perfection, says St. Bernard, we must meditate and pray: by meditation we see what we want; by prayer we receive what we want. "Let us mount by meditation and prayer: the one teaches what is deficient, the other obtains that there should be nothing deficient."[2272]

CONCLUSION OF THE CHAPTER

In conclusion, to save one's soul without prayer is most difficult, and even (as we have seen) impossible, according to the ordinary course of God's Providence. But by praying our salvation is made secure, and very easy. It is not necessary in order to save our souls to go among the heathen, and give up our life. It is not necessary to retire into the desert, and eat nothing but herbs. What does it cost us to say, My God, help me! Lord, assist me! have mercy on me! Is there anything more easy than this? and this little will suffice to save us, if we will be diligent in doing it. St. Laurence Justinian specially exhorts us to oblige ourselves to say a prayer at least when we begin any action: "We must endeavor to offer a prayer at least in the beginning of every work."[2273] Cassian attests that the principal advice of the ancient Fathers was to have recourse to God with short but frequent prayers. Let no one, says St. Bernard, think lightly of prayer, because God values it, and then gives us either what we ask, or what is still more useful to us: "Let no one undervalue his prayer, for God does not undervalue it . . . he will give either what we ask, or what he knows to be better."[2274] And let us understand, that if we do not pray, we have no excuse, because the grace of prayer is given to every one. It is in our power to pray whenever we will, as David says of himself: With me is prayer to the God of my life; I will say to God, Thou art my support.[2275] On this point I shall speak at length in the second part, where I will make it quite clear that God gives to all the grace of prayer, in order that thereby they may obtain every help, and even more than they need, for keeping the divine law, and for persevering till death. At present, I will only say, that if we are not saved, the whole fault will be ours; and we shall have our own failure to answer for, because we did not pray.

Chapter III

THE CONDITIONS OF PRAYER

I

WHICH ARE THE REQUISITE CONDITIONS

OBJECT OF PRAYER

Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[2276] Jesus Christ then has promised, that whatever we ask his Father in his name, his Father will give us. But always with the understanding that we ask under the proper conditions. Many seek, says St. James, and obtain not, because they seek improperly: Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss.[2277] So St. Basil, following out the argument of the Apostle, says, "You sometimes ask and receive not, because you have asked badly; either without faith, or you have requested things not fit for you, or you have not persevered;"[2278] "faithlessly," that is, with little faith, or little confidence; "lightly," with little desire of the grace you ask; "things not fit for you," when you seek good things that will not be conducive to your salvation; or you have left off praying, without perseverance. Hence St. Thomas reduces to four the conditions required in prayer, in order that it may produce its effect: these are, that a man asks (1) for himself; (2) things necessary for salvation; (3) piously; and (4) with perseverance.[2279]

CAN WE PRAY EFFICACIOUSLY FOR OTHERS?

The first condition then of prayer is, that you make it for yourself; because St. Thomas holds, that one man cannot ex condigno (i.e. in the fitness of things) obtain for another eternal life; nor, consequently, even those graces which are requisite for his salvation. Since, as he says, the promise is made not to others, but only to those that pray: "He shall give to you." Nevertheless, there are many theologians, Cornelius à Lapide, Sylvester, Tolet, Habert, and others, who hold the opposite doctrine, on the authority of St. Basil, who teaches that prayer, by virtue of God's promise, is infallibly efficacious, even for those for whom we pray, provided they put no positive impediment in the way. And they support their doctrine by Scripture: Pray one for another, that you may be saved; for the continual prayer of the just man availeth much.[2280] Pray for them that persecute and calumniate you.[2281] And better still, on the text of St. John: He that knoweth his brother to sin a sin which is not to death, let him ask, and life shall be given to him who sinneth not unto death. There is a sin unto death; for that I say not that any man ask.[2282] St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, the Ven. Bede, and others,[2283] explain the words "who sinneth not unto death" to mean, provided the sinner is not one who intends to remain obstinate till death; since for such a one a very extraordinary grace would be required. But for other sinners, who are not guilty of such malice, the Apostle promises their conversion to him who prays for them: Let him ask, and life shall be given him for him that sinneth.

WE OUGHT TO PRAY FOR SINNERS

Besides, it is quite certain that the prayers of others are of great use to sinners, and are very pleasing to God; and God complains of his servants who do not recommend sinners to him, as he once complained to St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, to whom he said one day: "See, my daughter, how the Christians are in the devil's hands; if my elect did not deliver them by their prayers they would be devoured." But God especially requires this of priests and religious. The same saint used to say to her nuns: "My sisters, God has not separated us from the world, that we should only do good for ourselves, but also that we should appease him in behalf of sinners;" and God one day said to her, "I have given to you my chosen spouses the City of Refuge (i.e., the Passion of Jesus Christ), that you may have a place where you may obtain help for my creatures. Therefore have recourse to it, and thence stretch forth a helping hand to my creatures who are perishing, and lay down your lives for them." For this reason the saint, inflamed with holy zeal, used to offer God the blood of the Redeemer fifty times a day in behalf of sinners, and was quite wasted away for the desire she had for their conversion. Oh, she used to say, what pain is it, O Lord, to see how one could help Thy creatures by giving one's life for them, and not be able to do so! For the rest, in every exercise she recommended sinners to God; and it is written in her life, that she scarcely passed an hour in the day without praying for them. Frequently, too, she arose in the middle of the night, and went to the Blessed Sacrament to pray for them; and yet for all this, when she was once found bathed in tears, on being asked the cause, she answered, "Because I seem to myself to do nothing for the salvation of sinners." She went so far as to offer to endure even the pains of hell for their conversion, provided that in that place she might still love God; and often God gratified her by inflicting on her grievous pains and infirmities for the salvation of sinners. She prayed especially for priests, seeing that their good life was the occasion of salvation to others, while their bad life was the cause of ruin to many; and therefore she prayed God to visit their faults upon her, saying, "Lord, make me die and return to life again as many times as is necessary to satisfy Thy justice for them! "And it is related in her life, that the saint, by her prayers, did indeed release many souls from the hands of Lucifer.

I wished to speak rather particularly of the zeal of this saint; but, indeed, no souls that really love God neglect to pray for poor sinners. For how is it possible for a person who loves God, and knows what love he has for our souls, and what Jesus Christ has done and suffered for their salvation, and how our Saviour desires us to pray for sinners,—how is it possible, I say, that he should be able to look with indifference on the numbers of poor souls who are living without God, and are slaves of hell, without being moved to importune God with frequent prayers to give light and strength to these wretched beings, so that they may come out from the miserable state of living death in which they are slumbering? True it is that God has not promised to grant our requests, when those for whom we pray put a positive impediment in the way of their conversion; but still, God of his goodness has often deigned, at the prayer of his servants, to bring back the most blinded and obstinate sinners to a state of salvation, by means of extraordinary graces. Therefore let us never omit, when we say or hear Mass, when we receive Holy Communion, when we make our meditation or our visit to the Blessed Sacrament, to recommend poor sinners to God. And a learned author says, that he who prays for others will find that his prayers for himself are heard much sooner. But this is a digression. Let us now return to the examination of the other conditions that St. Thomas lays down as necessary to the efficacy of prayer.

WE MUST ASK FOR GRACES NECESSARY TO SALVATION

The second condition assigned by the saint is, that we ask those favors which are necessary to salvation; because the promise annexed to prayer was not made with reference to temporal favors, which are not necessary for the salvation of the soul. St. Augustine, explaining the words of the Gospel, "whatever ye shall ask in my name," says, that "nothing which is asked in a way detrimental to salvation is asked in the name of the Saviour."[2284] Sometimes, says the same Father, we seek some temporal favors, and God does not hear us; but he does not hear us because he loves us, and wishes to be merciful to us. "A man may pray faithfully for the necessities of this life, and God may mercifully refuse to hear him; because the physician knows better than the patient what is good for the sick man."[2285] The physician who loves his patient will not allow him to have those things that he sees would do him harm. Oh, how many, if they had been sick or poor, would have escaped those sins which they commit in health and in affluence! And, therefore, when men ask God for health or riches, he often denies them because he loves them, knowing that these things would be to them an occasion of losing his grace, or at any rate of growing tepid in the spiritual life. Not that we mean to say that it is any defect to pray to God for the necessaries of this present life, so far as they are not inconsistent with our eternal salvation, as the Wise man said: Give me only the necessaries of life.[2286] Nor is it a defect, says St. Thomas,[2287] to have anxiety about such goods, if it is not inordinate. The defect consists in desiring and seeking these temporal goods, and in having an inordinate anxiety about them, as if they were our highest good. Therefore, when we ask of God these temporal favors, we ought always to ask them with resignation, and with the condition, if they will be useful to our souls; and when we see that God does not grant them, let us be certain that he then denies them to us for the love he bears us, and because he sees that they would be injurious to the salvation of our souls.

It often happens that we pray God to deliver us from some dangerous temptation, and yet that God does not hear us, but permits the temptation to continue troubling us. In such a case, let us understand that God permits even this for our greater good. It is not temptation or bad thoughts that separate us from God, but our consent to the evil. When a soul in temptation recommends itself to God, and by his aid resists, oh, how it then advances in perfection, and unites itself more closely to God! and this is the reason why God does not hear it. St. Paul prayed instantly to be delivered from the temptation of impurity: There was given me a sting of my flesh an angel of Satan to buffet me; for which thing thrice I besought the Lord, that it might depart from me.[2288] But God answered him, that it was enough to have his grace: My grace is sufficient for thee.[2289] So that even in temptations we ought to pray with resignation, saying, Lord, deliver me from this trouble, if it is expedient to deliver me; and if not, at least give me help to resist. And here comes in what St. Bernard says, that when we beg any grace of God, he gives us either that which we ask, or some other thing more useful to us. He often leaves us to be buffeted by the waves, in order to try our faithfulness, and for our greater profit. It seems then that he is deaf to our prayers. But no; let us be sure that God then really hears us, and secretly aids us, and strengthens us by his grace to resist all the assaults of our enemies. See how he himself assures us of this by the mouth of the Psalmist: Thou calledst upon me in affliction, and I delivered thee: I heard thee in the secret place of tempest; I proved thee at the waters of contradiction.[2290]

OTHER CONDITIONS OF PRAYER

The other conditions assigned by St. Thomas to prayer are, that it is to be made piously and perseveringly; by piously, he means with humility and confidence—by perseveringly, continuing to pray until death. We must now speak distinctly of each of these three conditions, which are the most necessary for prayer, namely of humility, confidence, and perseverance.

II

THE HUMILITY WITH WHICH WE SHOULD PRAY

The Lord does indeed regard the prayers of his servants, but only of his servants who are humble. He hath had regard to the prayer of the humble.[2291] Others he does not regard, but rejects them: God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.[2292] He does not hear the prayers of the proud who trust in their own strength; but for that reason leaves them to their own feebleness; and in this state, deprived of God's aid, they must certainly perish. David had to bewail this case: Before I was humbled I offended.[2293] I sinned because I was not humble. The same thing happened to St. Peter, who, though he was warned by our Lord that all the disciples would abandon Him on that night—All you shall be scandalised in Me this night[2294]—nevertheless, instead of acknowledging his own weakness, and begging our Lord's aid against his unfaithfulness, was too confident in his own strength, and said, that though all should abandon him he would never leave him: Although all shall be scandalised in Thee, I will never be scandalised.[2295] And although our Saviour again foretold to him, in a special manner, that in that very night, before the cock-crow, he should deny him three times; yet, trusting in his own courage, he boasted, saying, Yea, though I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee.[2296] But what came of it? Scarcely had the unhappy man entered the house of the high priest, when he was accused of being a disciple of Jesus Christ, and three times did he deny with an oath that he had ever known him: And again he denied with an oath, that I know not the Man.[2297] If Peter had humbled himself, and had asked our Lord for the grace of constancy, he would not have denied him.

We ought all to feel that we are standing on the edge of a precipice, suspended over the abyss of all sins, and supported only by the thread of God's grace. If this thread fails us, we shall certainly fall into the gulf, and shall commit the most horrible wickedness. Unless the Lord had been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in hell.[2298] If God had not succored me, I should have fallen into a thousand sins, and now I should be in hell. So said the Psalmist, and so ought each of us to say. This is what St. Francis of Assisi meant, when he said that he was the worst sinner in the world. But, my Father, said his companion, what you say is not true; there are many in the world who are certainly worse than you are. Yes, what I say is but too true, answered St. Francis; because if God did not keep his hand over me, I should commit every possible sin.

It is of faith, that without the aid of grace we cannot do any good work, nor even think a good thought. "Without grace men do no good whatever, either in thought or in deed," says St. Augustine.[2299] As the eye cannot see without light, so, say the holy Father, man can do no good without grace. The Apostle had said the same thing before him: Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God.[2300] And David had said it before St. Paul: Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.[2301] In vain does man weary himself to become a saint, unless God lends a helping hand: Unless the Lord keep the city, he watcheth in vain that keepeth it.[2302] If God did not preserve the soul from sins, in vain will it try to preserve itself by its own strength: and therefore did the holy prophet protest, I will not trust in my bow.[2303] I will not hope in my arms; but only in God, who alone can save me.

Hence, whoever finds that he has done any good, and does not find that he has fallen into greater sins than those which are commonly committed, let him say with St. Paul, By the grace of God I am what I am;[2304] and for the same reason, he ought never to cease to be afraid of falling on every occasion of sin: Wherefore, he that thinketh himself to stand, let him take heed lest he fall.[2305] St. Paul wishes to warn us that he who feels secure of not falling, is in great danger of falling; and he assigns the reason in another place, where he says, If any man think himself to be something, whereas he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.[2306] So that St. Augustine wrote wisely, "the presumption of stability renders many unstable; no one will be so firm as he who feels himself infirm."[2307] If a man says he has no fear, it is a sign that he trusts in himself, and in his good resolutions; but such a man, with his mischievous confidence, deceives himself, because, through trust in his own strength, he neglects to fear; and through not fearing he neglects to recommend himself to God, and then he will certainly fall. And so, for like reasons, we should all abstain from noticing with any vain-glory the sins of other people; but rather we should then esteem ourselves as worse in ourselves than they are, and should say, Lord, if thou hadst not helped me, I should have done worse. Otherwise, to punish us for our pride, God will permit us to fall into worse and more shameful sins. For this cause St. Paul instructs us to labor for our salvation; but how? always in fear and trembling: With fear and trembling work out your salvation.[2308] Yes; for he who has a great fear of falling, distrusts his own strength, and therefore places his confidence in God, and will have recourse to him in dangers; and God will aid him, and so he will vanquish his temptations, and will be saved. St. Philip Neri, walking one day through Rome, kept saying, "I am in despair!" A certain religious rebuked him, and the saint thereupon said, "My father, I am in despair for myself; but I trust in God." So must we do, if we would be saved; we must always live in despair of doing anything by our own strength; and in so doing we shall imitate St. Philip, who used to say to God the first moment he woke in the morning, "Lord, keep Thy hands over Philip this day; for if not, Philip will betray Thee."

This, then, we may conclude with St. Augustine, is all the grand science of a Christian,—to know that he is nothing, and can do nothing. "This is the whole of the great science, to know that man is nothing."[2309] For then he will never neglect to furnish himself, by prayer to God, with that strength which he has not of himself, and which he needs in order to resist temptation, and to do good; and so, with the help of God, who never refuses anything to the man who prays to him in humility, he will be able to do all things: The prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds, and he will not depart until the Most High behold.[2310] The prayer of an humble soul penetrates the heavens, and presents itself before the throne of God; and departs not without God's looking on it and hearing it. And though the soul be guilty of any amount of sin, God never despises a heart that humbles itself: A contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise;[2311] God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.[2312] As the Lord is severe with the proud, and resists their prayers, so is he kind and liberal to the humble. This is precisely what Jesus Christ said one day to St. Catharine of Sienna: "Know, my daughter, that a soul that perseveres in humble prayer gains every virtue."[2313]

It will be of use to introduce here the advice which the learned and pious Palafox, Bishop of Osma, gives to spiritual persons who desire to become saints. It occurs in a note to the 18th letter of St. Teresa, which she wrote to her confessor, to give him an account of all the grades of supernatural prayer with which God had favored her. On this the bishop writes, that these supernatural graces which God designed to grant to St. Teresa, as he has also done to other saints, are not necessary in order to arrive at sanctity, since many souls have become saints without them; and, on the other hand, many have arrived at sanctity, and yet have, after all, been damned. Therefore he says it is superfluous, and even presumptuous, to desire and to ask for these supernatural gifts, when the true and only way to become a saint is, to exercise ourselves in virtue and in the love of God; and this is done by means of prayer, and by corresponding to the inspirations and assistance of God, who wishes nothing so much as to see us saints. For this is the will of God, your sanctification.[2314]

Hence Bishop Palafox, speaking of the grades of supernatural prayer mentioned in St. Teresa's letter, namely, the prayer of quiet, the sleep or suspension of the faculties, the prayer of union, ecstasy or rapture, flight and impulse of the spirit, and the wound of love, says, very wisely, that as regards the prayer of quiet, what we ought to ask of God is that he would free us from attachment to worldly goods, and the desire of them, which give no peace, but bring disquiet and affliction to the soul: Vanity of vanities, as Solomon well called them, and vexation of spirit.[2315] The heart of man will never find true peace, if it does not empty itself of all that is not God, so as to leave itself all free for his love, that he alone may possess the whole of it. But this the soul cannot do of itself; it must obtain it of God by repeated prayers. As regards the sleep and suspension of the faculties, we ought to ask God for grace to keep them asleep for all that is temporal, and only awake them to consider God's goodness, and to set our hearts upon his love and eternal happiness. As regards the union of the faculties, let us pray him to give us grace not to think, nor to seek, nor to wish anything but what God wills; since all sanctity and the perfection of love consists in uniting our will to the will of God. As regards ecstasy and rapture, let us pray God to draw us away from the inordinate love of ourselves and of creatures, and to draw us entirely to himself. As regards the flight of the spirit, let us pray him to give us grace to live altogether detached from this world, and to do as the swallows, that do not settle on the ground even to feed, but take their food flying;—so should we use our temporal goods for all that is necessary for the support of life, but always flying, without settling on the ground to look for earthly pleasures. As regards impulse of spirit, let us pray him to give us courage and strength to do violence to ourselves, whenever it is necessary, for resisting the assaults of our enemies, for conquering our passions, and for accepting sufferings even in the midst of desolation and dryness of spirit. Finally, as regards the wound of love, as a wound by its pain perpetually renews the remembrance of what we suffer, so ought we to pray God to wound our hearts with his holy love in such a way that we shall always be reminded of his goodness and the love which he has borne us; and thus we should live in continual love of him, and should be always pleasing him with our works and our affections. But none of these graces can be obtained without prayer; and with prayer, provided it be humble, confident, and persevering, everything is obtained.

III

THE CONFIDENCE WITH WHICH WE OUGHT TO PRAY

EXCELLENCE AND NECESSITY OF THIS VIRTUE

The principal instruction that St. James gives us, if we wish by prayer to obtain grace from God, is, that we pray with a confidence that feels sure of being heard, and without hesitating: Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering.[2316] St. Thomas teaches that as prayer receives its power of meriting from charity, so, on the other hand, it receives from faith and confidence its power of being efficacious to obtain: "Prayer has its power of meriting from charity, but its efficacity of obtaining from faith and confidence."[2317] St. Bernard teaches the same, saying that it is our confidence alone which obtains for us the divine mercies: "Hope alone obtains a place of mercy with Thee, O Lord."[2318] God is much pleased with our confidence in his mercy, because we then honor and exalt that infinite goodness which it was his object in creating us to manifest to the world: Let all those, O my God, says the royal prophet, who hope in Thee be glad, for they shall be eternally happy, and Thou shalt dwell in them.[2319] God protects and saves all those who confide in him: He is the Protector of all that hope in Him.[2320] Thou who savest them that trust in Thee.[2321] Oh, the great promises that are recorded in the Scriptures to all those who hope in God! He who hopes in God will not fall into sin: None of them that trust in Him shall offend.[2322] Yes, says David, because God has his eyes turned to all those who confide in his goodness to deliver them by his aid from the death of sin. Behold, the eyes of the Lord are on them that fear Him, and on them that hope for His mercy to deliver their souls from death.[2323] And in another place God himself says: Because he hoped in me I will deliver him; I will protect him; I will deliver him and I will glorify him[2324] Mark the word "because." Because he confided in Me, I will protect, I will deliver him from his enemies, and from the danger of falling; and finally I will give him eternal glory. Isaias says of those who place their hope in God: They that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall take wings as the eagles; they shall run and not be weary: they shall walk and not faint.[2325] They shall cease to be weak as they are now, and shall gain in God a great strength; they shall not faint; they shall not even feel weary in walking the way of salvation, but they shall run and fly as eagles; in silence and in hope shall your strength be.[2326] All our strength, the prophet tells us, consists in placing all our confidence in God, and in being silent; that is, in reposing in the arms of his mercy, without trusting to our own efforts, or to human means.

And when did it ever happen that a man had confidence in God and was lost? No one hath hoped in the Lord and hath been confounded[2327] It was this confidence that assured David that he should not perish: In Thee, O Lord, have I trusted; I shall not be confounded forever. [2328] Perhaps, then, says St. Augustine, God could be a deceiver, who offers to support us in dangers if we lean upon him, and would then withdraw himself if we had recourse to him? "God is not a deceiver, that he should offer to support us, and then when we lean upon him should slip away from us."[2329] David calls the man happy who trusts in God: Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee.[2330] And why? because, says he, he who trusts in God will always find himself surrounded by God's mercy. Mercy shall encompass him that hopeth in the Lord.[2331] So that he shall be surrounded and guarded by God on every side in such a way that he shall be prevented from losing his soul.

It is for this cause that the Apostle recommends us so earnestly to preserve our confidence in God; for (he tells us) it will certainly obtain from him a great remuneration: Do not therefore lose your confidence, which hath a great reward. [2332] As is our confidence, so shall be the graces we receive from God: if our confidence is great, great too will be the graces: "Great faith merits great things."[2333] St. Bernard writes that the divine mercy is an inexhaustible fountain, and that he who brings to it the largest vessel of confidence shall take from it the largest measure of gifts: "Neither, O Lord, dost Thou put the oil of thy mercy into any other vessel than that of confidence."[2334] The Prophet had long before expressed the same thought: Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us (i.e., in proportion) as we have hoped in Thee.[2335] This was well exemplified in the centurion to whom our Saviour said, in praise of his confidence, Go, and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee.[2336] And our Lord revealed to St. Gertrude that he who prays with confidence does him in a manner such violence that he cannot but hear him in everything he asks: "Prayer," says St. John Climacus, "does a pious violence to God." It does him a violence, but a violence which he likes, and which pleases him.

Let us go, therefore, according to the admonition of St. Paul, with confidence to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in seasonable aid."[2337] The throne of grace is Jesus Christ, who is now sitting on the right hand of the Father; not on the throne of justice, but of grace, to obtain pardon for us if we fall into sin, and help to enable us to persevere if we are enjoying his friendship. To this throne we must always have recourse with confidence; that is to say, with that trust which springs from faith in the goodness and truth of God, who has promised to hear him who prays to him with confidence, but with a confidence that is both sure and stable. On the other hand, says St. James, let not the man who prays with hesitation think that he will receive anything: "For he who wavereth is like a wave of the sea, which is moved and carried about by the wind. Therefore let not that man think to receive anything of the Lord. [2338] He will receive nothing, because the diffidence which agitates him is unjust towards God, and will hinder his mercy from listening to his prayers: "Thou hast not asked rightly, because thou hast asked doubtingly," says St. Basil; "thou hast not received grace, because thou hast asked it without confidence."[2339] David says that our confidence in God ought to be as firm as a mountain, which is not moved by each gust of wind. They who trust in the Lord are as Mount Sion; he shall not be moved forever. [2340] And it is this that our Lord recommends to us, if we wish to obtain the graces which we ask: Whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you.[2341] Whatever grace you require, be sure of having it, and so you shall obtain it.

FOUNDATION OF OUR CONFIDENCE

But on what, a man will say, am I, a miserable sinner, to found this certain confidence of obtaining what I ask? On what? On the promise made by Jesus Christ: Ask, and you shall receive[2342] "Who will fear to be deceived, when the truth promises?" says St. Augustine.[2343] How can we doubt that we shall be heard, when God, who is truth itself, promises to give us that which we ask of him in prayer? "We should not be exhorted to ask," says the same Father, "unless he meant to give."[2344] Certainly God would not have exhorted us to ask him for favors, if he had not determined to grant them; but this is the very thing to which he exhorts us so strongly, and which is repeated so often in the Scriptures—pray, ask, seek, and you shall obtain what you desire: Whatever you will, seek and it shall be done to you[2345] And in order that we may pray to him with due confidence, our Saviour has taught us, in the "Our Father," that when we have recourse to him for the graces necessary to salvation (all of which are included in the petitions of the Lord's Prayer) we should call him, not Lord, but Father—"Our Father"—because it is his will that we should ask God for grace with the same confidence with which a son, when in want or sick, asks food or medicine from his own father. If a son is dying of hunger, he has only to make his case known to his father, and his father will forthwith provide him with food; and if he has received a bite from a venomous serpent, he has only to show his father the wound, and the father will immediately apply whatever remedy he has.

Trusting, therefore, in God's promises, let us always pray with confidence; not vacillating, but stable and firm, as the Apostle says: Let us hold fast the confession of our hope without wavering; for He is faithful that hath promised.[2346] As it is perfectly certain that God is faithful in his promises, so ought our faith also to be perfectly certain that he will hear us when we pray. And although sometimes, when we are in a state of aridity, or disturbed by some fault we have committed, we perhaps do not feel while praying that sensible confidence which we would wish to experience, yet, for all this, let us force ourselves to pray, and to pray without ceasing; for God will not neglect to hear us. Nay, rather he will hear us more readily; because we shall then pray with more distrust of ourselves; and confiding only in the goodness and faithfulness of God, who has promised to hear the man who prays to him. Oh, how God is pleased in the time of our tribulations, of our fears, and of our temptations, to see us hope against hope; that is, in spite of the feeling of diffidence which we then experience because of our desolation! This is that for which the Apostle praises the patriarch Abraham, who against hope, believed in hope.[2347]

St. John says that he who reposes a sure trust in God certainly will become a saint: And every one that hath this hope in Him sanctifieth himself, as he also is holy.[2348] For God gives abundant graces to them that trust in him. By this confidence the host of martyrs, of virgins, even of children, in spite of the dread of the torments which their persecutors prepared for them, overcame both their tortures and their persecutors. Sometimes, I say, we pray, but it seems to us that God will not hear us. Alas! let us not then neglect to persevere in prayer and in hope; let us then say, with Job, Although He should kill me, I will trust in Him.[2349] O my God! though Thou hast driven me from Thy presence, I will not cease to pray, and to hope in Thy mercy. Let us do so, and we shall obtain what we want from God. So did the Canaanitish woman, and she obtained all that she wished from Jesus Christ. This woman had a daughter possessed by a devil, and prayed our Saviour to deliver her: Have mercy on me, my daughter is grievously tormented by a devil.[2350] Our Lord answered her, that he was not sent for the Gentiles, of whom she was one, but for the Jews. She, however, did not lose heart, but renewed her prayer with confidence: Lord, Thou canst console me! Thou must console me: Lord, help me![2351] Jesus answered, But as to the bread of the children, it is not good to give it to the dogs: It is not good to take the children's bread, and to cast it to the dogs. [2352] But, my Lord, she answered, even the dogs are allowed to have the fragments of bread which fall from the table: Yea, Lord; for the whelps eat of the crumbs that fall from the tables of their masters.[2353] Then our Saviour, seeing the great confidence of this woman, praised her, and did what she asked, saying: O woman, great is thy faith; be it done to thee as thou wilt.[2354] For who, says Ecclesiasticus, has ever called on God for aid, and has been neglected and left unaided by him? Or who hath called upon Him, and He hath despised him?[2355]

St. Augustine says that prayer is a key which opens heaven to us; the same moment in which our prayer ascends to God, the grace which we ask for descends to us: "The prayer of the just is the key of heaven; the petition ascends, and the mercy of God descends."[2356] The royal prophet writes that our supplications and God's mercy are united together: Blessed is God, who has not turned away my prayer, nor His mercy for me. [2357] And hence the same St. Augustine says that when we are praying to God, we ought to be certain that God is hearing us: "When you see that your prayer is not removed from you, be sure that his mercy is not removed from you."[2358] And for myself, I speak the truth, I never feel greater consolation, nor a greater confidence of my salvation, than when I am praying to God, and recommending myself to him. And I think that the same thing happens to all other believers; for the other signs of our salvation are uncertain and unstable; but that God hears the man who prays to him with confidence is an infallible truth, as it is infallible that God cannot fail in his promises.

When we find ourselves weak, and unable to overcome any passion, or any great difficulty, so as to fulfil that which God requires of us, let us take courage and say, with the Apostle, I can do all things in Him, who strengtheneth me.[2359] Let us not say, as some do, I cannot; I distrust myself. With our own strength certainly we can do nothing; but with God's help we can do everything. If God said to any one, Take this mountain on your back, and carry it, for I am helping you, would not the man be a mistrustful fool if he answered, I will not take it; for I have not strength to carry it? And thus, when we know how miserable and weak we are, and when we find ourselves most encompassed with temptations, let us not lose heart; but let us lift up our eyes to God, and say, with David, The Lord is my helper; and I will despise my enemies.[2360] With the help of my Lord, I shall overcome and laugh to scorn all the assaults of my foes. And when we find ourselves in danger of offending God, or in any other critical position, and are too confused to know what is best to be done, let us recommend ourselves to God, saying, The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?[2361] And let us be sure that God will then certainly give us light, and will save us from every evil.

THE PRAYER OF SINNERS

But I am a sinner, you will say; and in the Scriptures I read, God heareth not sinners.[2362] St. Thomas answers (with St. Augustine) that this was said by the blind man, who, when he spoke, had not as yet been enlightened: "That is the word of a blind man not yet perfectly enlightened, and therefore it is not authoritative."[2363] Though, adds St. Thomas, it is true of the petition which the sinner makes, "so far forth as he is a sinner;" that is, when he asks from a desire of continuing to sin; as, for instance, if he were to ask assistance to enable him to take revenge on his enemy, or to execute any other bad intention. The same holds good for the sinner who prays God to save him, but has no desire to quit the state of sin. There are some unhappy persons who love the chains with which the devil keeps them bound like slaves. The prayers of such men are not heard by God; because they are rash, presumptuous, and abominable. For what greater presumption can there be than for a man to ask favors of a prince whom he not only has often offended, but whom he intends to offend still more? And this is the meaning of the Holy Spirit, when he says that the prayer of him who turns away his ears so as not to hear what God commands is detestable and odious to God: He who turneth away his ears from learning the law, his prayer shall be an abomination.[2364] To these people God says, It is of no use your praying to me, for I will turn My eyes from you, and will not hear you: When you stretch forth your hands, I will turn away my eyes from you; and when you multiply prayer, I will not hear. [2365] Such, precisely, was the prayer of the impious King Antiochus, who prayed to God, and made great promises, but insincerely, and with a heart obstinate in sin; the sole object of his prayer being to escape the punishment that impended over him; therefore God did not hear his prayer, but caused him to die devoured by worms: Then this wicked man prayed to the Lord, of whom he was not to obtain mercy.[2366]

But others, who sin through frailty, or by the violence of some great passion, and who groan under the yoke of the enemy, and desire to break these chains of death, and to escape from their miserable slavery, and therefore ask the assistance of God; the prayer of these, if it is persevering, will certainly be heard by him, who says that every one that asks receives; and he who seeks grace finds it: For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth.[2367] "Every one, whether he be a just man or a sinner," says the author of the Opus Imperfectum.[2368] And in St. Luke, our Lord, when speaking of the man who gave all the loaves he had to his friend, not so much on account of his friendship as because of the other's importunity, says, If he shall continue knocking, I say to you, although he will not rise and give him because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.[2369] And so I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you.[2370] So that persevering prayer obtains mercy from God, even for those who are not his friends. That which is not obtained through friendship, says St. Chrysostom, is obtained by prayer: "That which was not effected by friendship was effected by prayer." He even says that prayer is valued more by God than friendship: "Friendship is not of such avail with God as prayer; that which is not effected by friendship is effected by prayer.[2371] And St. Basil doubts not that even sinners obtain what they ask if they persevere in praying:" Sinners obtain what they seek, if they seek perseveringly."[2372] St. Gregory says the same: "The sinner also shall cry, and his prayer shall reach to God."[2373] So St. Jerome,[2374] who says that even the sinner can call God his Father, if he prays to him to receive him anew as a son; after the example of the Prodigal Son, who called him Father, Father, I have sinned,[2375] even though he had not as yet been pardoned. If God did not hear sinners, says St. Augustine, in vain would the Publican have asked for forgiveness: "If God does not hear sinners, in vain would that Publican have said, God be merciful to me a sinner."[2376] But the Gospel assures us that the Publican did by his prayer obtain forgiveness: This man went down to his house justified.[2377]

But further still, St. Thomas examines this point more minutely, and does not hesitate to affirm that even the sinner is heard if he prays; for though his prayer is not meritorious, yet it has the power of impetration,—that is, of obtaining what we ask; because impetration is not founded on God's justice, but on his goodness. "Merit," he says, "depends on justice; impetration, on grace."[2378] Thus did Daniel pray, Incline, O my God, Thine ear and hear. . . . For not in our justifications do we present our prayers before Thy face, but in the multitude of Thy mercies.[2379] Therefore, when we pray, says St. Thomas, it is not necessary to be friends of God, in order to obtain the grace we ask; for prayer itself renders us his friends: "Prayer itself makes us of the family of God."[2380] Moreover, St. Bernard uses a beautiful explanation of this, saying that the prayer of a sinner to escape from sin arises from the desire to return to the grace of God. Now this desire is a gift, which is certainly given by no other than God himself; to what end, therefore, says St. Bernard, would God give to a sinner this holy desire, unless he meant to hear him? "For what would he give the desire, unless he willed to hear?"[2381] And, indeed, in the Holy Scriptures themselves there are multitudes of instances of sinners who have been delivered from sin by prayer. Thus was King Achab[2382] delivered; thus King Manasses;[2383] thus King Nabuchodonosor;[2384] and thus the good thief.[2385] Oh, the wonderful! oh, the mighty power of prayer! Two sinners are dying on Calvary by the side of Jesus Christ: one, because he prays, "Remember me," is saved; the other, because he prays not, is damned.

And, in fine, St. Chrysostom says, "No man has with sorrow asked favors from him, without obtaining what he wished."[2386] No sinner has ever with penitence prayed to God, without having his desires granted. But why should we cite more authorities, and give more reasons, to demonstrate this point, when our Lord himself says, Come to Me, all you that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you. [2387] The "burdened," according to Saints Augustine, Jerome, and others, are sinners in general, who groan under the load of their sins; and who, if they have recourse to God, will surely, according to his promise, be refreshed and saved by his grace. Ah, we cannot desire to be pardoned so much as he longs to pardon us. "Thou dost not," says St. Chrysostom, "so much desire thy sins to be forgiven, as he desires to forgive thy sins."[2388] There is no grace, he goes on to say, that is not obtained by prayer, though it be the prayer of the most abandoned sinner, provided only it be persevering: "There is nothing which prayer cannot obtain, though a man be guilty of a thousand sins, provided it be fervent and unremitting."[2389] And let us mark well the words of St. James: If any man wanteth wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all abundantly, and upbraideth not.[2390] All those, therefore, who pray to God, are infallibly heard by him, and receive grace in abundance: He giveth to all abundantly. But you should particularly remark the words which follow, and upbraideth not. This means that God does not do as men, who, when a person who has formerly done them an injury comes to ask a favor, immediately upbraid him with his offence. God does not do so to the man who prays, even though he were the greatest sinner in the world, when he asks for some grace conducive to his eternal salvation. Then he does not upbraid him with the offences he has committed; but, as though he had never displeased him, he instantly receives him, he consoles him, he hears him, and enriches him with an abundance of his gifts. To crown all, our Saviour, in order to encourage us to pray, says, Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you.[2391] As though he had said, Courage, O sinners; do not despair: do not let your sins turn you away from having recourse to My Father, and from hoping to be saved by him, if you desire it. You have not now any merits to obtain the graces which you ask for, for you only deserve to be punished; still do this: go to My Father in My name, through My merits ask the favors which you want, and I promise and swear to you ("Amen, amen, I say to you," which, according to St. Augustine, is a species of oath) that whatever you ask, My Father will grant. O God, what greater comfort can a sinner have after his fall than to know for certain that all that he asks from God in the name of Jesus Christ will be given to him!

I say "all;" but I mean only that which has reference to his eternal salvation; for with respect to temporal goods, we have already shown that God, even when asked, sometimes does not give them; because he sees that they would injure our soul. But so far as relates to spiritual goods, his promise to hear us is not conditional, but absolute; and therefore St. Augustine tells us, that those things which God promises absolutely, we should demand with absolute certainty of receiving: "Those things which God promises, seek with certainty."[2392] And how, says the saint, can God ever deny us anything, when we ask him for it with confidence? how much more does he desire to dispense to us his graces, than we to receive them! "He is more willing to be munificent of his benefits to thee than thou art desirous to receive them."[2393]

St. Chrysostom says that the only time when God is angry with us is when we neglect to ask him for his gifts: "He is only angry when we do not pray."[2394] And how can it ever happen that God will not hear a soul who asks him for favors all according to his pleasure? When the soul says to him, Lord, I ask Thee not for goods of this world,—riches, pleasures, honors; I ask Thee only for Thy grace: deliver me from sin, grant me a good death, give me Paradise, give me Thy holy love (which is that grace which St. Francis de Sales says we should seek more than all others), give me resignation to Thy will; how is it possible that God should not hear! What petitions wilt Thou, O my God, ever hear (says St. Augustine), if Thou dost not hear those which are made after Thy own heart? "What prayers dost Thou hear, if Thou hearest not these?"[2395] But, above all, our confidence ought to revive, when we pray to God for spiritual graces, as Jesus Christ says: If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father from heaven give the good Spirit to them that ask Him![2396] If you, who are so attached to your own interests, so full of self-love, cannot refuse your children that which they ask, how much more will your heavenly Father, who loves you better than any earthly father, grant you his spiritual goods when you pray for them!

IV

THE PERSEVERANCE REQUIRED IN PRAYER

Our prayers, then, must be humble and confident; but this is not enough to obtain final perseverance, and thereby eternal life. Individual prayers will obtain the individual graces which they ask of God; but unless they are persevering, they will not obtain final perseverance: which, as it is the accumulation of many graces, requires many prayers, that are not to cease till death. The grace of salvation is not a single grace, but a chain of graces, all of which are at last linked with the grace of final perseverance. Now, to this chain of graces there ought to correspond another chain (as it were) of our prayers; if we, by neglecting to pray, break the chain of our prayers, the chain of graces will be broken too; and as it is by this that we have to obtain salvation, we shall not be saved.

It is true that we cannot merit final perseverance, as the Council of Trent teaches: "It cannot be had from any other source but from him who is able to confirm the man who is standing, that he may stand with perseverance."[2397] Nevertheless, says St. Augustine, this great gift of perseverance can in a manner be merited by our prayers; that is, can be obtained by praying: "This gift, therefore, can be suppliantly merited; that is, can be obtained by supplication."[2398] And F. Suarez adds, that the man who prays, infallibly obtains it. But to obtain it, and to save ourselves, says St. Thomas, a persevering and continual prayer is necessary: "After baptism continual prayer is necessary to a man in order that he may enter heaven."[2399] And before this, our Saviour himself had said it over and over again: We ought always to pray, and not to faint.[2400] Watch ye therefore, praying at all times, that you may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that are to come, and to stand before the Son of man.[2401] The same had been previously said in the Old Testament: Let nothing hinder thee from praying always.[2402] Bless God at all times, and desire Him to direct thy ways.[2403] Hence the Apostle inculcated on his disciples never to neglect prayer: Pray without intermission.[2404] Be instant in prayer, watching in it with thanksgiving.[2405] I will therefore that men pray in every place.[2406] God does indeed wish to give us perseverance, says St. Nilus, but he will only give it to him who prays for it perseveringly: "He willeth to confer benefits on him who perseveres in prayer."[2407] Many sinners by the help of God's grace come to be converted, and to receive pardon. But then, because they neglect to ask for perseverance, they fall again, and lose all.

Nor is it enough, says Bellarmine, to ask the grace of perseverance once, or a few times; we ought always to ask it, every day till our death, if we wish to obtain it: "It must be asked day by day, that it may be obtained day by day."[2408] He who asks it one day, obtains it for that one day; but if he does not ask it the next day, the next day he will fall.

And this is the lesson which our Lord wished to teach us in the parable of the man who would not give his loaves to his friend who asked him for them until he had become importunate in his demand: Although he will not rise and give because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity, he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.[2409] Now if this man, solely to deliver himself from the troublesome importunity of his friend, gave him even against his own will the loaves for which he asked, "how much more," says St. Augustine, "will the good God give, who both commands us to ask, and is angry if we ask not!"[2410] How much more will God, who, as he is infinite goodness, has a commensurate desire to communicate to us his good things,—how much more will he give his graces when we ask him for them! And the more, as he himself tells us to ask for them, and as he is displeased when we do not demand them. God, then, does indeed wish to give us eternal life, and therein all graces; but he wishes also that we should never omit to ask him for them, even to the extent of being troublesome. Cornelius à Lapide says on the text just quoted, "God wishes us to be persevering in prayer to the extent of importunity."[2411] Men of the world cannot bear the importunate; but God not only bears with them, but wishes us to be importunate in praying to him for graces, and especially for perseverance. St. Gregory says that God wishes us to do him violence by our prayers; for such violence does not annoy, but pleases him: "God wills to be called upon, he wills to be forced, he wills to be conquered by importunity. . . . Happy violence, by which God is not offended, but appeased!"[2412]

So that to obtain perseverance we must always recommend ourselves to God, morning and night, at meditation, at Mass, at Communion, and always; especially in time of temptation, when we must keep repeating, Lord, help me; Lord, assist me; keep Thy hand upon me; leave me not; have pity upon me! Is there anything easier than to say, Lord, help me, assist me! The Psalmist says, With me is prayer to the God of my life.[2413] On which the gloss is as follows: "A man may say, I cannot fast, I cannot give alms; but if he is told to pray, he cannot say this.[2414] Because there is nothing easier than to pray. But we must never cease praying; we must (so to speak) continually do violence to God, that he may assist us always—a violence which is delightful and dear to him." "This violence is grateful to God," says Tertullian;[2415] and St. Jerome says that the more persevering and importunate our prayers are, so much the more are they acceptable to God: "Prayer, as long as it is importunate, is more acceptable."[2416]

Blessed is the man that heareth me, and that watcheth daily at my gates.[2417] Happy is that man, says God, who listens to Me, and watches continually with holy prayers at the gates of My mercy And Isaias says, Blessed are all they that wait for Him.[2418] Blessed are they who till the end wait (in prayer) for their salvation from God. Therefore in the Gospel Jesus Christ exhorts us to pray; but how? Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you.[2419] Would it not have been enough to have said, "ask?" why add "seek" and "knock?" No, it was not superfluous to add them; for thereby our Saviour wished us to understand that we ought to do as the poor who go begging. If they do not receive the alms they ask (I speak of licensed beggars), they do not cease asking; they return to ask again; and if the master of the house does not show himself any more, they set to work to knock at the door, till they become very importunate and troublesome. That is what God wishes us to do: to pray, and to pray again, and never leave off praying, that he would assist us and succor us, that he would enlighten us and strengthen us, and never allow us to forfeit his grace. The learned Lessius says[2420] that the man cannot be excused from mortal sin who does not pray when he is in sin, or in danger of death; or, again, if he neglects to pray for any notable time, as (he says) for one or two months. But this does not include the time of temptations; because whoever finds himself assailed by any grievous temptation, without doubt sins mortally if he does not have recourse to God in prayer, to ask for assistance to resist it; seeing that otherwise he places himself in a proximate, nay, in a certain, occasion of sin.

WHY GOD DELAYS GRANTING US FINAL PERSERVANCE—CONCLUSION

But, some one will say, since God can give and wishes to give me the grace of perseverance, why does he not give it me all at once, when I ask him?

The holy Fathers assign many reasons:

1. God does not grant it at once, but delays it, first, that he may better prove our confidence.

2. And, further, says St. Augustine, that we may long for it more vehemently. Great gifts, he says, should be greatly desired; for good things soon obtained are not held in the same estimation as those which have been long looked for: "God wills not to give quickly, that you may learn to have great desire for great things; things long desired are pleasanter to obtain, but things soon given are cheapened."[2421]

3. Again, the Lord does so that we may not forget him; if we were already secure of persevering and of being saved, and if we had not continual need of God's help to preserve us in his grace and to save us, we should soon forget God. Want makes the poor keep resorting to the houses of the rich; so God, to draw us to himself, as St. Chrysostom says, and to see us often at his feet, in order that he may thus be able to do us greater good, delays giving us the complete grace of salvation till the hour of our death: "It is not because he rejects our prayers that he delays, but by this contrivance he wishes to make us careful, and to draw us to himself,"[2422] Again, he does so in order that we, by persevering in prayer, may unite ourselves closer to him with the sweet bonds of love: "Prayer," says the same St. Chrysostom, "which is accustomed to converse with God, is no slight bond of love to him."[2423] This continual recurrence to God in prayer, and this confident expectation of the graces which we desire from him, oh, what a great spur and chain is it of love to inflame us, and to bind us more closely to God!

But, till what time have we to pray? Always, says the same saint, till we receive favorable sentence of eternal life; that is to say, till our death: "Do not leave off till you receive."[2424] And he goes on to say that the man who resolves, I will never leave off praying till I am saved, will most certainly be saved: "If you say, I will not give in till I have received, you will assuredly receive."[2425] The Apostle writes that many run for the prize, but that he only receives it who runs till he wins: Know you not that they who run in the race, all run indeed, but one receiveth the prize? So run that you may obtain.[2426] It is not, then, enough for salvation simply to pray; but we must pray always, that we may come to receive the crown which God promises, but promises only to those who are constant in prayer till the end.

So that if we wish to be saved, we must do as David did, who always kept his eyes turned to God, to implore his aid against being overcome by his enemies: My eyes are ever towards the Lord, for He shall pluck my feet out of the snare.[2427] As the devil does not cease continually spreading snares to swallow us up, as St. Peter writes: Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, goeth about, seeking whom he may devour;[2428] so ought we ever to stand with our arms in our hands to defend ourselves from such a foe, and to say, with the royal prophet, I will pursue after my enemies; and I will not turn again till they are consumed.[2429] I will never cease fighting till I see my enemies conquered. But how can we obtain this victory, so important for us, and so difficult? "By most persevering prayers,"[2430] says St. Augustine,—only by prayers, and those most persevering; and till when? As long as the fight shall last. "As the battle is never over," says St. Bonaventure, "so let us never give over asking for mercy."[2431] As we must be always in the combat, so should we be always asking God for aid not to be overcome. Woe, says the Wise Man, to him who in this battle leaves off praying: Woe to them that have lost patience.[2432] We may be saved, the Apostle tells us, but on this condition, if we retain a firm confidence and the glory of hope until the end;[2433] if we are constant in praying with confidence until death.

Let us, then, take courage from the mercy of God, and his promises, and say with the same Apostle, Who then shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or danger, or persecution, or the sword? [2434] Who shall succeed in estranging us from the love of Jesus Christ? Tribulation, perhaps, or the danger of losing the goods of this world? The persecutions of devils or men? The torments inflicted by tyrants? In all these we overcome (it is St. Paul who encourages us), because of Him that hath loved us.[2435] No, he says, no tribulation, no misery, danger, persecution, or torture, shall ever be able to separate us from the love of Jesus Christ; because with God's help we shall overcome all, if we fight for love of him who gave his life for us.[2436]

F. Hippolitus Durazzo, the day when he resolved to relinquish his dignity of prelate at Rome, and to give himself entirely to God by entering the Society of Jesus (which he afterwards did), was so afraid of being faithless by reason of his weakness that he said to God, "Forsake me not, Lord, now that I have given myself wholly to Thee; for pity's sake, do not forsake me!" But he heard the whisper of God in his heart, "Do not thou forsake Me; rather," said God, "do I say to thee, Forsake Me not." And so at last the servant of God, trusting in his goodness and help, concluded, "Then, O my God, Thou wilt not leave me, and I will not leave Thee."[2437]

Finally, if we wish not to be forsaken by God, we ought never to forsake praying to him not to leave us. If we do thus, he will certainly always assist us, and will never allow us to perish, and to be separated from his love. And to this end let us not only take care always to ask for final perseverance, and the graces necessary to obtain it, but let us, at the same time, always by anticipation ask God for grace to go on praying; for this is precisely that great gift which he promised to his elect by the mouth of the prophet: And I will pour out upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and prayers.[2438] Oh, what a great grace is the spirit of prayer; that is, the grace which God confers on a soul to enable it to pray always! Let us, then, never neglect to beg God to give us this grace, and this spirit of continual prayer; because if we pray always, we shall certainly obtain from God perseverance and every other gift which we desire, since his promise of hearing whoever prays to him cannot fail. For we are saved by hope."[2439] With this hope of always praying, we may reckon ourselves saved. "Confidence will give us a broad entrance into this city."[2440] This hope, said Venerable Bede, will give us a safe passage into the city of Paradise.

Part II

Which proves that the Grace of Prayer is given to all, and which treats of the Ordinary Mode in which this Grace operates

INTRODUCTION

TAKING, then, for granted that prayer is necessary for the attainment of eternal life, as we have proved in Part I., chap, i., we should consequently, also, take for granted that every one has sufficient aid from God to enable him actually to pray, without need of any further special grace; and that by prayer he may obtain all other graces necessary to enable him to persevere in keeping the commandments, and so gain eternal life; so that no one who is lost can ever excuse himself by saying that it was through want of the aid necessary for his salvation. For as God, in the natural order, has ordained that man should be born naked, and in want of several things necessary for life, but then has given him hands and intelligence to clothe himself and provide for his other needs; so, in the supernatural order, man is born unable to obtain salvation by his own strength; but God in his goodness grants to every one the grace of prayer, by which he is able to obtain all other graces which he needs in order to keep the commandments and to be saved.

But before I explain this point, I must prove two preliminary propositions. First, that God wills all men to be saved; and therefore that Jesus Christ has died for all. Secondly, that God, on his part, gives to all men the graces necessary for salvation; whereby every one may be saved if he corresponds to them.

Chapter I

GOD WISHES ALL MEN TO BE SAVED, AND THEREFORE CHRIST DIED TO SAVE ALL MEN

I

GOD WISHES ALL MEN TO BE SAVED

GOD loves all things that he has created: For Thou lovest all things that are, and hatest none of the things that Thou hast made.[2441] Now love cannot be idle: "All love has a force of its own, and cannot be idle,"[2442] says St. Augustine. Hence love necessarily implies benevolence, so that the person who loves cannot help doing good to the person beloved whenever there is an opportunity: "Love persuades a man to do those things which he believes to be good for him whom he loves,"[2443] says Aristotle. If, then, God loves all men, he must in consequence will that all should obtain eternal salvation, which is the one and sovereign good of man, seeing that it is the one end for which he was created: You have your fruit unto sanctification; but your end eternal life.[2444]

This doctrine, that God wishes all men to be saved, and that Jesus Christ died for the salvation of all, is now a certain doctrine taught by the Catholic Church, as theologians in common teach, namely, Petavius, Gonet, Gotti, and others, besides Tourneley, who adds, that it is a doctrine all but of faith.[2445]

1. DECISION OF THE CHURCH

With reason, therefore, were the predestinarians condemned, who, among their errors, taught (as may be seen in Noris, Petavius, and more especially in Tourneley) that God does not will all men to be saved; as Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, testifies of them in his first letter, where he says, "The ancient predestinarians asserted that God does not will all men to be saved, but only those who are saved."[2446] These persons were condemned, first in the Council of Arles, A.D. 475, which pronounced "anathema to him that said that Christ did not die for all men, and that he does not will all to be saved."[2447] They were next condemned in the Council of Lyons, A.D. 490, where Lucidus was forced to retract and confess, "I condemn the man who says that Christ did not suffer death for the salvation of all men."[2448] So also in the ninth century, Gotheschalcus, who renewed the same error, was condemned by the Council of Quercy, A.D. 853, in the third article of which it was decided "God wills all men, without exception, to be saved, although all men be not saved;" and in the fourth article: "There is no man for whom Christ did not suffer, although all men be not redeemed by the mystery of his Passion."[2449] The same error was finally condemned in the 12th and 13th Propositions of Quesnel. In the former it was said: "When God wills to save a soul, the will of God is undoubtedly effectual;" in the latter: "All whom God wills to save through Christ are infallibly saved."[2450] These propositions were justly condemned, precisely because they meant that God does not will all men to be saved; since from the proposition that those whom God wills to be saved are infallibly saved, it logically follows that God does not will even all the faithful to be saved, let alone all men.

This was also clearly expressed by the Council of Trent, in which it was said that Jesus Christ died, "that all might receive the adoption of sons," and in chapter iii.: "But though he died for all, yet all do not receive the benefits of his death."[2451] The Council then takes for granted that the Redeemer died not only for the elect, but also for those who, through their own fault, do not receive the benefit of Redemption. Nor is it of any use to affirm that the Council only meant to say that Jesus Christ has given to the world a ransom sufficient to save all men; for in this sense we might say that he died also for the devils. Moreover, the Council of Trent intended here to reprove the errors of those innovators, who, not denying that the blood of Christ was sufficient to save all, yet asserted that in fact it was not shed and given for all; this is the error which the Council intended to condemn when it said that our Saviour died for all. Further, in chapter vi. it says that sinners are put in a fit state to receive justification by hope in God through the merits of Jesus Christ: "They are raised to hope, trusting that God will be merciful to them through Christ."[2452] Now, if Jesus Christ had not applied to all the merits of his Passion, then, since no one (without a special revelation) could be certain of being among the number of those to whom the Redeemer had willed to apply the fruit of his merits, no sinner could entertain such hope, not having the certain and secure foundation which is necessary for hope; namely, that God wills all men to be saved, and will pardon all sinners prepared for it by the merits of Jesus Christ. And this, besides being the error formerly condemned in Baius, who said that Christ had only died for the elect, is also condemned in the fifth proposition of Jansenius: "It is Semi-Pelagianism to say that Christ died or shed his blood for all men."[2453] And Innocent X., in his Constitution of A.D. 1653, expressly declared that to say Christ died for the salvation of the elect only is an impious and heretical proposition.

2. THE CELEBRATED TEXT OF ST. PAUL

On the other hand, both the Scriptures and all the Fathers assure us that God sincerely and really wishes the salvation of all men and the conversion of all sinners, as long as they are in this world. For this we have, first of all, the express text of St. Paul: Who will have all men to be saved, ana to come to the knowledge of the truth.[2454] The sentence of the Apostle is absolute and indicative—God wills all men to be saved. These words in their natural sense declare that God truly wills all men to be saved; and it is a certain rule, received in common by all, that the words in Scripture are not to be distorted to an unnatural sense, except in the sole case when the literal meaning is repugnant to faith or morals. St. Bonaventure writes precisely to our purpose when he says, "We must hold that when the Apostle says, God wills all men to be saved, it is necessary to grant that he does will it."[2455]

It is true that St. Augustine and St. Thomas mention different interpretations which have been given to this text; but both these Doctors understand it to mean a real will of God to save all, without exception.

And concerning St. Augustine, we shall see just now that this was his true opinion; so that St. Prosper protests against attributing to him the supposition that God did not sincerely wish the salvation of all men, and of each individual, as an aspersion on the holy Doctor. Hence the same St. Prosper, who was a most faithful disciple of his, says, "It is most sincerely to be believed and confessed that God wills all men to be saved; since the Apostle (whose very words these are) is particular in commanding that prayers should be made to God for all."[2456]

The argument of the saint is clear, founded on St. Paul's words in the above-cited passage—I beseech therefore, first of all, that prayers should be made for all men;[2457] and then he adds, For this is good and acceptable before God our Saviour, who wills all men to be saved.[2458] So the Apostle wishes us to pray for all, exactly in the same sense that God wishes the salvation of all. St. Chrysostom uses the same argument: "If he wills all to be saved, surely we ought to pray for all. If he desires all to be saved, do you also be of one mind with him."[2459] And if in some passages in his controversy with the Semi-Pelagians, St. Augustine seems to have held a different interpretation of this text, saying that God does not will the salvation of each individual, but only of some, Petavius well observes that here the holy Father speaks only incidentally, not with direct intention; or, at any rate, that he speaks of the grace of that absolute and victorious will (voluntas absoluta et victrix) with which God absolutely wills the salvation of some persons, and of which the saint elsewhere says, "The will of the Almighty is always invincible."[2460]

Let us hear how St. Thomas uses another method of reconciling the opinion of St. Augustine with that of St. John Damascene, who holds that antecedently God wills all and each individual to be saved: "God's first intention is to will all men to be saved, that as good he may make us partakers of his goodness; but after we have sinned, he wills to punish us as just."[2461] On the other hand, St. Augustine (as we have seen) seems in a few passages to think differently. But St. Thomas reconciles these opinions, and says that St. Damascene spoke of the antecedent will of God, by which he really wills all men to be saved, while St. Augustine spoke of the consequent will. He then goes on to explain the meaning of antecedent and consequent will: "Antecedent will is that by which God wills all to be saved; but when all the circumstances of this or that individual are considered, it is found to be good that all men should be saved; for it is good that he who prepares himself, and consents to it, should be saved; but not he who is unwilling and resists, etc. And this is called the consequent will, because it presupposes a foreknowledge of a man's deeds, not as a cause of the act of will, but as a reason for the thing willed and determined."[2462]

So that St. Thomas was also of opinion that God truly wills all men and each individual to be saved. This opinion he reasserts in several other places. On the text—Him that cometh to Me I will not cast out,"[2463] he quotes St. Chrysostom, who makes our Lord say, "If then I was incarnate for the salvation of men, how can I cast them out?" And this is what He means when He says, "Therefore I cast them not out, because I came down from heaven to do My Father's will, who wills all men to be saved."[2464] And again, "God, by his most liberal will, gives (grace) to every one that prepares himself,"—who wills all men to be saved; and therefore the grace of God is wanting to no man, but as far as He is concerned He communicates it to everyone."[2465] Again, he declares the same thing more expressly in his explanation of the text of St. Paul—God wills all men to be saved. "In God," he says, "the salvation of all men, considered in itself, belongs to that class of things which he wishes, and this is his antecedent will; but when the good of justice is taken into consideration, and the rightness of punishing sin, in this sense he does not will the salvation of all, and this is his consequent will."[2466] Here we may see how consistent St. Thomas was in his explanation of antecedent and consequent will; for he here repeats what he had said in the passage quoted a little before. In this place he only adds the comparison of a merchant, who antecedently wills to save all his merchandise; but if a tempest comes on, he willingly throws it overboard, in order to preserve his own life. In like manner, he says, God, considering the iniquity of some persons, wills them to be punished in satisfaction of his justice, and consequently does not will them to be saved; but antecedently, and considered in itself, he wills with a true desire the salvation of all men. So that, as he says in the former passage, God's will to save all men is on his part absolute; it is only conditional on the part of the object willed, that is, if man will correspond to what the right order demands, in order to be saved. "Nor yet," he says, "is there imperfection on the part of God's will, but on the part of the thing willed; because it is not accepted with all the circumstances which are required, in order to be saved in the proper manner."[2467] And he again and more distinctly declares what he means by antecedent and consequent will: "A judge antecedently wishes every man to live, but he consequently wishes a murderer to be hanged; so God antecedently wills every man to be saved, but he consequently wills some to be damned; in consequence, that is, of the exigencies of his justice."[2468]

I have no intention here of blaming the opinion that men are predestined to glory previously to the prevision of their merits; I only say that I cannot understand how those who think that God, without any regard to their merits, has elected some to eternal life, and excluded others, can therefore persuade themselves that he wills all to be saved; unless, indeed, they mean that this will of God is not true and sincere, but rather a hypothetical or metaphorical will. I cannot understand, I say, how it can be maintained that God wills all men to be saved, and to partake of his glory, when the greater part of them have been already excluded from this glory antecedently to any demerit on their part. Petavius says, in defence of his contrary opinion, What was the use of God's giving to all men the desire of eternal happiness, when he had excluded the majority of them from it antecedently to any demerits of theirs? What was the use of Jesus Christ's coming to save all men by his death, when so many poor creatures had been already deprived by God of all benefit therefrom? What was the use of giving them so many means of salvation, when they had been already excluded from the attainment of the end? Therefore, adds Petavius (and this is a most weighty reflection), if this ever was the case, we must say that God, who loves all things that he has created, yet in creating mankind did not love them all, but rather utterly detested the greater part of them, in excluding them from the glory for which he had created them. It is certain that the happiness of a creature consists in the attainment of the end for which it was created. On the other hand, it is certain that God creates all men for eternal life. If, therefore, God, having created some men for eternal life, had thereupon, without regard to their sins, excluded them from it, he would in creating them have utterly hated them without cause, and would have done them the greatest injury they could possibly suffer in excluding them from the attainment of their end, that is, of the glory for which they had been created—"For," says Petavius in a passage which we abridge, "God cannot feel indifferent between love and hatred towards his creatures, especially towards men, whom he either loves to eternal life, or hates to damnation; but it is the greatest evil of man to be alienated from God and to be reprobate; wherefore, if God wills the everlasting destruction of any man's soul, he does not love him, but hates him with the greatest hatred possible, in that kind which transcends the natural order."[2469] And by this eternal ruin or "everlasting destruction," he does not mean the positive damnation which God destines for certain individuals, but simply the exclusion from glory; since in fact, as Tertullian says, of what use would it ever be to us that God had not created us for hell, if in creating us he had separated us from the number of his elect? since the separation from the elect necessarily implies the loss of salvation, and therefore damnation; since there is no mean between them. "For what," says Tertullian, "will be the end of the separated? Will it not be the loss of salvation?"[2470] Whence Petavius concludes—"Wherefore, if God loves every man with a love which is antecedent to their merits, he does not hate his soul, and therefore he does not desire the greatest evil to him."[2471] If, therefore, God loves all men, as is certain, we ought to hold that he wills all to be saved, and that he has never hated any one to such a degree, that he has willed to do him the greatest evils, by excluding him from glory previously to the prevision of his demerits.

I say notwithstanding, and repeat again and again, that I cannot understand it; for this matter of predestination is so profound a mystery, that it made the Apostle exclaim: Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are His judgments, and how unsearchable His ways! For who hath known the mind of the Lord?[2472] We ought to submit ourselves to the will of God, who has chosen to leave this mystery in obscurity to his Church, that we all might humble ourselves under the deep judgments of his divine Providence. And the more, because divine grace, by which alone men can gain eternal life, is dispensed more or less abundantly by God entirely gratuitously, and without any regard to our merits. So that to save ourselves it will always be necessary for us to throw ourselves into the arms of the divine mercy, in order that he may assist us with his grace to obtain salvation, trusting always in his infallible promises to hear and save the man who prays to him.

3. OTHER TEXTS OF SCRIPTURE

But let us return to our point, that God sincerely wills all men to be saved. There are other texts which prove the same thing, as when God says: As I live, saith the Lord, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked man turn from his way and live.[2473] He not only says that he wills not the death, but that he wills the life of a sinner; and he swears, as Tertullian observes, in order that he may be more readily believed in this: "When moreover he swears, saying, as I live, he desires to be believed."[2474]

Further, David says: For wrath is in His indignation, and life in His will.[2475] If he chastises us, he does it because our sins provoke him to indignation; but as to his will, he wills not our death, but our life: Life in His will. St. Basil says about this text, that God wills all to be made partakers of life.[2476] David says elsewhere: Our God is the God of salvation; and of the Lord of the Lord are the issues from death.[2477] On this Bellarmine says: "This is proper to him, this is his nature, our God is a saving God, and his are the issues from death—that is, liberation from it;"[2478] so that it is God's proper nature to save all, and to deliver all from eternal death.

Again, our Lord says: Come to Me, all ye that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you[2479] If he calls all to salvation, then he truly wills all to be saved. Again, St. Peter says: He willeth not that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[2480] He does not will the damnation of any one, but he wills that all should do penance, and so should be saved.

Again, our Lord says: I stand at the gate and knock; if any one will open, I will enter.[2481] Why will you die, O house of Israel? return and live.[2482] What is there that I ought to do more to My vineyard, that I have not done to it?[2483] How often would I have gathered together thy children, as the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and thou wouldst not![2484] How could our Lord have said that he stands knocking at the heart of us sinners? How exhort us so strongly to return to his arms? How reproach us by asking what more he could have done for our salvation? How say that he has willed to receive us as children, if he had not a true will to save all men? Again, St. Luke relates that our Lord, looking over Jerusalem from a distance, and contemplating the destruction of its people because of their sin: Seeing the city, He wept over it.[2485] Why did he weep then, says Theophylact (after St. Chrysostom), seeing the ruin of the Jews, unless it was because he really desired their salvation? Now then, after so many attestations of our Lord, in which he makes known to us that he wills to see all men saved, how can it ever be said that God does not will the salvation of all? "But if these texts of Scripture," says Petavius, "in which God has testified his will in such clear and often-repeated expressions, nay even with tears and with an oath, may be abused and distorted to the very opposite sense,—namely, that God determined to send all mankind (except a few) to perdition, and never had a will to save them, what dogma of faith is so clear as to be safe from similar injury and cavil?"[2486] This great writer says, that to deny that God really wills the salvation of all men is an insult and cavil against the plainest doctrines of the faith. And Cardinal Sfondrati adds: "Those who think otherwise, seem to me to make God a mere stage-god; like those people who pretend to be kings in a play, when indeed they are anything but kings."[2487]

4. GENERAL CONSENT OF THE FATHERS

Moreover, this truth, that God wills all men to be saved, is confirmed by the general consent of the Fathers. There can be no doubt that all the Greek Fathers have been uniform in saying that God wills all and each individual to be saved. So St. Justin, St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Cyril, St. Methodius, and St. Chrysostom, all adduced by Petavius. But let us see what the Latin Fathers say.

St. Jerome: (God) "wills to save all; but since no man is saved without his own will, he wills us to will what is good, that when we have willed, he may also will to fulfil his designs in us;"[2488] and in another place, "God therefore willed to save those who desire (to be saved); and he invited them to salvation, that their will might have its reward; but they would not believe in him."[2489]

St. Hilary: "God would that all men were saved, and not those alone who are to belong to the number of the elect, but all absolutely, so as to make no exception."[2490]

St. Paulinus: "Christ says to all, Come to Me, etc.; for he, the Creator of all men, so far as he is concerned, wills every man to be saved."[2491]

St. Ambrose: "Even with respect to the wicked he had to manifest his will (to save them), and therefore he could not pass over his betrayer, that all might see that in the election even of the traitor he exhibits (his desire) of saving all . . . and, so far as God is concerned, he shows to all that he was willing to deliver all."[2492]

The author of the work known as the Commentaries of St. Ambrose (supposed by Petavius to be Hilary the Deacon) in speaking of the text of St. Paul (Who wills all men,[2493] etc.), asks this question: "But since God wills that all should be saved, as he is Almighty, why are there so many who are not saved?" And he answers: "He wills them to be saved, if they also are willing; for he who gave the law excluded no one from salvation . . . this medicine is of no use to the unwilling."[2494] He says that God has excluded no one from glory, and that he gives grace to all to be saved, but on condition that they are willing to correspond to it; because his grace is of no use to the man who rejects it. St. Chrysostom in like manner asks, "Why then are not all men saved, if God wills all to be saved?" and he answers, "Because every man's will does not coincide with his will, and he forces no man."[2495] St. Augustine: "God wills all men to be saved, but not so as to destroy their free will."[2496] He says the same thing in several other places, which we shall shortly have to produce.

II

JESUS CHRIST DIED TO SAVE ALL MEN

That Jesus Christ, therefore, died for all and each of mankind, is clear, not only from the Scriptures, but from the writings of the Fathers. Great certainly was the ruin which the sin of Adam occasioned to the whole human race; but Jesus Christ, by the grace of Redemption, repaired all the evils which Adam introduced. Hence the Council of Trent has declared that baptism renders the soul pure and immaculate; and that the sin which remains in it is not for its harm, but to enable it to gain a higher crown, if it resists so as not to consent to it: "For in the regenerate God hates nothing . . . they are made innocent, immaculate, pure, and beloved of God. . . . But this holy synod confesses and feels that concupiscence or the fuel (of sin) remains in baptized persons; but as it was left for our probation, it cannot injure those who do not consent to it; nay rather, he who contends lawfully (against it) shall be crowned."[2497] Thus, as St. Leo says, "we have gained greater things by the grace of Christ than we had lost through the envy of the devil."[2498] The gain which we have made by the redemption of Jesus Christ is greater than the loss which we suffered by the sin of Adam. The Apostle plainly declared this when he said, Not as the offence, so also the gift. For where the offence abounded, there did grace more abound.[2499] Our Lord says the same: I am come that they may have life, and have it more abundantly.[2500] David and Isaias had predicted it: With Him is plentiful redemption.—She hath received of the hand of the Lord double for all her sins.[2501] About which words the interpreter says: "God has so forgiven iniquities through Christ, that men have received double—that is, very much greater good, instead of the punishment of sin which they deserved."[2502]

Now that our Saviour, as I said, died for all, and that he offered the work of his redemption to the Eternal Father for the salvation of each one, the holy Scriptures assure us of the following:

1. THE TESTIMONY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

The Son of Man came to save that which was lost.[2503] Who gave Himself a redemption for all.[2504] Christ died for all, that they also who live may not now live to themselves, but to Him who died for them.[2505] For hereunto we labor and are reviled, because we hope in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of the faithful.[2506] And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world.[2507] For the charity of Christ presseth us, judging this that, if one died for all, then all were dead.[2508] And to speak only of this last text, I ask, how could the Apostle ever have concluded that all were dead, because Christ died for all, unless he had been certain that Christ had really died for all? And the more, because St. Paul uses this truth as an argument for the love which it should kindle in us towards our Saviour. But by far the best passage to exhibit the desire and wish which God has to save all men, is another text of St. Paul: He that spared not His own son, but delivered Him for us all.[2509] The force of this passage is increased by what follows: How hath He not also with Him given us all things.[2510] If God has given us all things, how can we henceforth fear that he has denied us the election to glory, always on condition that we correspond (to his grace)? And if he has given us his Son, says Cardinal Sfondrati, how will he deny us the grace to be saved? "Here he clearly instructs us" (he is speaking of St. Paul) "that God assures us that he will not refuse us the less after he has given the greater; that he will not deny us grace to save ourselves, after giving his Son that we might be saved."[2511] And in truth, how could St. Paul have said that God, in giving us his Son, has given us all things, if the Apostle had believed that God had excluded many from the glory which is the one good and the one end for which they were created? Has then God given "all things" to these "many," and yet denied them the best thing—namely, eternal happiness, without which (as there is no middle way) they cannot but be eternally miserable? Unless we would say another thing still more unseemly, as another learned author well observes—namely, that God gives to all the grace to attain glory, but then refuses to allow many to enter on its enjoyment; that he gives the means, and refuses the end.

2. THE TEACHING OF THE HOLY FATHERS

For the rest, all the holy Fathers agree in saying that Jesus Christ died to obtain eternal salvation for all men.

St. Jerome: "Christ died for all; he was the only one who could be offered for all, because all were dead in sins."[2512]

St. Ambrose: "Christ came to cure our wounds; but since all do not search for the remedy . . . therefore he cures those who are willing; he does not force the unwilling."[2513] In another place: "He has provided for all men the means of cure, that whoever perishes may lay the blame of his death on himself, because he would not be cured when he had a remedy; and that, on the other hand, the mercy of Christ to all may be openly proclaimed, who wills that all men should be saved."[2514] And more clearly still in another place: "Jesus did not write his will for the benefit of one, or of few, but of all; we are all inscribed therein as his heirs; the legacy is in common, and belongs by right to all; the universal heritage, belonging wholly to each."[2515] Mark the words, "We are all inscribed as heirs; the Redeemer has written us all down as heirs of heaven."[2516]

St. Leo: "As Christ found no one free from guilt, so he came to deliver all."[2517]

St. Augustine, on the words of St. John, For God did not send His Son to judge the world, but that the world might be saved through Him,[2518] says: "So, as far as it lies with the physician, he came to heal the sick man."[2519] Mark the words, "as far as it lies with the physician." For God, as far as he is concerned, effectually wills the salvation of all, but (as St. Augustine goes on to say) cannot heal the man who will not be healed: "He heals universally, but he heals not the unwilling.[2520] For what can be happier for thee, than, as thou hast thy life in thy hands, so to have thy health depend on thy will?"[2521] When he says "He heals," he speaks of sinners who are sick, and unable to get well by their own strength; when he says "universally" (omnino), he declares that nothing is wanting on God's part for sinners to be healed and saved. Then when he says, "as thou hast thy life in thy hands, so thy health depends on thy will," he shows that God for his part really wills us all to be saved; otherwise, it would not be in our power to obtain health and eternal life. In another place, "He who redeemed us at such a cost, wills not that we perish; for he does not purchase in order to destroy, but he redeems in order to give life."[2522] He has redeemed us all, in order to save us all. And hence he encourages all to hope for eternal bliss in that celebrated sentence: "Let human frailty raise itself; let it not say, I shall never be happy. . . . It is a greater thing that Christ has done, than that which he has promised. What has he done? He has died for thee. What has he promised? That thou shalt live with him."[2523]

Some have pretended to say that Jesus Christ, offered his blood for all, in order to obtain grace for them, but not salvation. But Petrocorensis will not hear of this opinion, of which he says: "O disputatious frivolity! How could the wisdom of God will the means of salvation, without willing its end."[2524] St. Augustine, moreover, speaking against the Jews, says: "Ye acknowledge the side which ye pierced, that it was opened both by you and for you."[2525] If Jesus Christ had not really given his blood for all, the Jews might have answered St. Augustine, that it was quite true they had opened the side of our Saviour, but not that it was opened for them.

In like manner. St. Thomas has no doubt that Jesus Christ died for all; whence he deduces that he wills all to be saved: "Christ Jesus is mediator between God and men; not between God and some men, but between him and all men; and this would not be, unless he willed all to be saved."[2526] This is confirmed, as we have already said, by the condemnation of the fifth proposition of Jansenius, who said, "It is semi-Pelagianism to assert that Christ died or shed his blood for all men."[2527] The sense of this, according to the context of the other condemned propositions, and according to the principles of Jansenius, is as follows: Jesus Christ did not die to merit for all men the graces sufficient for salvation, but only for the predestined; or, in Jansenius's own expressed words, "It is in no way consonant to the principles of Augustine, to think that Christ our Lord died or shed his blood for the eternal salvation either of unbelievers, who die in their unbelief, or of the just, who do not persevere."[2528] Therefore the contrary and Catholic belief is as follows: It is not semi-Pelagianism, but it is right to say that Jesus Christ died to merit not only for the predestinate, but for all, even for the reprobate, grace sufficient to obtain eternal salvation in the ordinary course of Providence.

Further, that God truly, on his part, wills all men to be saved, and that Jesus Christ died for the salvation of all, is certified to us by the fact that God imposes on us all the precept of hope. The reason is clear. St. Paul calls Christian hope the anchor of the soul, secure and firm: Who have fled for refuge to hold fast the hope set before us which we have as an anchor of the soul, sure and firm.[2529] Now in what could we fix this sure and firm anchor of our hope, except in the truth that God wills all to be saved? "With what confidence," says Petrocorensis, "will men be able to hope for God's mercy, if it is not certain that God wills the salvation of all of them? With what confidence will they offer the death of Christ to God, in order to obtain pardon, if it is uncertain whether he was offered up for them?"[2530] And Cardinal Sfondrati says, that if God had elected some to eternal life, and excluded others, we should have a greater motive to despair than to hope; seeing that, in fact, the elect are much fewer than the damned: "No one could have a firm hope, since he would have more grounds of despair than of hope; for the reprobate are much more numerous than the elect."[2531] And if Jesus Christ had not died for the salvation of all, how could we have a sure ground to hope for salvation through the merits of Jesus Christ, without a special revelation? But St. Augustine had no doubt when he said, "All my hope, and the certainty of my faith, is in the precious blood of Christ, which was shed for us and for our salvation."[2532] Thus the saint placed all his hope in the blood of Jesus Christ; because the faith assured him that Christ died for all. But we shall have a better opportunity of examining this question of hope in chapter iii., where we shall establish the principal point—namely, that the grace of prayer is given to all.

III

CHILDREN WHO DIE WITHOUT BAPTISM

Here it only remains for us to answer the objection which is drawn from children being lost when they die before baptism, and before they come to the use of reason. If God wills all to be saved, it is objected, how is it that these children perish without any fault of their own, since God gives them no assistance to attain eternal salvation? There are two answers to this objection, the latter more correct than the former. I will state them briefly.

First, it is answered that God, by antecedent will, wishes all to be saved, and therefore has granted universal means for the salvation of all; but these means at times fail of their effect, either by reason of the unwillingness of some persons to avail themselves of them, or because others are unable to make use of them, on account of secondary causes (such as the death of children), whose course God is not bound to change, after having disposed the whole according to the just judgment of his general Providence; all this is collected from what St. Thomas says. Jesus Christ offered his merits for all men, and instituted baptism for all; but the application of this means of salvation, so far as relates to children who die before the use of reason, is not prevented by the direct will of God, but by a merely permissive will; because as he is the general provider of all things, he is not bound to disturb the general order, to provide for the particular order.

The second answer is, that to perish is not the same as not to be blessed: since eternal happiness is a gift entirely gratuitous; and therefore the want of it is not a punishment. The opinion, therefore, of St. Thomas is very just, that children who die in infancy have neither the pain of sense nor the pain of loss; not the pain of sense, he says, "because pain of sense corresponds to conversion to creatures; and in original sin there is not conversion to creatures" (as the fault is not our own), "and therefore pain of sense is not due to original sin;" because original sin does not imply an act.[2533] Objectors oppose to this the teaching of St. Augustine, who in some places shows that his opinion was that children are condemned even to the pain of sense. But in another place he declares that he was very much confused about this point. These are his words: "When I come to the punishment of infants, I find myself (believe me) in great straits; nor can I at all find anything to say."[2534] And in another place he writes, that it may be said that such children receive neither reward nor punishment: "Nor need we fear that it is impossible there should be a middle sentence between reward and punishment; since their life was midway between sin and good works."[2535] This was directly affirmed by St. Gregory Nazianzen: "Children will be sentenced by the just judge neither to the glory of heaven nor to punishment."[2536] St. Gregory of Nyssa was of the same opinion: "The premature death of children shows that they who have thus ceased to live will not be in pain and unhappiness."[2537]

And as far as relates to the pain of loss, although these children are excluded from glory, nevertheless St. Thomas,[2538] who had reflected most deeply on this point, teaches that no one feels pain for the want of that good of which he is not capable; so that as no man grieves that he cannot fly, or no private person that he is not emperor, so these children feel no pain at being deprived of the glory of which they were never capable; since they could never pretend to it either by the principles of nature, or by their own merits. St. Thomas adds, in another place,[2539] a further reason, which is, that the supernatural knowledge of glory comes only by means of actual faith, which transcends all natural knowledge; so that children can never feel pain for the privation of that glory, of which they never had a supernatural knowledge. He further says, in the former passage, that such children will not only not grieve for the loss of eternal happiness, but will, moreover, have pleasure in their natural gifts; and will even in some way enjoy God, so far as is implied in natural knowledge, and in natural love: "Rather will they rejoice in this, that they will participate much in the divine goodness, and in natural perfections."[2540] And he immediately adds, that although they will be separated from God, as regards the union of glory, nevertheless "they will be united with him by participation of natural gifts; and so will even be able to rejoice in him with a natural knowledge and love."[2541]

Chapter II

GOD COMMONLY GIVES TO ALL THE JUST THE GRACE NECESSARY FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE COMMANDMENTS, AND TO ALL SINNERS THE GRACE NECESSARY FOR CONVERSION

I

PROOFS

IF then God wills all to be saved, it follows that he gives to all that grace and those aids which are necessary for the attainment of salvation, otherwise it could never be said that he has a true will to save all. "The effect of the antecedent will," says St. Thomas, "by which God wills the salvation of all men, is that order of nature the purpose of which is our salvation, and likewise those things which conduce to that end, and which are offered to all in common, whether by nature or by grace."[2542] It is certain, in contradiction to the blasphemies of Luther and Calvin, that God does not impose a law that is impossible to be observed. On the other hand, it is certain, that without the assistance of grace the observance of the law is impossible; as Innocent I. declared against the Pelagians when he said, "It is certain, that as we overcome by the aid of God, so without his aid we must be overcome."[2543] Pope Celestine declared the same thing. Therefore, if God gives to all men a possible law, it follows that he also gives to all men the grace necessary to observe it, whether immediately, or mediately, by means of prayer, as the Council of Trent has most clearly defined: "God does not command impossibilities; but by commanding he admonishes you both to do what you can, and to ask for that which is beyond your power, and by his help enables you to do it."[2544] Otherwise, if God refused us both the proximate and remote grace to enable us to fulfil the law, either the law would have been given in vain, or sin would be necessary, and if necessary would be no longer sin, as we shall shortly prove at some length.

1. TEACHING OF THE FATHERS OF THE GREEK CHURCH

And this is the general opinion of the Greek Fathers:

St. Cyril of Alexandria says: "But if a man endowed as others, and equally with them, with the gifts of divine grace, has fallen by his own free will, how shall Christ be said not to have saved even him, since he delivered the man, since he gave him the necessary aid to avoid sin."[2545] How, says the saint, can that sinner, who has received the assistance of grace equally with those who remained faithful, and has of his own accord chosen to sin, how can he blame Jesus Christ, who has, as far as he is concerned, delivered him by means of the assistance granted to him? St. John Chrysostom asks: "How is it that some are vessels of wrath, others vessels of mercy?" And he answers, "Because of each person's free will; for, since God is very good, he manifests equal kindness to all."[2546] Then, speaking of Pharaoh, whose heart is said in Scripture to have been hardened, he adds, "If Pharaoh was not saved, it must all be attributed to his will, since no less was given to him than to those who were saved."[2547] And in another place, speaking of the petition of the mother of Zebedee's sons, on the words, "It is not mine to give, etc.,"[2548] he observes: "By this Christ wished to show that it was not simply his to give, but that it also belonged to the combatants to take; for if it depended only on himself, all men would be saved."[2549]

St. Isidore of Pelusium: "For God wills seriously, and in all ways, to assist those who are wallowing in vice, that he may deprive them of all excuse."[2550]

St. Cyril of Jerusalem: "God has opened the gate of eternal life, so that, as far as he is concerned, all may gain it without anything to hinder them."[2551]

But the doctrine of these Greek Fathers does not suit Jansenius, who has the temerity to say that they have spoken most imperfectly on grace: "None have spoken in grace more imperfectly than the Greeks."[2552] In matters of grace, then, are we not to follow the teaching of the Greek Fathers, who were the first masters and columns of the Church? Perhaps the doctrine of the Greeks, especially in this important matter, was different from that of the Latin Church? On the contrary, it is certain that the true doctrine of faith came from the Greek to the Latin Church; so that, as St. Augustine wrote against Julian, who opposed to him the authority of the Greek Fathers, there can be no doubt that the faith of the Latins is the same as that of the Greeks. Whom, then, are we to follow? Shall we follow Jansenius, whose errors have already been condemned as heretical by the Church; who had the audacity to say that even the just have not the grace requisite to enable them to keep certain precepts; and that man merits and demerits, even though he acts through necessity, provided he is not forced by violence; these and all his other errors springing from his most false system of the delectation relatively victorious, of which we shall speak at length when we confute him in chapter iii.

2. TEACHING OF THE FATHERS OF THE LATIN CHURCH

But since the Greek Fathers do not satisfy Jansenius, let us see what the Latins say on this subject. But they in no wise differ from the Greeks.

St. Jerome says, "Man can do no good work without God, who, in giving free will, did not refuse his grace to aid every single work."[2553] Mark the words "did not refuse his grace for every single work." St. Ambrose: "He would never come and knock at the door, unless he wished to enter; it is our fault that he does not always enter."[2554] St. Leo: "Justly does he insist on the command, since he furnishes beforehand aid to keep it."[2555] St. Hilary: "Now the grace of justification has abounded through one gift to all men."[2556] Innocent I.: "He gives to man daily remedies; and unless we put confidence in them and depend upon them, we shall never be able to overcome human errors."[2557]

St. Augustine: "It is not imputed to you as a sin if you are ignorant against your will, but if you neglect to learn that of which you are ignorant. Nor is it imputed as a sin that you do not bind up your wounded limbs, but (mark this) that you despise him who is willing to cure you. These are your own sins; for no man is deprived of the knowledge of how to seek with benefit to himself." In another place: "Therefore if the soul is ignorant what it is to do, it proceeds from this, that it has not yet learned; but it will receive this knowledge if it has made a good use of what it has already received; for it has received in this that it can piously and diligently seek, if it will;" (mark the words) "it has received power to seek piously and diligently."[2558] So that every one receives at least the remote grace to seek; and if he makes good use of this, he will receive the proximate grace to perform that which at first he could not do. St. Augustine founds all this on the principle, that no man sins in doing that which he cannot help; therefore, if a man sins in anything, he sins in that he might have avoided it by the grace of God, which is wanting to no man: "Who sins in that which cannot in any way be helped? but a man does sin, therefore it might have been helped."[2559] "But only by his aid, who cannot be deceived."[2560] An evident reason, by which it becomes quite clear (as we shall have to show further on, when we speak of the sin of the obstinate), that if the grace necessary to observe the commandments were wanting, there would be no sin.

St. Thomas teaches the same in several places. In one place, in explaining the text, Who wills all men to be saved,[2561] he says, "and therefore grace is wanting to no man, but (as far as God is concerned) is communicated to all; as the sun is present even to the blind."[2562] So that as the sun sheds its light upon all, and only those are deprived of it who voluntarily blind themselves to its rays, so God communicates to all men grace to observe the law; and men are lost simply because they will not avail themselves of it. In another place: "It belongs to divine Providence to provide all men with what is necessary to salvation, if only there be no impediment on man's part."[2563] If, then, God gives all men the graces necessary for salvation, and if actual grace is necessary to overcome temptations, and to observe the commandments, we must necessarily conclude that he gives all men either immediately or mediately actual grace to do good; and when mediately, no further grace is necessary to enable them to put in practice the means (such as prayer) of obtaining actual proximate grace. In another place, on the words of St. John's Gospel, No man cometh to Me, etc.,[2564] he says, "If the heart of man be not lifted up, it is from no defect on the part of Him who draws it, who as far as He is concerned, never fails; but from an impediment caused by him who is being drawn."[2565]

Scotus says the same: "God wills to save all men, so far as rests with him, and with his antecedent will, by which he has given them the ordinary gifts necessary to salvation."[2566] The Council of Cologne in 1536: "Although no one is converted except he is drawn by the Father, yet let no one pretend to excuse himself on the plea of not being drawn. He stands at the gate, and knocks by the internal and the external Word."[2567]

3. TESTIMONY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

Nor did the Fathers speak without warrant of the Holy Scriptures; for God in several places most clearly assures us that he does not neglect to assist us with his grace, if we are willing to avail ourselves of it either for perseverance, if we are in a state of justification, or for conversion, if we are in sin.

I stand at the gate and knock; if any man shall hear My voice and open to Me the gate, I will come in to him.[2568] Bellarmine reasons well on this text, that our Lord who knows that man cannot open without his grace, would knock in vain at the door of his heart, unless he had first conferred on him the grace to open when he will. This is exactly what St. Thomas teaches in explaining the text; he says that God gives every one the grace necessary for salvation, that he may correspond to it if he will: "God by his most liberal will gives grace to every one that prepares himself: Behold I stand at the door and knock.[2569] And therefore the grace of God is wanting to no one, but communicates itself to all men, as far as it is concerned."[2570] In another place he says, "It is the business of God's Providence to provide every one with what is necessary to salvation." So that as St. Ambrose says: The Lord knocks at the gate, because he truly wishes to enter; if he does not enter, or if after entering he does not remain in our souls, it is because we prevent him from entering, or drive him out when he has entered: "Because he comes and knocks at the door, he always wishes to enter; but it is through us that he does not always go in, nor always remain."[2571]

What is there that I ought to do more to My vineyard that I have not done to it? Was it that I expected that it should bring forth grapes, and it hath brought forth wild grapes?[2572] Bellarmine says on these words, "If he had not given the power to bring forth grapes, how could God say, I expected?[2573] And if God had not given to all men the grace necessary for salvation, he could not have said to the Jews, What is there that I ought to have done more? for they could have answered, that if they had not yielded fruit, it was for lack of necessary assistance. Bellarmine says the same on the words of our Lord: How often would I have gathered together thy children, and thou wouldst not?[2574] "How did he wish to be sought for by the unwilling unless he helps them that they may be able to be willing?"[2575]

We have received Thy mercy, O God, in the midst of Thy temple.[2576] On this St. Bernard observes: "Mercy is in the midst of the temple, not in any hole and corner, because there is no acceptance of persons with God;[2577] it is placed in public, it is offered to all, and no one is without it, except he who refuses it."[2578]

Or despisest thou the riches of His goodness? Knowest thou not that the benignity of God leadeth thee to penance?[2579] You see that it is through his own malice that the sinner is not converted, because he despises the riches of the divine goodness which calls him, and never ceases to move him to conversion by his grace. God hates sin; but at the same time never ceases to love the sinful soul while it remains on earth, and always gives it the assistance it requires for salvation: But Thou sparest all, because they are Thine, O Lord, who lovest souls. [2580] Hence we see, says Bellarmine, that God does not refuse grace to resist temptations to any sinner, however obstinate and blinded he may be: "Assistance to avoid new sin is always at hand for all men, either immediately or mediately (i.e., by means of prayer), so that they may ask further aid from God, by the help of which they will avoid sin."[2581] Here we may quote what God says by Ezechiel: As I live, saith the Lord God, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live.[2582] St. Peter says the same: He beareth patiently for your sakes, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance.[2583] If, therefore, God wishes that all should actually be converted, it must necessarily be held that he gives to all the grace which they need for actual conversion.

II

OBSTINATE OR HARDENED SINNERS, AND THE ABANDONMENT OF THEM BY GOD

I know well that there are theologians who maintain that God refuses to certain obstinate sinners even sufficient grace. And, among others, they avail themselves of a position of St. Thomas, who says: "But although they who are in sin cannot through their own power avoid putting or interposing an obstacle to grace, unless they are prevented by grace, as we have shown; nevertheless, this also is imputed to them as a sin, because this defect is left in them from previous sin—as a drunken man is not excused from murder committed in that drunkenness which was incurred by his own fault. Besides, although he who is in sin has not this in his own power that he altogether avoid sin, yet he has power at this present moment to avoid this or that sin, as has been said; so that whatever he commits, he commits voluntarily; and therefore it is properly imputed to him as sin."[2584] From this they gather that St. Thomas intends to say that sinners can indeed avoid particular sins, but not all sins; because in punishment for sins previously committed they are deprived of all actual grace.

But we answer that here St. Thomas is not speaking of actual, but of habitual or sanctifying, grace, without which the sinner cannot keep himself long from falling into new sins, as he teaches in several places.[2585] And that he means the same in the passage just quoted is clear from the context, which we must here transcribe, in order to understand the true meaning of the saint.

In the first place, the title of chapter clx., where the quotation occurs, is as follows: "That man, when he is in sin, cannot avoid sin without grace." The very title shows that St. Thomas intended no more than he has said in the other places which we have referred to.

Moreover, in the course of the chapter he says: "For when the mind of man has declined from the state of uprightness, it is manifest that it has fallen from its relation, 'order' (ordo), to its true end. . . . Whensoever, therefore, anything shall have occurred to the mind conducive to the inordinate end, but improper for the true end, it will be chosen, unless the mind be brought back to its due relation, so as to prefer its true end to all others; and this is the effect of grace. But while anything repugnant to our last end is the object of our choice, it puts a hindrance in the way of the grace which conducts us to that end; whence it is manifest that, after sinning, man cannot altogether abstain from sin, before he is brought back by grace to the due order. And hence the opinion of the Pelagians is shown to be absurd, that man, being in sin, can without grace avoid (fresh) sin."[2586] And then he goes on with the sentence quoted above: "But although they,"[2587] etc., of which our opponents make use.

So that, in the first place, the intention of St. Thomas is not to prove that some sinners are deprived of all actual grace, and therefore, being unable to avoid all sin, they do commit sin, and are worthy of punishment; but his intention is to prove against the Pelagians that a man who remains without sanctifying grace cannot abstain from sinning. And we see that he is here certainly speaking of sanctifying grace, for this is that which alone brings the soul back to the right order. It is of this same sanctifying grace that he intends to speak, when he says immediately after, "Except he be prevented by the assistance of grace;"[2588] by which he means that if the sinner is not prevented—that is, is not previously informed (informato)—by grace, and brought back to the right order of holding God to be his last end, he cannot avoid committing fresh sins. And this is the meaning of the Thomists—for instance, of Ferrariensis (Silvestre) and Father Gonet—in their comments on this passage. But, without having recourse to other authors, it is quite clear from what St. Thomas himself says in his Summa, where he discusses the same point, and brings forward the identical reasons in the same words as in the 160th chapter of his book Contra Gentes; and there he expressly says that he is only speaking of habitual or sanctifying grace.

And it is impossible that the holy Doctor could have meant otherwise, since he elsewhere teaches that, on the one hand, God's grace is never wanting to any one, as he says in his commentary on St. John: "But lest you might suppose that this effect was consequent on the removal of the true light, the Evangelist, to obviate this opposition, adds, that was the true light which enlightens every man. For the Word enlightens, so far as he is concerned, because on his part he is wanting to no one, but wishes all men to be saved. But if any one is not enlightened, this is the fault of the man who turns himself away from the light that would enlighten him."[2589] And, on the other hand, he teaches that there is no sinner so lost and abandoned by grace as not to be able to lay aside his obstinacy, and to unite himself to the will of God, which he certainly cannot do without the assistance of grace: "During this life there is no man who cannot lay aside obstinacy of mind, and so conform to the divine will."[2590] In another place he says, "So long as the use of free will remains to a man in this life . . . he can prepare himself for grace by being sorry for his sins."[2591] But no one can make an act of sorrow for sin without grace. In another place he says, "No man in this life can be so obstinate in evil but that it is possible for him to co-operate to his own deliverance."[2592] "To co-operate" necessarily implies grace to co-operate with.

In another place he observes, on the text of St. Paul, He wills all to be saved.[2593] "Therefore the grace of God is wanting to no man; but, as far as it is concerned, it communicates itself to all."[2594] Again, on the same words, "God, so far as he is concerned, is prepared to give grace to all men. . . . Those, therefore, only are deprived of grace who permit a hindrance to grace to exist in themselves; and, therefore, they cannot be excused if they sin."[2595] And when St. Thomas says, "God is prepared to give grace to all,"[2596] he does not mean actual grace, but only sanctifying grace.

Cardinal Gotti justly contradicts those who say that God keeps ready at hand the aids necessary for salvation, but in matter of fact does not give them to all. Of what use would it be to a sick man (says this learned author) if the physician only kept the remedies ready, and then would not apply them? Then he concludes (quite to the point of our argument) that we must necessarily say, "God not only offers, but also confers on every individual, even on infidels and hardened sinners, help sufficient to observe the commandments, whether it be proximate or remote."[2597]

For the rest, St. Thomas says that it is only the sins of the devils and the damned that cannot be wiped out by penance; but, on the other hand, "to say that there is any sin in this life of which a man cannot repent is erroneous . . . because this doctrine would derogate from the power of grace."[2598] If grace were wanting to any one, certainly he could not repent. Moreover, as we have already seen, St. Thomas expressly teaches in several places, and especially in his comment on Heb. 12, that God, as far as he is concerned, refuses to no man the grace necessary for conversion: "The grace of God is wanting to no man; but, as far as it is concerned, communicates itself to all."[2599] So that the learned author of the Theology for the use of the seminary of Peterkau says, "It is a calumny to impute to St. Thomas that he taught that any sinners were totally deserted by God."[2600]

Bellarmine makes a sound distinction on this point, and says that for avoiding fresh sins every sinner has at all times sufficient assistance, at least mediately: "The necessary and sufficient assistance for the avoidance of sin is given by God's goodness to all men at all times, either immediately or mediately. . . . We say or mediately because it is certain that some men have not that help by which they can immediately avoid sin, but yet have the help which enables them to obtain from God greater safeguards, by the assistance of which they will avoid sins."[2601] But for the grace of conversion, he says that this is not given at all times to the sinner; but that no one will be ever so far left to himself "as to be surely and absolutely deprived of God's help through all this life, so as to have cause to despair of salvation."[2602]

And so say the theologians who follow St. Thomas—thus Soto: "I am absolutely certain, and I believe that all the holy Doctors who are worthy of the name were always most positive, that no one was ever deserted by God in this mortal life."[2603] And the reason is evident; for if the sinner was quite abandoned by grace, either his sins afterwards committed could no longer be imputed to him, or he would be under an obligation to do that which he had no power to fulfil; but it is a positive rule of St. Augustine that there is never a sin in that which cannot be avoided: "No one sins in that which can by no means be avoided."[2604] And this is agreeable to the teaching of the Apostle: But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be templed above that which you are able; but will also make with the temptation issue, that you may be able to bear it.[2605] The word "issue" means the divine assistance, which God always gives to the tempted to enable them to resist, as St. Cyprian explains it: "He will make with the temptation a way of escape."[2606] And Primasius more clearly: "He will so order the issue that we shall be able to endure; that is, in temptation he will strengthen you with the help of his grace, so that ye may be able to bear it."[2607] St. Augustine and St. Thomas go so far as to say that God would be unjust and cruel if he obliged any one to a command which he could not keep. St. Augustine says, "It is the deepest injustice to reckon any one guilty of sin for not doing that which he could not do.[2608] And St. Thomas: "God is not more cruel than man; but it is reckoned cruelty in a man to oblige a person by law to do that which he cannot fulfil; therefore we must by no means imagine this of God."[2609] "It is, however, different," he says, "when it is through his own neglect that he has not the grace to be able to keep the commandments,"[2610] which properly means, when man neglects to avail himself of the remote grace of prayer, in order to obtain the proximate grace to enable him to keep the law, as the Council of Trent teaches: "God does not command impossibilities; but by commanding admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for that which is beyond your power; and by his help enables you to do it."[2611]

St. Augustine repeats his decision in many other places that there is no sin in what cannot be avoided. In one he says, "Whether there be iniquity or whether there be justice, if it was not in the man's power, there can be no just reward, no just punishment."[2612] Elsewhere he says, "Finally, if no power is given them to abstain from their works, we cannot hold that they sin."[2613] Again, "The devil, indeed, suggests; but with the help of God it is in our power to choose or to refuse his suggestions. And so, when by God's help it is in your power, why do you not rather determine to obey God than him?"[2614] Again, "No one, therefore, is answerable for what he has not received."[2615] Again, "No one is worthy of blame for not doing that which he cannot do."[2616]

Other Fathers have taught the same doctrine. So St. Jerome, "We are not forced by necessity to be either virtuous or vicious; for where there is necessity, there is neither condemnation nor crown."[2617] Tertullian: "For a law would not be given to him who had it not in his power to observe it duly."[2618] Marcus the Hermit: "Hidden grace assists us; but it depends on us to do or not to do good according to ourstrength."[2619] So also St. Irenæus, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Chrysostom, and others.

Nor is there any difficulty in what St. Thomas says, that grace is denied to some persons, in punishment of original sin: "To whomsoever the assistance of grace is given, it is given through simple mercy; but from those to whom it is not given, it is withheld justly in punishment of previous sin, or at least of original sin, as Augustine says."[2620] For, as Cardinal Gotti well observes, St. Augustine and St. Thomas are speaking of actual proximate grace to satisfy the precepts of faith and charity, of which, indeed, St. Thomas is speaking in this place; but, for all this, they do not intend to deny that God gives every man interior grace, by means of which he may at any rate obtain by prayer the grace of faith and of salvation; since, as we have already seen, these holy Doctors do not doubt that God grants to every man at least remote grace to satisfy the precepts. Here we may add the authority of St. Prosper, who says, "All men enjoy some measure of heavenly teaching; and though the measure of grace be small, it is sufficient to be a remedy for some, and to be a testimony for all."[2621]

Nor could it be understood otherwise; for if it were true that any had sinned for want of even remote sufficient grace, withheld through original sin being imputed to them as a fault, it would follow that the liberty of will, which by a figure of speech we are said to have had in the sin of Adam, would be sufficient to make us actual sinners. But this cannot be said, as it is expressly condemned in the first proposition of Michael Baius, who said, "That liberty which caused sin to be voluntary and free in its cause—namely, in original sin, and in the liberty of Adam when sinning—is sufficient to (cause) formal sin (in us), and to make us deserve punishment."[2622] Against this proposition we may make use of what Bellarmine said,[2623] that to commit a personal sin distinct from the sin of Adam a new exertion of free will is requisite, and a free will distinct from that of Adam, otherwise there is no distinct sin; according to the doctrine of St. Thomas, who teaches, "For a personal sin, absolute personal liberty is requisite."[2624] Further, with respect to the baptized, the Council of Trent has declared that in them there remains nothing to condemn: "God hates nothing in the regenerate; for there is no condemnation to them who are truly buried with Christ by baptism unto death."[2625] And it is added that concupiscence is not left in us as a punishment, "but for our trial; and it cannot harm those who do not consent to it."[2626] On the contrary, the concupiscence left in us would do exceedingly great harm to man if on account of it, God denied him even the remote grace necessary to obtain salvation.

From all this, several theologians conclude that to say that God refuses to any one sufficient help to enable him to keep the commandments would be contrary to the faith, because in that case God would oblige us to impossibilities. So says F. Nuñez: "God never refused aid sufficient to keep the commandments, otherwise they could not be in any way fulfilled; and thus we should have the heresy of Luther back again, that God has obliged men to impossibilities."[2627] And in another place, "It is of faith, so that the opposite doctrine is a manifest heresy, that every man, while he is alive, can do penance for his sins."[2628] And Father Ledesma, "It is a certain truth of faith, that that is not sin which is not in the free power of man."[2629]

Giovenino says that the sinner becomes guilty through the exercise of free will, in choosing voluntarily this or that sin; though at the time he is necessitated to sin, because he is without actual grace sufficient to deliver him from all sin. But this doctrine, that a man when fallen sins, not having liberty to do otherwise than to choose what sin he will commit, and is necessitated to commit some sin, justly offends Monseigneur de Saléon, Archbishop of Vienne, who, in his book Jansenismus Redivins, writes as follows: "Who will endure to hear that a man once fallen, being deprived of grace, can enjoy no other liberty than that of choosing one sin rather than another, being necessitated to sin in some way."[2630] So that a criminal condemned to death, who has no other liberty allowed him than to choose whether he will die by the sword, by poison, or by fire, may be said, when he has made his choice, to die a voluntary and free death. And how can sin be imputed to a man who must sin in some way or another? The 67th of the condemned Propositions of Baius is as follows: "Man sins damnably even in that which he does through necessity."[2631] How can there be liberty, where there is necessity to sin? Jansenius answers, that the liberty of will, which by a figure of speech we are said to have had in Adam's sin, is sufficient to make us sinners. But this too was condemned in Baius' first proposition, "That liberty;" etc., as we have seen above.

Our opponents go on to say that though the sinner abandoned by grace cannot avoid all mortal sins collectively, yet he can avoid each sin distributively, or individually, "by a simple suspension or negation of activity,"[2632] as they say. But this cannot be admitted, for several reasons. First, because when a vehement temptation is assailing us, which it requires much strength to resist, it cannot morally be overcome (as all theologians agree) except by the assistance of grace, or else by yielding to another, but opposite, vicious passion; so that a sinner deprived of grace would be irremediably necessitated to sin in one or the other way; which it is horrible to affirm, as we have already shown. Secondly, when we are urged by a great concupiscence to sin in a particular way, there is not always—nay, it seldom happens that there is—another improper motive urging us to the contrary course, of sufficient force to hinder us from committing the first sin; so that, when this second motive is absent or weak, then it would be necessary for the sinner to commit that particular sin to which he feels inclined. Thirdly, this abstaining from sin "by a simple negation of activity,"[2633] as they say, can hardly be imagined in sins against the negative precepts; but, as Tourneley and Gotti well observe, is altogether impossible in cases where a positive precept obliges us to do some supernatural act; as, for instance, to make an act of faith, hope, love, and contrition: for as these acts are supernatural, they necessarily require the supernatural assistance of God to enable us to perform them. So that, at any rate in this case, if grace were wanting, man would be necessitated to sin, by not satisfying the positive precept, although he was unable to avoid the sin. But to assert this is, as F. Bannez observes, contrary to faith: "A man cannot sin without having first actually received an inspiration of divine grace. We assert this conclusion to be certainly of faith; because no one sins in not doing that which he cannot do, as it is certain de fide; but a man to whom nothing more is given than the bare faculties of human nature has no power to act above nature, and therefore does not sin in omitting to perform a supernatural act."[2634]

Nor will it do to say that if the sinner is deprived of grace, he is deprived of it by his own fault; and therefore, though he is deprived of grace, yet he sins. For Cardinal Gotti well replies to this, that God can justly punish the sinner for his previous faults, but not for his future transgressions of precepts which he is no longer able to fulfil. If a servant, he says, were sent to a place, and if he, through his own fault, fell into a pit, his master might punish him for his carelessness in falling, and even for his subsequent disobedience, if means (such as a rope or ladder) were given him to get out of the pit, and he would not avail himself of them; but supposing that his master did not help him to get out, he would be a tyrant if he ordered him to proceed and punished him for not proceeding. Hence he concludes, "When, therefore, a man has by sin fallen into the ditch, and become unable to proceed on his way to eternal life, though God may punish him for this fault, and also if he refuses the offer of grace to enable him to proceed; yet if God chose to leave him to his own weakness, he cannot without injustice oblige him to proceed on the way, nor punish him if he does not proceed."[2635]

Moreover, our opponents adduce many texts of Scripture where this abandonment is apparently expressed: Blind the heart of this people . . . lest they see with their eyes . . . and be converted, and I heal them.[2636] We would have cured Babylon, but she is not healed; let us forsake her. [2637] Add thou iniquity upon their iniquity, and let them not come into Thy justice.[2638] For this cause God delivered them up to shameful affectionis. He hath mercy on whom He will; and whom He will He hardeneth;[2639] and others similar. But it is usually and easily answered to all these in general, that in the Holy Scriptures God is often said to do what he only permits; so that if we would not blaspheme with Calvin, and say that God positively destines and determines some persons to sin, we must say that God permits some sinners, in penalty of their faults, to be on the one hand assailed by vehement temptations (which is the evil from which we pray God to deliver us when we say, Lead us not into temptation);[2640] and, on the other hand, that they remain morally abandoned in their sin; so that their conversion, and the resistance they should make to temptation, although neither impossible nor desperate, is yet, through their faults and their bad habits, very difficult; since, in their laxity of life, they have only very rare and weak desires and motions to resist their bad habits, and to regain the way of salvation. And this is the imperfect obstinacy of the hardened sinner which St. Thomas describes: "He is hardened who cannot easily co-operate in his escape from sin; and this is imperfect obstinacy, because a man may be obstinate in this life, if he has a will so fixed upon sin, that no motions towards good arise, except very weak ones."[2641] On one side, the mind is obscured, the will is hardened against God's inspirations, and attached to the pleasures of sense, so as to despise and feel disgust for spiritual blessings; the sensual passions and appetites reign in the soul through the bad habits that have been acquired; on the other side, the illuminations and the callings of God are, by its own fault, rendered scarcely efficacious to move the soul, which has so despised them, and made so bad a use of them, that it even feels a certain aversion towards them, because it does not want to be disturbed in its sensual gratifications. All these things constitute moral abandonment; and when a sinner has once fallen into it, it is only with the utmost difficulty that he can escape from his miserable state, and bring himself to live a well-regulated life.

In order to escape, and pass at once from such disorder to a state of salvation, a great and extraordinary grace would be requisite; but God seldom confers such a grace on these obstinate sinners. Sometimes he gives it, says St. Thomas, and chooses them for vessels of mercy, as the Apostle calls them, in order to make known his goodness; but to the rest he justly refuses it, and leaves them in their unhappy state, in order to show forth his justice and power: "Sometimes," says the Angel of the Schools, "out of the abundance of his goodness he prevents with his assistance even those who put a hindrance in the way of his grace, and converts them, etc. And as he does not enlighten all the blind, nor cure all the sick, so neither does he assist all who place an impediment to his grace, so as to convert them. . . . This is what the Apostle means when he says that God, to show forth His anger, and to make His power, known, endured with much patience the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction, that He might show the riches of His glory upon the vessels of mercy, which He hath prepared unto glory. "[2642] Then he adds, "But since out of the number of those who are involved in the same sins, there are some to whom God gives the grace of conversion, while others he only endures, or allows to go on in the course of things, we are not to inquire the reason why he converts some and not others. For the Apostle says, Has not the potter power over the clay, to make of the same mass one vessel to honor, and another to dishonor?"[2643]

We do not then deny (to bring this point to a conclusion) that there is such a thing as the moral abandonment of some obstinate sinners, so that their conversion is morally impossible; that is to say, very difficult. And this concession is abundantly sufficient for the laudable object which our opponents have in defending their opinion, which is to restrain evil-doers, and to induce them to consider, before they come to fall into such a deplorable state. But then it is cruelty (as Petrocorensis well says) to take from them all hope, and entirely to shut against them the way of salvation, by the doctrine that they have fallen into so complete an abandonment as to be deprived of all actual grace to enable them to avoid fresh sins, and to be converted; at any rate, mediately by means of prayer (which is not refused to any man while he lives, as we shall prove in the last chapter), whereby they can afterwards obtain abundant help for placing themselves in a state of salvation: since the fear of total abandonment would not only lead them to despair, but also to give themselves more completely to their vices, in the belief that they are altogether destitute of grace; so that they have no hope left of escaping eternal damnation.

Chapter III

EXPOSITION AND CONFUTATION OF JANSENIUS' SYSTEM OF "DELECTATION RELATIVELY VICTORIOUS"[2644]

I

THE SYSTEM OF JANSENIUS

I. In the following chapter we will, as we promised, demonstrate that the grace of prayer is given to all men. But this doctrine does not please Jansenius; he goes so far as to call it an hallucination: "It is an hallucination to think that the grace of prayer is always present to a man."[2645] According to his system, he considers that without the delectation relatively victorious we cannot pray; but this delight is not granted to all men, therefore (he adds) all men have not sufficient grace and power to fulfil the commandments; for many are without even the remote grace to enable them to pray as they ought, or indeed to pray at all. "Since, therefore," he continues, "most men either do not ask for grace to enable them to fulfil the law, or do not ask for it as is necessary; and since God does not give all men the grace either to pray fervently, or even to pray at all, it is most evident that many of the faithful are without that sufficient grace, and, consequently, without that perpetual power of fulfilling the one precept (of the moment) which some theologians proclaim."[2646] Before, then, we prove our own position, we must confute his pernicious system, from which all his errors are derived; and we must show that not we, but that he is laboring under an hallucination.

All know the five propositions of Jansenius which were condemned by the Church as heretical.[2647] Now, as Tourneley proves, all these propositions follow if you once grant his system of preponderating delectation, on which Jansenius founds all his doctrine.[2648] F. Ignatius Graveson says the same: "From this pernicious principle Jansenius and his followers derived these erroneous conclusions (the five propositions), which are most intimately connected and form one system with that principle."[2649] So F. Berti, who says that "from the principle of the two invincible delectations, as from a root, almost all the other Jansenist errors have sprung, and especially the five condemned propositions."[2650] And Father Fortunato da Brescia, in his lately published book, called A Confutation of the System of Cornelius Jansenius, proves to demonstration that, admitting this system, you must necessarily admit the five condemned propositions.

Let us, therefore, distinctly exhibit this system of Jansenius. He says that the will of man, since the fall of Adam, is unable to do otherwise than to follow either the pleasure of grace (which he calls the celestial delectation), or that of concupiscence (which he calls earthly delectation), according as one prevails over the others. So that if the heavenly delectation is greater, then it necessarily overcomes the other; if the earthly delectation preponderates, then the will necessarily yields to it.

And here we must remark that Jansenius does not hereby intend deliberate or consequent delectation, for thus he would be in accord with all Catholic Doctors; since, when the pleasure we take in a thing is deliberate, and embraced not from necessity but from free choice of the will, then certainly it is necessary that the will should act according to the delectation. But Jansenius intends indeliberate delectation, and in this sense he understands the celebrated saying of St. Augustine: "It is necessary that our act should follow the greater pleasure."[2651] Now, as we shall presently show, this sentence must necessarily be understood of deliberate and consequent delectation; but Jansenius falsely interprets (and on this false interpretation founds his whole doctrine) that it means indeliberate delectation, antecedent to any act of the will. So that, in his system, there is no such thing as sufficient grace; since it is either of too little weight, and necessarily insufficient, or else it preponderates over the concupiscence, and is then necessarily efficacious, since he makes the whole efficacy of grace consist in the relative preponderance of the indeliberate delectation: "There will be no such thing as sufficient grace" (these are his words); "but it will be either efficient, or so inefficient that no act can follow from it."[2652]

When this system is once laid down, all the five condemned propositions follow as necessary conclusions from it. Let us omit the others, and speak here exclusively of the first and third, as being most to our purpose.

REFUTATION OF THE FIRST PROPOSITION

The first is, "Some commands of God are impossible to just men, who wish to fulfil them and endeavor to do so according to the strength they at present possess. Moreover, grace is wanting to them, whereby these precepts may become possible."[2653] Some precepts (says he) become impossible even to the just, who have the will and strive to observe them, in proportion as they want the grace which should prevail over concupiscence: "Unless the heavenly delectation is greater than the earthly, it cannot but happen that we are overcome by the infirmity of our will."[2654] And again: "While carnal delectation is in vigor, it is impossible that the thought of virtue should prevail."[2655] Although, said Jansenius, grace regarded absolutely in itself, and apart from act and circumstance, may be abundantly sufficient to move the will to virtue; nevertheless, relatively considered,—that is, when the carnal delectation is greater than the heavenly (for when the carnal preponderates over grace, it is always accompanied by the act of will),—then grace is completely insufficient to draw to itself the consent of the will. And, as Father Graveson well observes, the absolute power to keep the commandments, which many would have by virtue of grace, whenever it is derived from a grace which is less than the concupiscence, is actually no longer power, but a true impotence; since the will is then entirely unable to act rightly, as the less weight cannot outweigh the greater.

How, then, can a man be blamed for not fulfilling the precept, when he is without grace even sufficient to enable him to do so? The objection is strong, and is most manifestly just; so much so, that Jansenius himself cannot help putting it: "How is it that they are not excused who are without this assistance, since without it they would not be able to fulfil the precept?"[2656] Let us see how he answers this question. The difficulty is great, therefore he attempts to disembarrass himself of it in several ways.

1. He answers that inability excuses when a man wishes to fulfil the precept, but cannot; but not when he does not wish to fulfil it. But we answer that when, the will, according to his principles, is necessarily obliged to yield to the indeliberate pleasure of the concupiscence, because of its outweighing grace, it is then physically impossible for a man to wish to fulfil the precept; since, supposing the preponderance of the carnal pleasure, grace has no longer sufficient active strength to overcome it. And of this principle Jansenius has no doubt, for he says that the stronger delectation intrinsically determines, and insuperably moves the will to accept it, so that the will is then completely deprived of relative power to resist. "Whence it follows," says Father Graveson, "that this necessity, according to the doctrine of Jansenius and his disciples, is not a moral but an antecedent and invincible necessity, which cannot be admitted without open heresy."[2657] Jansenius says, moreover, that except the delectation of grace preponderates, it is as impossible for a man to fulfil the precept as it is "for one without wings to fly, for the blind to see, for the deaf to hear, or for a man with broken limbs to walk straight."[2658] It would be the same for a man who had eyes but was deprived of light; because it is no more physically impossible for a blind man without eyes to see than it is for one who has eyes but is without light; for physical impossibility is simply that which exceeds the natural powers. So that any one can see how baseless is this first reply of Jansenius.

2. Let us examine the second, which is still more so. He says that all the commandments are possible to man, just so far as God can give him grace to make him keep them: "All men are said to be able to believe, to be able to love God . . . for this power is nothing else than a passive flexibility of capacity, through which they are able to receive faith and charity."[2659] So that, according to Jansenius, man's sin in breaking the commandments is in proportion to his capacity of receiving grace to fulfil them. But by this rule we might say that the blind can see, and the deaf hear, because God can make them see and hear; but, for all that, it is physically impossible for the blind to see, on the deaf to hear, unless God gives them the power. So that to say that it is sufficient reason to call a precept possible, if it is possible to man in case God gives him the power, is either nonsense or fraud, intended to hide the truth; for, I ask, what help can a man have from that grace which he might have, but has not at the time? It is the same as saying, a man might observe all the precepts if he could observe them; but at present he cannot. When the sick man, says St. Augustine, needs care to cure him, he cannot get well without care, however he may wish it: "Nor yet can he become well when he will, but when he is healed by the use of proper care."[2660]

3. Jansenius' third answer is, that liberty of will consists entirely in knowing the delightful object and in taking pleasure in it: "Wherefore" (these are his words), "after surveying the arguments of Augustine, on which the whole doctrine of free will depends, we think that it is nothing but knowledge and delectation, or a pleasurable complacency in the object which has the power over the free will to make it accept or reject. . . . Concerning knowledge we are not very particular, for scarcely any one doubts that it is necessary to an act of will."[2661] So that, according to Jansenius, the liberty of man consists, on the one hand, in his complacency in the delectation; on the other hand, in his knowledge of the object, or, in other words, in that judgment indifferent (equally applicable either to good or evil) whereby he knows the good and evil of the action; as, for instance, in murder, he knows the evil of the sin and the pleasure of the revenge. Hence he says, in another place, that the wicked sin in proportion as they know by means of the law the malice of sin: "The first effect of the law is confessed to be, to give the knowledge of sin;"[2662] and quotes the text of St. Paul: I did not know sin but by the law.[2663] In this he followed Calvin, who said: "The object of the law is to render man inexcusable; and this would not be a bad definition of it—it is the knowledge of the conscience distinguishing between right and wrong, for the purpose of taking away the pretext of ignorance."[2664] But we may answer that the indifferent judgment, or the knowledge of good and evil which belongs only to the intellect, can never constitute the freedom of choice which belongs altogether to the will; for liberty consists simply in the free choice of the will to do or not to do a thing.

4. Jansenius gives a fourth reply; but this is more incongruous and untenable than any of the former. He says that for sin it is not requisite to have the liberty of indifference, so that a man should be free from all necessity of sinning; but that it is enough to have a liberty of exercise or of choice, so as to be able to abstain from the particular sin to which our concupiscence tempts us, but only by committing another. "So that" (these are his words) "a man may act, and abstain from this particular sin, at least by committing another;"[2665] whereby he places man in such a dilemma that in order to avoid one sin he must necessarily commit another; and he says that such a liberty is sufficient to make a man guilty, though he may be necessitated to sin in one way or another. Thus he explains himself more clearly in another place: "The will of fallen man by no means ceases to be free in committing sin, although it be bound by a certain general necessity of sinning; for it will be free in its exercise (as they say), necessitated in the kind of thing it is to choose."[2666] In answer to this we might repeat all that we said in Chap. II. § 2, p. 154, against Giovenino, who says that all sinners, though deprived of sufficient grace, yet sin by this liberty of exercise. But what kind of liberty is this, that a man, whether he be good or bad, could be called guilty, though he is necessitated to sin in one way or another? St. Thomas says that it is heresy to maintain that the will merits or demerits when it acts through necessity, although not compelled by violence to act: "Some have asserted that the will of man is necessarily moved to choose a thing, . . . but they still did not assert that the will is forced. . . . But this opinion is heretical, for it destroys the rule of merit or demerit in human actions; for there seems to be nothing meritorious or otherwise in a man acting from necessity in a way that he cannot help."[2667] Moreover, when a man is necessitated to commit one or the other sin, according to the general consent of all theologians, if he chooses the less sin, even though he voluntarily chooses it, he does not sin; because he is without the liberty which is required before an action can be imputed to him as sin. So that, in our case, when, by reason of a concupiscence that outweighs grace, a man has chosen the less of two sins, he does not sin.

But, putting aside all these reflections, the direct answer is, that, supposing Jansenius' principle of the pleasure relatively preponderating to be true, this liberty of exercise to abstain from one sin by committing another becomes quite impossible. His principle, as we have already explained, is, that when the carnal pleasure outweighs the heavenly, then the will is necessitated to consent to that individual pleasure to which it is physically drawn. And therefore he somewhere says that tin superior pleasure destroys the indifference of the will; for as a weight inclines the index of a balance, which before stood in equilibrium, so does the pleasure move the will to consent to that concupiscence to which it tempts it: "Since (the carnal delight) by the persuasion of its motion is the cause that the man, who before the motion was indifferent whether he acted or not, should be by the very motion of the concupiscence impelled to one side or the other, like a balance into which a weight, is put."[2668] He says the same in another place, where he tries to refute those who will have it that the superior pleasure moves morally; and says that it does not draw and determine the will to accept the object proposed to it morally, but physically: "Since that is called moral predetermination, which is only in the object when it, as it were, counsels, orders, or beseeches; but this (delectation) has its seat in the very power of the will, which it sets in motion by the intensity of the pleasure it gives, and by setting it in motion determines it; since it makes the will determine its own object, and therefore it may be said to predetermine the will."[2669] So that, according to Jansenius, the pleasure predetermines the will to embrace the object to which it moves it, before the will determines itself. And that this is the true meaning of Jansenius the learned Diroys has no doubt, who on this account says that Jansenius does not differ from the astrologers, who make the will of man subject to the influence of the planets; "so that the will is determined in the choice of its object by any impression which may happen to precede its determination."[2670] The Archbishop of Vienne says the same in his book Baianism and Jansenism Revived: "The Jansenists contend that by a pleasure superior in degree the will is invincibly determined in its operation, without any respect to the future determination of the will itself."[2671]

Granting this system, how is the liberty of exercise possible? since, according to Jansenius, the preponderating pleasure by itself predetermines the will to accept it; so that, as in the balance the less weight necessarily gives way to the larger, so does the will necessarily yield to the preponderating pleasure. So that, for instance, if any one is drawn by this pleasure to take another man's property, it is true that he may be led to abstain from thieving by love for his own reputation; but in cases where this love either does not exist, or is not greater than the pleasure of stealing, the love of reputation certainly cannot conquer, and then evidently all liberty of exercise ceases.

REFUTATION OF THE THIRD PROPOSITION

But let us now pass on to the third proposition of Jansenius: "To merit and demerit in a state of fallen nature, man does not require freedom from necessity, but freedom from compulsion."[2672] He says then that, in order to merit or to sin, the liberty of indifference, which excludes necessity, is not wanted, but it is enough if the will is not repugnant. And he goes so far as to assert that it is a paradox to say that the act of will is free, so far forth as the will is at liberty to accept or refuse the object. This proposition, also condemned as heretical, follows similarly from his system; for, supposing that the will, when moved by a preponderating pleasure, must necessarily obey it, it necessarily follows (as Jansenius shows) that it is sufficient for merit or demerit that a man should be willing to consent to the pleasure, although he cannot do otherwise than be willing, and is even physically necessitated to be so. F. Serry well maintains that it is a monstrous doctrine to say "that merit can coexist with the necessity of acting."[2673] And it was before this called heretical by St. Thomas, whose words, already quoted, I shall be pardoned for repeating here: "Some have asserted that the will of man is necessarily moved to choose a thing; but they still did not assert that the will is forced. But this opinion is heretical, for it destroys the rule of merit and demerit in human actions; for there seems to be nothing meritorious or otherwise in a man acting from neccessity in any way that he cannot help."[2674]

And with reason it is called heresy, for it is contrary to Holy Scripture: God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able; but will also make with the temptation issue, that you may be able to bear it.[2675] But Jansenius says that at times man is so completely deprived of grace that he cannot resist temptations, and is necessitated to succumb to them.

Moses said to the people: This commandment that I command thee this day is not above thee.[2676] Again, Blessed is he that could have transgressed, and hath not transgressed; and could do evil things, and hath not done them.[2677] Therefore it is not sufficient for merit that a man should act willingly, but it is necessary that he also act freely; that is, that he should be able to neglect the commandments, and should not be necessitated to fulfil them; and, vice versa in sin, that he should have the grace to abstain, and that it should be his own fault if he does not abstain.

Nor is the reply of the impious Theodore Beza valid here; he says that the necessity does not depend on nature, but on original sin, by which man voluntarily deprived himself of liberty, and is therefore justly punished for sinning, though he be necessitated to sin; for it may be answered that if a servant had by his own fault broken his leg, his master would be unjust if, after having forgiven the fault, he commanded him to run, and punished him for not running. "To hold a man guilty of sin," says St. Augustine, "because he has not done what he could not do, is abominable iniquity and folly."[2678]

Moreover, supposing that man could merit or demerit when acting by necessity, without any balance of power to do otherwise, I do not know how it could be reconciled with Holy Scripture, which says: You have your choice; choose this day that which pleaseth you, whom you would rather serve, whether . . . the gods of the Amorites, etc.; . . . but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.[2679] A choice cannot be given where men act from necessity, and without liberty; so that this text clearly proves that man is free from necessity. "A full power of choosing either side," says Petavius on this passage, "is clearly shown; so that the will, as it were suspended and placed in the middle, may choose whichever it likes of the two objects."[2680]

The same is said in other parts of Scripture: I call heaven and earth to witness this day, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing.—Choose, therefore, life, that both thou and thy seed may live.[2681] God made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his own counsel. He added His commandments and precepts. . . . Before man is life and death, good and evil; that which he shall choose shall be given him.[2682] On the latter passage Petavius says: "If the teacher had now to decide the present point, how could he more clearly express the freedom from necessity which man enjoys? If he lived among us, and judged from our point of view, he could not describe in more precise terms the nature and property of human liberty and of free will than he has done here."[2683]

There are other texts to the same purpose: I called, and you refused.[2684] They have been rebellious to the light.[2685] I looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it hath brought forth wild grapes.[2686] You always resist the Holy Ghost.[2687] It is certainly the work of the Holy Spirit to call men, to enlighten their minds, and to move the will to good; but how can it be said that he refuses the call, that he rebels against the light, that he resists grace, who is destitute of preponderating grace, and therefore must necessarily yield to the prevailing concupiscence?

II

TRUE DOCTRINE OF ST. AUGUSTINE ON THE "VICTORIOUS DELECTATION" AND ON FREE WILL

"But what," says Jansenius, "if Augustine before me has maintained this same theory, that we must necessarily do that which pleases us most, according to the well-known passage, 'It is necessary that we act according to that which delights us most?'"[2688] Now, before we answer Jansenius, we must premise that St. Augustine, who had to confute several heresies of his time, all on the subject of grace, and all contrary to one another, had to speak of it diffusely and upon different points of view, and is therefore in several places obscure. Hence it has come to pass that not only each of the Catholic schools boasts of having him on its side, though their opinions are quite different, but also Calvin and Jansenius, whose errors have been condemned by the Church, have presumed to call him their patron. Calvin, writing against Pighius, says, "We follow nothing but Augustine. . . . Pighius may squeak as he pleases, he will never make us allow that Augustine is not on our side."[2689] And Jansenius puts forward Augustine as his sole teacher, so that he even called his book by the title of "Augustinus." And the Jansenists only call themselves Augustinians. From these premises we only wish to infer that many passages of St. Augustine require explanation by comparison with other passages of his works, where he declares his true opinion, if we would not be misled. Now let us come to the point.

We have already explained at the beginning of the chapter that this sentence of St. Augustine ought not and cannot be understood of indeliberate pleasure, antecedent to any co-operation of the will, but ought to be understood of deliberate and consequent pleasure; for in cases where man freely consents to the pleasure, then, certainly, it is necessary that he should act upon it. And this is proved by what Augustine says in other places, where he confounds pleasure with love, or, rather, explains that the superior pleasure is nothing else than that deliberate love, and that affection, which, by our own free choice, predominates in us; in which pleasure, if we deliberately take delight, then it is necessary that we act upon it. So, that in substance, he simply says that the will must act upon that which it deliberately loves the most; for in one place he says that the pleasure is, as it were, the weight of the soul, which drags it along with it—"for pleasure is, as it were, the weight of the soul;"[2690] and in another place, that this weight which draws each man's soul is his love—"My love is my weight."[2691] This he explains more clearly in another place, where he says we ought to be careful, "by God's help, to be so disposed as not to be tripped up by inferior things, and to take pleasure only in the higher things."[2692] See how clearly he speaks of deliberate pleasure, freely accepted. In another place, "What is it to be drawn by pleasure? To delight in the Lord; and he will give thee the petitions of thy heart."[2693] Again, "See how the Father draws! He delights us by teaching, not by laying us under necessity."[2694] Again, "If we wish to enjoy the pleasures of heaven, we must bridle unlawful pleasure; as when we fast, the appetite rises against us; this it does by pleasure (i.e., indeliberate), but we restrain it by the law of the governing reason."[2695] So that, according to St. Augustine, the pleasure which incites us to break the law may be freely repressed by man by means of the dominant reason, and by the help of grace. Hence he exhorts us: "Let justice so delight you as to conquer even lawful pleasures."[2696]

This is made still clearer by the context of the passage on which we are now disputing, where, after saying, "We must needs act upon the greater pleasure," he adds, "It is clear that our life must be according to our pursuits, and our pursuits must be according to our affections (mark this). Therefore, if there are two contradictory things, the command of justice and the carnal habit, and both of them are loved, we shall pursue that which we love most."[2697] So that when he says we must needs act according to that which delights us most, he only means that the will must necessarily act on that which it loves best; nor will it do to say, with Jansenius, that what gives most pleasure is most loved; for this is not always true, and St. Augustine expressly contradicts it when, in his Confessions, he says of himself, "I did not do that in which my affections took incomparably more pleasure, and which as soon as I would, I could do;"[2698] by which he means that he was already moved by God with an indeliberate affection, which made virtue incomparably more pleasant to him than vice, and that he might easily have been virtuous if he would; but that he resisted grace, and refused to be virtuous, and abandoned himself to vice.

Further, if St. Augustine had believed that it was necessary for us to act upon the greater pleasure, he could never have said, "When the unlawful pleasure of concupiscence tickles you, fight, resist, do not consent; and the saying is fulfilled, Go not after thy desires."[2699] Still further, he says elsewhere that of two persons who have the same temptation to impurity, it sometimes happens that one consents to it and the other resists; and why? because, he says, one wills to observe chastity, the other wills not: "If both are tempted by the same (mark the word same) temptation, and one yields and consents to it, while the other perseveres; what else is shown, but that one willed to fail, the other willed not to fail in chastity?"[2700]

Moreover, when he says that it is necessary that we should act upon that which best pleases us, it may be asked whether he speaks of deliberate or indeliberate pleasure. Now, we say that if he had meant indeliberate pleasure, he would have been obliged, in consequence, to deny that the will, in order to be truly free, need be free not only from violence, but also from necessity. But there are a thousand places where he teaches the reverse, and says that man, whether in good or in evil, acts without necessity; therefore, when he speaks of the predominant pleasure overcoming, he must necessarily mean the deliberate or consequent pleasure. To quote a few of these numerous passages:

"Our will would be no will at all if it were not in our own power; for that is not free to us which we have not in our power."[2701]

In another place, speaking of the passage of St. Matthew where our Lord talks of good fruit springing from a good tree, and bad fruit from a bad tree,[2702] he says, "When, therefore, our Lord says this, do this or do that, he shows that it is in the power of man to do it; for he that will not keep the law can keep it if he will."[2703] Calvin objects that Augustine is here speaking of man in the state of innocence; but Bellarmine well observes that St. Augustine is here explaining a passage where our Lord is speaking against the Jews, and says of them, Ye shall know them by their fruits.[2704] So that it can never be supposed that St. Augustine meant to apply the remark to Adam. Moreover, he repeats what he had said against the Manichees, when writing against the Pelagians: "Whenever it is said, 'Do not this and do not that,' and whenever an act of will is required of us to do or not to do something which God commands or forbids, in such places the will is shown to be sufficiently free."[2705] Here Jansenius replies (like a partisan of Calvin, as he is) that St. Augustine is speaking of necessity violently imposed on us, not of simple necessity. But here again Jansenius is mistaken; for on this point St. Augustine agreed with the Pelagians, and conceded to them that the will was free both from coercive and from simple necessity; hence in his book against Julian he did not scruple to say, "Both of us affirm that the will in man is free. But you say that anyone is free to do good without God's help; hence you are a Pelagian"[2706] When St. Augustine says, "Both of us affirm,"[2707] he admitted the same liberty to do or not to do which the Pelagians maintained, and they certainly maintained it to be exempt from any necessity whatever; so that there is no doubt that he held the will to be free not only from violence, but from any necessity whatever; he only contradicted the Pelagians in this point, that they maintained the will to be free to do good even without grace.

Further, St. Augustine says that it is difficult to reconcile the liberty of the will with the efficacy of grace: "This question, wherein we discuss the choice of the will, and the grace of God, is so difficult to determine that when we defend free will we seem to deny the grace of God; and when we assert the grace of God, we are supposed to destroy free will."[2708] If St. Augustine had supposed that the will was not free from simple necessity, but only from violence, it would not have been difficult, but the easiest thing possible, to understand how grace acted; when, therefore, he said that it was difficult to understand, it was because he, held that efficacious grace certainly produced its effect in good acts; and, on the other hand, that the will did these acts freely, working without any necessity to prevent it from being able to do or to wish any acts different from those to which it was moved by grace. For the rest, the holy Father held it as certain that man, with the help of ordinary grace, was able to fulfil the commandments, or, at any rate, to procure by prayer greater help to enable him to fulfil them; otherwise (as he said) God would not have imposed these commandments on him: "Nor would he have commanded us to do this if he had considered it impossible to be done by man."[2709]

We will quote some more passages of St. Augustine, where he reiterates the doctrine that the will of man is free from any necessity: "For that would not be sin which was not done by the will; and therefore punishment would also be unjust, if man had not free will; that is, if he acted well or ill through necessity."[2710] Again, "Who would not exclaim that it is folly to give commands to a man who is not free to do what is commanded; and that it is injustice to condemn the man who had no power to fulfil the command?"[2711] Again, "If the motion whereby the will turns aside from the unchangeable good is natural and necessary, it can by no means be culpable."[2712] Then, after saying that previous grace is necessary to enable us to do good, he adds, "But to consent to the call of God, or to dissent from it, is in the power of our own will."[2713] Here he plainly teaches that the will can freely obey grace or resist it. Nor does it avail to say with Jansenius that St. Augustine only means that to consent and dissent is the proper office of the will; for we can never believe that the holy Doctor would have taken such useless pains to prove that consent and dissent belong to the will and not to the intellect, a thing which any illiterate man can tell. Especially as St. Augustine's words, just before the last quoted sentence, are as follows: "No one has it in his power to determine what shall come into his mind, but to consent, etc."[2714] So that it is clear that he is speaking of the free power of the will to consent or dissent from that which comes into the head. In another place he says, "No one but God can make the tree" (he is speaking of the good trees that produce good fruit, and of the bad trees which produce bad fruit); "but every man's will has power to choose either good or bad. When, therefore, our Lord says, Do this or do that, he shows that it is in men's power to choose what to do." Elsewhere, in explanation of the help sine quo, he says, "Without it the will cannot will; but still it is left to the free will either to will or not to will, to use the help or not to use it."[2715]

From all this it is very clearly seen how far St Augustine was from the opinion of Jansenius, that the will of man in its action is not free from necessity, much less that it is obliged to follow the preponderating pleasure, which by its impulse invincibly moves and determines it.

III

CONTINUATION OF THE REFUTATION OF JANSENIUS AND OF HIS ADHERENTS

Now, let us apply this to the point we have in view, namely, to prove that God gives every one either proximate grace, or the remote grace of prayer, to enable him to observe the precepts; since otherwise the transgression of the law could never be imputed to him as a fault. Let us then see what are the two propositions that are exactly opposite to those of Jansenius.

His first is, "Some precepts of God are impossible to the just man who wishes and tries to fulfil them with his present strength; nor does God give him grace to make them possible."[2716] Hence the Catholic proposition, contradictory of this, is as follows: "Not any of the precepts of God is impossible, at least to the just man, who wishes to observe them, and who endeavors to do so; nor, even with his present strength, is he without the grace (either proximate, or at least remote) whereby he may at least obtain greater assistance to enable him to fulfil them. And here we must again observe that to avoid the condemned error it is not enough to grant the absolute possibility of observing the precept, for the Jansenists themselves admit this possibility; but we must also admit the possibility (relatively to the actual carnal delectation which preponderates over the delectation of grace) to fulfil the commandment when it is incumbent on us to do so, or at least to obtain grace to keep it; since the error of Jansenius consists precisely in denying, not the absolute, but the relative possibility.

Jansenius' third proposition is that "in order to merit ill or well in the state of fallen nature, man need not have freedom from necessity, but only freedom from compulsion."[2717] Hence the Catholic proposition is the contradictory: to merit ill or well, even in the state of fallen nature, man, whether just or unjust, requires freedom, not only from compulsion, but also from simple necessity; since, according to the Catholic doctrine, the voluntary, whenever it is necessary, is not free in such a sense as is sufficient to merit ill or well in this life; but to merit ill or well the will must be free from any necessity whatever of being obliged to consent to either of two things determinately.

Moreover, F. Fortunato da Brescia (a man universally celebrated by the learned of these days, especially by Muratori), in his late work entitled Confutation of the System of Cornelius Jansenius, says that if this system could possibly be true, God's law would be either foolish or unjust; for, according to it, if the heavenly pleasure predominates, then the will, quite independently of the law, is obliged to follow the precise impulse of the pleasure, and thus the law is useless; or, if the earthly pleasure predominates, then the law is unjust, for God imposes a commandment which it is physically impossible for man to obey, since the will must necessarily yield to the temptation.

And in this way all the threats and admonitions of the Scriptures would be useless, and there would be no human action which could merit reward or punishment, since all the actions of man would be done through necessity. So that whenever any one exhorted us to do well, we might answer with Eusebius against the Fatalists, "These powers are not mine, O Doctor; for they will do it if the fates so desire" (i.e., if the carnal delight does not preponderate); "that which is fated will necessarily come to pass."[2718] I must necessarily follow the pleasure that prevails.

The same author says, further, that if we admit this system, we must also admit Manicheism, which supposed two principles, a good and an evil; and says that as all the acts of men were derived from one or the other principle, the man was obliged to follow that which prevailed. Nor does it do to say that the necessity in the system of the preponderating pleasure is not derived from a good or evil principle, as the Manicheans held, but depends on the sin of Adam, which is its cause; for the question is not through what principle the will acts necessarily when it is moved, but whether the will after Adam's fall has remained free from necessity in its actions. And this is what the Jansenists deny, who hold that the will merits well and ill, though it is necessitated to will that to which the preponderating pleasure determines it. But, as F. Fortunato well observes, the books of Arnold, Irénée, Ventrochio, and the other Jansenists, were condemned for this very error of maintaining Jansenius' principle of the invincibility of the pleasure which is superior in degree. And we know that it was for this reason that the theology of Giovenino was prohibited; for though he did not expressly hold the system we are discussing, yet he imprudently spoke too obscurely on the point: "The physical nature of efficacious grace consists simply in the preponderance of the pleasure which the mind takes in goodness."[2719] Still he did not use the phrase "relatively preponderating," though he proves his proposition by the often-quoted text of St. Augustine: "We must act according to that which pleases us most." And for this cause his work was so long prohibited, and has at last been allowed because of the addition of a compendium, entitled The True Doctrine of the Church, extracted from the theology of Tourneley, who has amply and well confuted the system.

F. Fortunato concludes: "It is clear, then, that the system of Jansenius is favorable to them (Luther and Calvin), and so cannot be maintained by a Catholic without violating his faith. For we cannot preserve our faith and religion while defending a system on the admission of whose fundamental principles the reception of condemned doctrines necessarily follows."[2720] Tourneley meant the same when he said, "Since the Church condemned the five propositions in the sense of Jansenius, they must be condemned as parts of Jansenius' theory of the superior and relatively preponderating pleasure, which is the foundation of his whole system."[2721]

Nor will it avail to say that the system of Jansenius is one thing, which supposes that the pleasure which relatively preponderates is indeliberate, that is, that it comes to us without any assent of the will; but that it is quite a different thing to say that the pleasure, though it relatively preponderates by the superiority of its degree, yet is deliberate; that is, it preponderates not by itself and by its own strength (as the maintainers of this system say), but it preponderates by being reinforced by the power of the consenting will. And hence they say that though the preponderating pleasure certainly and infallibly overcomes, yet it does not do so necessarily, as Jansenius maintained.

This will not avail, because, as Tourneley well replies, that grace, or that pleasure which is infallibly efficacious, and invincibly determines the will by its preponderating power, cannot but necessitate the will to consent. And he proves it thus, "That grace necessitates which supposes the will to be destitute of real power to resist it; but of this nature is grace, which is infallibly efficacious, because of the superiority of the degree of its strength. For grace of this kind supposes that the will has only inferior strength to resist; but it is a contradiction to say that superior strength, acting as such, can be overcome by inferior; otherwise it would be necessary that the inferior strength should act beyond the degree of its power of acting."[2722] Nor does it avail to reply, that though the power of grace relatively preponderating is superior to that of the concupiscence taken by itself, it is not superior to that of the concupiscence joined with that of the will, because, as Tourneley says, such a power of the will could only be admitted with respect to evil which a man can do by himself, as when he overcomes one vice by another, or at least with respect to good of the natural order; but not with respect to supernatural good, such as the conquest of a strong concupiscence, which cannot be effected without God's grace.

Hence the Fathers of Diospolis required every Pelagian, among other things, "to confess that when we fight against temptations and unlawful concupiscence, the victory comes not from our own will, but from the help of God."[2723] And the reason is, as St. Thomas teaches, that no active principle can produce an effect exceeding the sphere of its activity; so that no natural principle or cause can produce a supernatural effect: "No act exceeds the proportion of its active principle; and hence we see that in natural things nothing can by its own operation produce an effect which exceeds the power of its activity, but can only by its own operation produce an effect proportionate to its power."[2724] So that the natural power of the human will, although united to the power of grace, cannot, when the latter is inferior to the power of the concupiscence, contribute to produce a supernatural effect, such as the conquest of a violent concupiscence that preponderates over grace. And, in fact, the Jansenists say, we are contented if you grant to us that the delectation certainly overcomes by reason of its superior power. See how one of them, the Abbot de Bourzéis, speaks: "It is sufficient for us if this single truth be granted, that as often as we consent to the grace of God, it always arises from the right love which God inspires, being superior in strength to the perverse love; and in consequence of this superiority always most certainly overcoming it."[2725] Hence Tourneley, speaking of the two systems, of pleasure absolutely preponderating, and of pleasure relatively preponderating, concludes, "We have known orthodox theologians who test efficacious grace by its pleasure being absolutely and simply preponderating over all other pleasures; and who call that sufficient grace which has just power enough to overcome the lust actually opposed to it. But we have only met with Jansenists who maintain that no grace can overcome unless it is relatively preponderating in degree, and who admit no other sufficient grace than one that is inferior in strength to the superior concupiscence which opposes it."[2726]

So that, to conclude, we do not intend now to blame the opinion that the will, even when it follows the greater delectation, yet always acts freely, that is, without necessity, and with true power (not merely nominal or hypothetical power) to act in a contrary way; but we only reject the opinion of those who say that when one of the two pleasures, the carnal or the heavenly, preponderates by being greater in degree than the other, then man has no more power to resist and to overcome it, because the greater force always overcomes the less.

Nevertheless, I cannot in this place neglect to mention the difficulty that I find in this system of the preponderating delectation. Its defenders say, as also F. John Laurence Berti, that the efficacy of grace, as they maintain it, does not differ in substance from the efficacy as taught by the Thomists, though founded on different principles; for the Thomists make the efficacy of grace consist in a physical predetermination, but the Jansenists in the preponderating pleasure. That which is done by physical premonition according to the Thomists, the same is done by victorious delectation according to the Augustinians; namely, the liberty of the will is moved to give consent in actu secundo. Further, both opinions teach that man still has the power, in actu primo, to act in opposite directions; so that the will always acts freely and without necessity.[2727]

But I observe that, as the principles and the reasons of these two opinions are different, so also are their consequences.

According to the Thomists, the reason of the efficacy of grace is because the created will is in a state of passive potentiality, able to receive the motions of grace; so that to come to actual operation it must be moved by God, as the first agent and first free cause, who, by his predetermination, adapts and determines the potentiality (of the will) into actuality, This only relates to the act; but as for the power of capability, the Thomists say that man has the grace of potentiality wholly complete, and in proximate preparation, so as to be able to act virtuously. Thus F. Gonet, "The grace which gives the power gives the full complement, and all the strength or sufficiency which is requisite, so far as the actus primus is concerned."[2728] So, also, Cardinal Gotti: "Sufficient grace gives proximate power, and complete power within the limits of potentiality."[2729].[2730] And thus all other Thomists in general; and if any of them apparently speak otherwise, it is only of the actus secundus, not primus.

On the other hand, the reason of the principle of those who maintain the opinion of the pleasure superior in degree is because (as they say) whereas at first, in the state of innocence, man only required "sufficient grace" to do well, since his will, being then sound and in perfect balance, could easily act with only sufficient grace, without needing efficacious grace,—now, on the other hand, since the fall of Adam, the will, being injured and inclined to evil, has need of "efficacious grace," which, by means of the victorious pleasure, adapts it for acting virtuously. But (I say) according to this reason for the system, granting that the will of man has become so weak that, in its present state, it cannot act without efficacious grace, it is impossible to say that man still has, by virtue of sufficient grace, not even in the actus primus, nor either in the sensus compositus, nor sensus divisus, the complete and proximately prepared power to observe the commandments, or to be able to do any good work, even though it be mediate, by means of which he can place himself in a position to obtain greater help to enable him to fulfil the law.

I know that the supporters of this opinion have no objection to grant this, and to say that, in our present state, sufficient grace does not give complete and prepared power. "Sufficient grace," says F. Macedo, one of this school, "does not give power proximately complete and prepared."[2731] And elsewhere, speaking of the grace of Adam innocent and of Adam fallen, he says, "The first supposed (a power) prepared and free; the second a power crippled, hindered, and enslaved."[2732]

So, supposing that grace, when inferior to the concupiscence, does not give complete and prepared power to observe the commandments, it can, in truth, be no longer called sufficient. So that, in fact, F. Berti, who defends such a system of the relatively victorious delectation, finds no difficulty in further granting that such inferior grace ought properly to be called inefficacious, and not sufficient. So that on this system, they who do not receive from God grace that is efficacious, by means of the delectation relatively victorious over that of the concupiscence, have not even grace sufficient to enable them to fulfil the commandments. F. Berti thus writes in defence of his opinion: first, he states the three objections of his opponents, which are as follows: "There are three things which savor of the Jansenist dogma, and are the fountain and source of the five condemned propositions; to which the new Jansenists, the chief of whom are two (doubtless pretended) Augustinians, make no objection" (these two are F. Bellelli and F. Berti, against whom the Archbishop of Vienne wrote). "The first of these three things is, that they do not make efficacious grace consist simply in a victorious delectation, but in a delectation relatively preponderating, etc. The second is, that they deny the existence of a power proximately prepared in the case of a delectation of a lower grade, requiring for this, as regards the power and the actus primus, a stronger delectation; and therefore inefficacious grace (or the assistance sine quo, which they preach about) is not really sufficient grace, either in the Molinist sense or the Thomist sense; since sufficient grace, by the common consent of Catholics, confers power proximately prepared. The third thing that follows from this is, that they deny the existence of such a thing as sufficient grace; the very name of which they fraudulently abstain from using, and call it rather inefficacious than insufficient."[2733] Such are the objections. Now for F. Berti's answer: "I most firmly and unhesitatingly declare that the three doctrines just cited are noway erroneous, nor principles of the five condemned propositions; but that some people, moved indeed by a laudable zeal for refuting Jansenius, but nevertheless carried away by the prejudice of their private judgment, have made no distinction between what is Catholic and what is erroneous and condemned; and that from these people's lucubrations, some anonymous sciolist" (the Archbishop of Vienne, to wit), "and some other men of scanty learning and fat wits, have taken occasion to calumniate the unshaken doctrines of Augustine (which, whether they admit it or not, are the same as ours) as monstrous heresies."[2734]

Now I confess myself also to be precisely one of these scantily learned and gross-minded men; for I cannot understand how the propositions of F. Berti hold together; since in their consequences they appear clearly repugnant to one another. If he had said that to observe the divine law we have need of efficacious grace, but that sufficient grace, which is given to all, gives the proximate power to enable us to pray, and by prayer to obtain the greater assistance necessary for the actual observance of the commandments, we should quite agree; for this is our opinion, which we shall set forth and prove in the next chapter.

But we cannot agree; because, while speaking of prayer, he says well that every one of the faithful, by means of this sufficient grace, if he puts no impediment in the way, can pray, and by prayer obtain the immediate assistance to enable him actually to fulfil the commandments. "To each of the faithful" (these are his words), "unless he freely puts an obstacle in the way, the grace of prayer is given, by which he may obtain the aid immediately sufficient to fulfil the commandments."[2735] And, further, he says in another place that the said sufficient grace, common to all the faithful, although only remotely sufficient for the observance of the precepts, is, nevertheless, proximately sufficient for prayer, by which efficacious grace is then obtained: "In him who has the little will (that is, the will which is furnished by the sufficient grace) there is a power proximately sufficient for prayer, and remotely sufficient for the observance of the commandments, which he will be able proximately to fulfil, when by prayer he has obtained a strong will" (which strong will is furnished by efficacious grace).[2736] He says then, and says wisely, that for the observance of the commandments, it cannot be said that sufficient grace gives to all the proximate power actually to fulfil them; for (as he well observes in the place just cited, § 4) the proximate power to observe the precepts is that which needs nothing further to enable it to act; hence he writes in the same section (4), near the beginning, that the complete and prepared power can only be had from efficacious grace: "Efficacious grace alone gives the complete and ready power."[2737] Hence he adds that, in order that the sufficient grace may be said to be proximately sufficient for actual operation, "it is requisite that it should not need any further means in order to act."[2738] So that, according to the reasoning of F. Berti, though the sufficient grace does not supply all the faithful with proximate power to keep the commandments, yet it supplies all with power proximately sufficient to pray. Therefore each of the faithful, by the aid of "sufficient grace" alone, can actually pray, without the need of any further assistance, that is, of efficacious grace.

But then I do not know how this agrees with what he says in another place: "No one without grace, efficacious in itself, has the power of praying united with the act."[2739] Therefore, according to this second proposition, the "sufficient grace" does not give really, but only in name, the power proximately sufficient for prayer. It only gives the power remotely sufficient, if there is need of efficacious grace to make the power of praying issue in act. Either, therefore, for actual prayer, "efficacious grace" is requisite, and then it cannot be said that the sufficient grace gives the power proximately sufficient; or else "sufficient grace" gives the power proximately sufficient for actual prayer; and then there is no need of the efficacious grace of the preponderating pleasure, which he seeks to establish. But St. Augustine also, says F. Berti, requires an overp owering pleasure to enable us to pray: "Augustine teaches that for prayer a certain knowledge is requisite, and an overpowering pleasure."[2740] I have examined the passage referred to, which is as follows: "Let us understand, if we can, that the good Lord God sometimes does not give even to his saints either the certain knowledge of some good work, or an overpowering delight in it, in order that they may understand that the light wherewith their darkness is enlightened comes not from themselves, but from him, and so also the sweetness by which their land yields its fruit."[2741] St. Augustine does not say that an overpowering delight is requisite for prayer; he only says that sometimes God does not give even to his saints either the certain knowledge or the overpowering delight of some just work, in order that they may know that from him, and not from themselves, they have the light to illumine them, and the sweetness to make them bear fruit.

Therefore St. Augustine does not here primarily speak of the sufficient grace by which a man can work, but does not always work; nor does he say that man with only sufficient grace, and without efficacious grace, cannot actually pray; but he speaks only of efficacious grace, which, by means of an overpowering delight, infallibly causes him to do well. Secondly, he does not speak here of prayer, but of just works; which properly means the observance of the precepts or of the counsels; since prayer, though it is a good work, of its own nature is not a work, but the means of obtaining the aid necessary to execute good works.

We also hold, as we said before, that efficacious grace is necessary for the observance of the commandments; but we say that for actual prayer, whereby we may obtain efficacious grace, the sufficient grace which God gives to all the faithful is enough. And thus we do no violence to the truth that God's commandments are not impossible to any one; since every man, by means of the sufficient grace only, can perform such an easy thing as prayer; and by means of prayer he will obtain the assistance of gratuitous efficacious grace, which is necessary for the actual performance of difficult things—such as the observance of the commandments. Thus says Cardinal Noris, whose words I will quote in the next chapter, and before him St. Augustine: "By the fact that we most firmly believe that God does not command impossibilities, we are admonished in easy matters what to do, and in difficult matters what to ask for."[2742] Otherwise, if sufficient grace were not enough for actual prayer, and the addition of efficacious grace were always necessary, and if this were denied to any man—as, in fact, efficacious grace is denied to many—I cannot see how the commandments of God could be said to be possible to such a person, and how God could demand of him the observance of his law (at the time when he denies him even the efficacious grace to enable him actually to pray), and how with justice he could condemn him to hell for not observing it. This is precisely that which made Jansenius say that some precepts were impossible even from the first; because he erroneously said that some men want the grace to make the precepts possible to them. But it is not so; because God gives to all men (we are not here considering the case of infidels and obstinate sinners) the proximate grace to enable them actually to pray, as we shall prove in the next chapter. And so no one will be able to make the excuse that the observance of the precepts was impossible to him; for though he had not efficacious grace for their actual observance, he had, nevertheless, grace proximately sufficient for actual prayer, by means of which he would have obtained from God efficacious grace, according to his promise of hearing whoever prays to him; and with this he certainly might have observed the precepts. And the Council of Trent has expressly declared this against Luther, who asserted that the observance of God's law was impossible even to the faithful. "God," it says, "does not command impossibilities; but by commanding, he admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for what you cannot do; and by his help he enables you to do it."[2743]

Chapter IV

GOD GIVES ALL MEN THE GRACE TO PRAY IF THEY CHOOSE, AS THE "SUFFICIENT GRACE" WHICH IS COMMON TO ALL MEN IS BY ITSELF ENOUGH FOR PRAYER

I

THE PRINCIPAL THEOLOGIANS WHO TEACH THIS DOCTRINE

Assuming, then, that God wills all men to be saved, and that, as far as he is concerned, he gives to all the graces necessary for their salvation, we must say that all men have given to them the grace to enable them actually to pray (without needing a further grace); and by prayer to obtain all further aid necessary for the observance of the commandments and for salvation. But it must be remarked that when we say "without needing a further grace," we do not mean that the common grace gives the power of prayer without the aid of assisting grace, since, in order to exercise any act of piety, besides the exciting grace, there is doubtless required the assisting or co-operating grace. But we mean that the common grace gives every man the power of actual prayer, without a further preventing grace, which, physically or morally, determines the will of man to exercise the act of prayer. We will first mention the names of the famous theologians who teach this opinion as certain, and then we will prove it by authorities and arguments.

It is held by Isambert, Cardinal du Perron, Alphonsus le Moyne, and others whom we shall presently quote, and at greater length as a set proposition by Honoratus Tourneley. All these authors prove that every man, by means of the ordinary sufficient grace alone, can actually pray, without need of further aid; and by prayer can obtain all the graces requisite for the performance of the most difficult things.

It was also held by Cardinal Noris, who proves the proposition, that man, when the commandment urges (urgendo il precetto), can pray if he will; and he proves it thus: "It is clear that the power to pray should be proximate in the just man or the faithful; for if the faithful has only a remote power for a simple act of prayer (I am not here speaking of fervid prayer), he will not have another proximate power to obtain the grace of prayer, otherwise the series would be infinite."[2744] Assuming that, in order to keep the commandments and to be saved, prayer is necessary, as we proved in the beginning, when we spoke of the necessity of prayer, this learned author says well that every one has the proximate power of prayer, in order that by prayer he may obtain the proximate power to do good; and therefore all can pray with only the ordinary grace, without other assistance. Otherwise, if, in order to obtain the proximate power for the act of prayer we required another power, we should still want another power of grace to obtain this power, and so on ad infinitum, and it would no longer be in the power of man to co-operate in his salvation.

The same author in another place maintains this doctrine more clearly: "Even in the state of fallen nature the assistance sine quo (i.e., the sufficient grace which is common to all) is given, though Jansenius denies it; and this assistance produces in us weak acts, namely, prayer not very fervid, for fulfilling the commandments; but for the actual observance of these, the assistance sine quo is only a remote help, by which we can, however, obtain by prayer the assistance quo, or efficacious grace, by which the commandments are fulfilled."[2745] So that Cardinal Noris held it as certain that in the present state all men have the assistance sine quo, i.e., ordinary grace, which, without need of further assistance, produces prayer, by which we can then obtain efficacious grace to enable us to observe the law. And hence we can easily understand the axiom universally received in the schools: "To him who does what in him lies, God does not refuse his grace."[2746] That is, to the man who prays, and thus makes good use of the sufficient grace which enables him to do such an easy thing as prayer, God does not refuse the efficacious grace to enable him to execute difficult things.

Thus, also, Louis Thomassin, who expresses astonishment at those who say that "sufficient assistance" is not enough to do any actual good work, nor to avoid any sin: "For if," he says, "this assistance is truly assistance, and gives proximate power, how is it that, out of the innumerable quantity of men who are thus assisted, none keep the commandments? Or how is it truly sufficient, if, besides it, efficacious grace is necessary? That man has not a sufficient power who wants a necessary assistance which is not in his own power."[2747] He means that "sufficient grace," to be really sufficient, ought to give a man the proximate and ready power to execute a good act; but since, in order to perform such an act, another grace—namely, efficacious grace—is wanted, unless a man has (at least mediately) this efficacious grace which is necessary for salvation, how can it be said that the "sufficient grace" gives this proximate and ready power? Since, says St. Thomas, "God does not neglect to do that which is necessary to salvation."[2748] On the one hand, it is true that God is not bound to give us his grace, because what is gratis is not of obligation; but, on the other hand, supposing that he gives us commandments, he is obliged to give us the assistance necessary for observing them. And as God obliges us actually to observe every precept whenever it applies, so ought he also actually to supply us (at least mediately or remotely) with the assistance necessary for the observance of the precept, without the necessity of a further grace, which is not common to all. Hence Thomassin concludes, that in order to reconcile the proposition that "sufficient grace" is enough for a man's salvation with the statement that efficacious grace is requisite to observe the whole law, it is necessary to say that sufficient grace is enough to pray, and to perform similar easy acts, and that by means of these we then obtain efficacious grace to fulfil the difficult acts. And this is without doubt in conformity with the doctrine of St. Augustine, who teaches: "By the very fact that God is most firmly believed not to command impossibilities, we are admonished both what to do in easy things, and in difficult things what to ask for."[2749] On this passage Cardinal Noris observes, "Therefore, we are able to do easy or less perfect works without asking God for further help; for which, however, we must pray in more difficult works."[2750] Thomassin also brings forward the authority of St. Bonaventure, Scotus, and others on this subject, and says, "All these considered the sufficient grace to be truly sufficient, whether the will consents to it or not."[2751] And this he demonstrates in four parts of his book, adducing the authorities of the schoolmen for a long series of years, beginning from the year 1100.

Habert, Bishop of Vabres and Doctor of the Sorbonne, who was the first to write against Jansenius, says: "We think, first, that 'sufficient grace' has only a contingent or mediate connection with the actual effect of the complete consent. . . . We think, further, that 'sufficient grace' is a grace that disposes for efficacious grace, since from a good use of it God afterwards grants to the created will the grace that performs the complete effect."[2752] He had said before that "all Catholic Doctors, of all schools, have professed, and do profess, that a real inward grace is given, which is capable of persuading the will to consent to good, though, on account of the free resistance of the will, it sometimes does not persuade it thus to consent,"[2753] and for this doctrine be quotes Gamaches, Duval, Isambert, Perez, Le Moyne, and others. Then he goes on: "The assistance, therefore, of sufficient grace disposes us for the reception of efficacious grace; and is in some sort efficacious, namely, of an incomplete effect, obtained first remotely, then more nearly, and at last proximately—such as is an act of faith, hope, love, and, mixed with these, one of prayer. Hence the famous Alphonsus Le Moyne taught that this sufficient grace was the grace of asking, or of prayer, of which St. Augustine so often speaks."[2754] So that, according to Habert, the difference between efficacious and sufficient grace is, that the former produces its effect completely, while the latter produces it either contingently (i.e., sometimes, but not always) or mediately (i.e., by means of prayer). Moreover, he says that sufficient grace, according to the good use we make of it, prepares us to obtain efficacious grace; hence he calls sufficient grace "in some sort efficacious" (secundum quid), because of its effect commenced but not completed. Lastly, he says that sufficient grace is the grace of prayer, of which it is in our power to avail ourselves, as St. Augustine teaches. So that a man has no excuse if he does not do that which he already has sufficient grace to enable him to perform; by which grace, without further assistance, he may either act, or at least obtain more help to enable him to act. And Habert asserts that this was the common doctrine of the Sorbonne.

Charles du Plessis d'Argentré, another theologian of the Sorbonne, quotes more than a thousand theologians who teach directly that with sufficient grace easy works are accomplished; and that a man who makes use of it obtains thereby a more abundant assistance for his thorough conversion. And precisely in this sense, as we said before, he says the celebrated axiom of the schools is to be understood: "To those who do what is in their power" (that is, by means of sufficient grace) "God does not deny grace;"[2755] that is, more abundant and efficacious grace.

The learned Dionysius Petavius proves at great length that man works with simple sufficient grace; and he even asserts that it would be monstrous to say otherwise; and that this is the doctrine not only of theologians, but also of the Church. Hence he says that the grace of observing the precepts follows prayer; and that the gift of prayer is given by God at the time when he imposes the precept: "This gift, by which God grants us power to do justly, follows the act of prayer; and this act is given contemporaneously with the law."[2756] So that as the law is imposed upon all, so the gift of prayer is given to all.

The author of the Theology for the Use of the Seminary of Peterkau says that with sufficient grace alone "a man can do well, and sometimes does so;"[2757] so that "there is nothing to hinder that, of two persons furnished with the same assistance, one should very often perform the mere acts (which precede full conversion), the other not."[2758] And this, he says, is in conformity with the doctrine of St. Augustine and St. Thomas, and of his first disciples, especially of Father Bartholomew Medina, who says, "Sometimes a man is converted only with sufficient grace."[2759] And I find that also Father Louis of Granada asserts this to be the common doctrine of theologians: "Theologians reckon two kinds of assistance—one sufficient, the other more than sufficient; by the former of which men are sometimes converted, sometimes refuse to be converted."[2760] And, shortly afterwards, "And theologians define how universally this assistance is open to men."[2761] Hence Petrocorensis says: "So man can do some acts of piety, such as to pray to God with humility with the sufficient grace only, and sometimes actually does them, and so prepares himself for further graces."[2762] This, he says, is the order of God's Providence with regard to graces, "that the succeeding should follow the good use of the former."[2763] And he concludes that thorough conversion and final perseverance "are infallibly obtained by prayer, for which the sufficient grace which is given to every one abundantly suffices."[2764]

The same is held by Cardinal d'Aguirre, who in all things follows St. Augustine.[2765]

Father Antonio Boucat, of the order of St. Francis of Paula, defends the position that every one is now able, without new assistance, to obtain by prayer the grace of conversion. And after quoting Gamaches, Duval, Habert, Le Moyne, he cites in favor of this opinion Peter of Tarantasia, Bishop of Tulle, Godert de Fonté, and Henry of Ghent, Doctors of the Sorbonne, together with the Regius Professor Lygné, who, in his tract De Gratia, demonstrates that "sufficient grace" not only gives prayer, as Le Moyne and Professor Elias said, but also gives the power to do some works that are not difficult.

Gaudenzio Bontempi in like manner demonstrated that sufficient grace obtains efficacious grace by means of prayer, which is given to all who will avail themselves of it.

Cardinal Robert Pullo asserts two kinds of grace—one always victorious, the other one by which man sometimes works, sometimes does not: "The other by the assistance of which man can do which he chooses of these two things, either to co-operate with grace, or to despise it, and to continue sinning."[2766]

Father Fortunato da Brescia is also of the same opinion, and holds that all men have the mediate grace of prayer to enable them to observe the precepts; and has no doubt that St. Augustine held the same.

Richard of St. Victor similarly teaches that there is a sufficient grace which a man sometimes consents to, sometimes resists.

Dominic Soto asks, "Why of two persons whom God is most ready and desirous to convert, one is drawn by grace, and not the other?" And he answers: "No other reason can be given, except that one consents and co-operates, while the other does not co-operate."[2767]

Matthias Felicio, who wrote against Calvin, thus defines ordinary or sufficient grace: "It is a divine motion, or instinct, which moves a man to good, and is denied to none. Men behave differently to this instinct; for some acquiesce in it, and are disposed de congruo for habitual grace; for we believe that God will not desert those who do what they can. Others, on the contrary, oppose it."[2768]

Andreas Vega likewise says: "These helps, which are given to all men, are by most called inefficacious, because they do not always produce their effect, but are sometimes frustrated by sinners."[2769] Therefore, sufficient grace sometimes produces its effect, and sometimes does not.

Cardinal Gotti in one place of his Theology apparently agrees with us; for where he discusses the difficulty, how a man can persevere if he will, when it is not in his power to have the special assistance which is requisite for perseverance, he answers that although this special assistance is not in a man's power, "yet it is said to be in a man's power, because he can by the grace of God ask for it and obtain it; and in this way it may be said to be in a man's power to have the assistance necessary for perseverance, because it can be obtained by prayers."[2770] So, to verify the proposition that it is in a man's power to persevere, it is necessary to grant both that he can, without needing any further grace, obtain by prayer the assistance requisite for perseverance; and, also, that with only the sufficient grace common to all, without need of any special grace, he can actually pray, and by prayer obtain perseverance; otherwise it could not be said that every man had the grace necessary for perseverance, at least remotely or mediately, by means of prayer.

But if Cardinal Gotti did not mean this, at any rate St. Francis de Sales did, when he said that the grace of actual prayer is given to every one who will avail himself of it, and thence deduced that perseverance is in the power of everybody. The saint says this clearly in his Theotimus, where, after proving that constant prayer is necessary to obtain from God the gift of final perseverance, he adds: "Now, since the gift of prayer is freely promised to all those who will consent to the heavenly inspirations, consequently it is in our power to persevere."

Cardinal Bellarmine teaches the same thing: "An assistance, then and there, sufficient for salvation, is given mediately or immediately to all men. . . . We say mediately or immediately, because to those who have the use of reason we believe that holy inspirations are given by God, and that by this they have immediately the exciting grace; by which, if they will acquiesce in it, they can be disposed to be justified, and at last to obtain salvation."[2771]

II

AUTHORITY UPON WHICH THIS DOCTRINE IS BASED

Let us now proceed to examine the proofs of this doctrine. It is proved, first from authority. We shall cite Scripture, the Council of Trent, and the Holy Fathers.

1. HOLY SCRIPTURE

We have first the authority of the Apostle, who assures us that God is faithful, and will not permit us to be tempted beyond our strength, since he always gives us assistance (whether immediate or mediate, by means of prayer) to resist the assaults of our enemies: God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will make with the temptation issue, that ye may be able to bear it.[2772] Jansenius says that this text refers only to the predestinate, but this comment of his is completely unfounded; for St. Paul is writing to all the faithful of Corinth, all of whom he certainly did not consider to be predestinate. So that St. Thomas has good reason for understanding it generally of all men, and for saying that God would not be faithful if he did not grant us (so far as in him lies) those graces by means of which we can obtain salvation: "But he would not appear to be faithful were he to refuse us (so far as he is concerned) those things which are requisite to enable us to come to him."[2773] It is proved, moreover, by all those texts in which God exhorts us to convert ourselves, and to have recourse to him to ask him for the graces necessary for our salvation, and promises to hear us when we have recourse to him. Wisdom preacheth aloud, . . . saying, O children, how long will ye love childishness, and fools covet those things which are hurtful to themselves, etc.? Turn ye at My reproof: behold, I will utter My Spirit to you. . . . Because I called, and you refused, etc., I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock at you.[2774] This exhortation, Turn ye, would be simple mockery, says Bellarmine, if God did not give to sinners at least the mediate grace of prayer for their conversion. Besides, we find in the passage mention made of the internal grace by which God calls sinners, and gives them actual assistance for conversion, if they will accept it, in the words, Behold, I will bring forth My Spirit to you.[2775] Come to Me, all you that labor and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you. [2776] Come, and accuse me, saith the Lord; if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow.[2777] Ask, and it shall be given you.[2778] And so in hundreds of other texts already quoted. Now, if God did not give every one grace actually to have recourse to him, and actually to pray to him, all these invitations and exhortations, Come all, and I will refresh you; seek, and it shall be given you, would be vain.

2. THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

It is clearly proved by the passage of the Council of Trent so often quoted.[2779] I beg the reader to give his best attention to this proof; which, if I am not mistaken, is perfectly decisive. There were innovators who said that as man was deprived of free-will by the sin of Adam, the will of man at present does nothing in good actions, but is induced to receive them passively from God, without producing them itself; and hence they inferred that the observance of the commandments was impossible to those who are not efficaciously moved and predetermined by grace to avoid evil and to do good. Against this error the Council pronounced sentence in words borrowed from St. Augustine: "God does not command impossible things; but by commanding, admonishes you both to do what you can, and to pray for what you cannot do; and he helps you, so that you may be able."[2780]

The Council, then, in order to prove against the heretics that God's commandments are not impossible to any one, has declared that all men have assistance to enable them to do good, or at least have the grace of prayer whereby to obtain greater assistance. The meaning of this is, that every man can, by means of the common grace, do easy things (such as pray) without need of further extraordinary grace; and can by prayer obtain strength to do difficult things, according to the teaching of St. Augustine, already quoted: "By the very fact that we most firmly believe that the good and just God could not have commanded impossible things, we are admonished in easy matters what to do, and in difficult matters what to pray for."[2781] So that, according to the Council, the divine precepts are possible to all men, at least by means of prayer, by which greater help may be obtained to enable us to observe them. If, therefore, God has imposed his commands on all men, and has rendered their observance possible to all, at least mediately by means of prayer, we must necessarily conclude that all men have the grace to enable them to pray; otherwise, the commandments would not be possible to him who was without this grace. And as God grants to prayer actual grace to do good, and thereby renders all his commandments possible, so also he gives all actual grace to pray; otherwise, if there were any man who had not actual grace to pray to him, the commandments would be impossible, as he could not even by means of prayer obtain the assistance necessary for their observance.

This being settled, it is of no use to say that the words, "God admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for what you cannot do,"[2782] are only to be understood of possible, not of actual, prayer; because, we reply, if the common and ordinary grace gave only possible and not actual prayer, the Council would not have said, "He admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for what you cannot do;"[2783] but, "He admonishes you that you can do, and that you can pray."[2784] Moreover, if the Council had not intended to declare that every one can observe the precepts, or can pray to obtain grace to observe them, and had not meant to speak of actual grace, it would not have said "He admonishes," because this word properly refers to actual operation, and imports not the instruction of the mind, but the movement of the will to do that good which it can actually do. When, therefore, it said, "He admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for what you cannot do," it most clearly expressed, not only possible operation and possible prayer, but actual operation and actual prayer. For if man had need of another extraordinary grace, which as yet he has not, in order actually to work or to pray, how could God admonish him to do or to ask that which he cannot actually either do or ask without efficacious grace? Father Fortunato Brescia speaks wisely on this point: If the actual grace of prayer were not given to all, but if for prayer we had need of efficacious grace, which is not common to all. prayer would be impossible to the great number who are without this efficacious grace; so that it could not be said with propriety that "God admonishes you to ask for that which you cannot do," because he would then admonish us to do a thing requiring a grace which we did not possess. So that God's admonition to work and to pray must be understood of actual operation and prayer, without need of a further extraordinary grace. And this is exactly what St. Augustine means: "Hence we are admonished in easy things what to do, and in difficult things what to pray for;"[2785] because he supposes that though all have not grace to enable them to do difficult things, all have at least grace to pray, prayer being an easy thing for everybody, as he also propounds in the words afterwards adopted by the Council of Trent, "God admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask for what you cannot do."

To recapitulate the argument: the Council says that God does not impose impossible commands, because he either gives assistance to observe them, or gives the grace of prayer to obtain this assistance, which he always grants when it is prayed for. Now, if it could ever be true that God does not give all men grace, at least the mediate grace of prayer, actually to observe all his precepts, Jansenius' proposition would be true, that even the just man is without grace to enable him actually to observe some of the commandments.

I do not know how else the text of the Council of Trent can be understood and explained, unless the "sufficient grace" gave to all men the power of actually praying without the "efficacious grace" which our opponents suppose to be necessary for the actual performance of any pious work. And supposing this necessity of a further grace for actual prayer, I cannot understand how this other text of the same Council can be true: "God does not leave those who have been once justified without grace, unless they first leave him."[2786] If, I say, the ordinary sufficient grace would not be enough for actual prayer, but if for this purpose efficacious grace, which is not common to all men, would be required, it would be true that when the just man would be tempted to commit his first mortal sin, and God would not give him efficacious grace at least to enable him to pray, and so to obtain strength to resist, then his succumbing to temptation might rather be said to result from the just man being abandoned by God before he had abandoned God, and from being left without the efficacious grace necessary to enable him to resist.

Our opponents object to us a passage of St. Augustine where he appears to maintain that the grace of prayer is not granted to all men: "Is not our prayer itself at times so tepid, or rather so cold, and almost null—so null, indeed, that we do not notice its nullity with any sorrow; for if this coldness is against our will, it does not prejudice our prayer?"[2787] But Cardinal Sfondrati well replies, "It is one thing to say that sinners do not pray, another to say that they have not grace to enable them to pray."[2788] St. Augustine does not say that any persons are without grace to pray as they ought, but only that at times our prayer is so cold as to be almost null, not for want of God's assistance to enable us to pray better, but simply through our fault, which renders our prayer null. Tourneley answers in the same way, where he says of the first condemned proposition of Jansenius: "The just do not always pray as they ought. It is their own fault that they do not pray so, since they have by grace sufficient strength to pray. St. Augustine says that our prayer is sometimes cold and almost null; but he does not say that we have not grace to enable us to pray more fervently."[2789] Moreover, Cardinal Noris observes on this same passage, that by means of tepid prayer we can at least obtain grace to pray more fervently, and then by this we obtain efficacious grace to keep the commandments: "I conclude that even tepid prayer is made with the assistance sine quo non, and by the ordinary help of God, since they are weak acts, etc. . . . And yet by tepid prayer we obtain the spirit of more fervent prayer, which is given to us by the assistance quo."[2790] And he confirms this by the authority of St. Augustine, who writes thus on Ps. xvi.: "I have directed my prayers unto Thee with a free and strong intention; for Thou didst hear me when I prayed more weakly, and didst grant me strength for this."[2791]

Nor can a valid objection be drawn from St. Augustine's observation on the text of St. Paul: "The Spirit beseeches for us with groans not to be uttered,"[2792] that it is the Holy Spirit that makes us intercede, and inspires us with the disposition to intercede,[2793] since the saint here simply says, against the Pelagians, that no one can pray without grace. And thus he himself explains it in his commentary on Ps. lii., where he says, "What thou doest by His gift, He is said to do; because without Him thou couldst not do it."[2794]

3. THE HOLY FATHERS

In the third place, our opinion is proved by the sayings of the holy Fathers.

St. Basil says: "When, however, any one is allowed to fall into temptation, it happens that he may be able to endure it, and to ask in prayer that the will of God may be done."[2795] The saint then says that when God permits a man to be tempted, he does it in order that the man may resist by asking for God's will, i.e., the grace to overcome. He therefore supposes that when a man has not sufficient assistance to overcome the temptation, he at least has the actual and common grace of prayer, by which he may obtain whatever further grace he needs.

St. John Chrysostom says, "He gave a law which might make their wounds manifest, in order that they might desire a physician."[2796] And again: "Nor can any one be excused who, by ceasing to pray, has voluntarily abstained from overcoming his adversary.[2797] If such a man had not the grace necessary for actual prayer, whereby he might obtain grace to resist, he might excuse himself when he is overcome.

So also St. Bernard: "Who are we, or what is our strength? This is what God wanted, that we, seeing our weakness, and that we have no other help, should, with all humility, have recourse to his mercy."[2798] God, then, has imposed on us a law impossible to our own strength, in order that we should go to him, and by prayer obtain strength to observe it; but if any one were without the grace of actual prayer, to him the law would be utterly impossible. "Many persons," says the same St. Bernard, "complain that they are deserted by grace; but grace could much more justly complain of being deserted by them."[2799] God has much more reason to complain of us for not corresponding to the grace he gives us, than we have to complain of not having grace to which we may correspond.

But no Father is more clear on this point than St. Augustine in several places. In one he says: "The Pelagians think themselves very knowing when they say, God would not command that which he knows man could not do. Who is ignorant of this? But God does command some things that we cannot do, in order that we might know that for which we ought to ask him."[2800]

Again, "It is not reckoned your fault, if you are ignorant without wishing to be so; but only if you neglect to inquire into that of which you are ignorant; nor that you do not cure your wounded members, but that you despise him who is willing to heal you. These are your own sins; for no man is deprived of the knowledge of how to seek with advantage."[2801] So that, according to St. Augustine, no one is deprived of the grace of prayer, whereby he may obtain help for his conversion; otherwise, if this grace were wanting, it could not be his fault if he were not converted.

Again: "What else, then, is shown us, but that it is God who gives us power both to ask, and to seek, and to knock, who commands us to do these things?"[2802]

Again: "Once for all, receive this and understand it. Art thou not yet drawn? Pray that thou mayest be drawn."[2803]

Again: "That the soul, then, knows not what it ought to do comes from this, that it has not yet received it; but it will receive this also, if it has made a good use of what it has received; and it has received power to seek piously and diligently if it will."[2804]

Mark the words "it has received power to seek diligently and piously." Every one, then, has the grace necessary for prayer; and if he makes a good use of this, he will receive grace to do that which before he was unable to do immediately. Again: "Let the man who is willing, but cannot do what he wills, pray that he may have such a measure as suffices for fulfilling the commandments; for he is so far assisted as to be able to do what is commanded."[2805] Again: "Free will is admonished by command to seek the gift of God; but it would be admonished without fruit to itself, unless it had first received some little love, to induce it to seek such aid as would enable it to fulfil what was commanded."[2806]

Mark the words, "some little love;" this means "sufficient grace" whereby man is able to obtain by prayer actual grace to keep the commandments, whereby "he is induced to seek such aid as would enable him to fulfil what was commanded."[2807]

Again: "He gives us commandments for this reason, that when we have tried to do what we are commanded, and are wearied through our infirmity, we may know how to ask the help of grace."[2808] Here the saint supposes that with ordinary grace we are not able to do difficult things, but can by means of prayer obtain the aid necessary to accomplish them. Hence he goes on to say, The Law entered that sin might abound, when men do not implore the aid of God's grace; but when, by God's vocation, they understand to whom they must groan, and thereupon invoke him, the succeeding words will be fulfilled: Where sin abounded, grace superabounded.[2809] Here, as Petavius says, we see in express terms the want of abundant grace; and, on the other hand, the presence of ordinary and common grace which enables men to pray, and which St. Augustine here calls "God's vocation."

In another place he says: "Free-will is left to man in this mortal life, not to enable him to fulfil justice when he pleases, but to enable him to turn with pious supplications to Him by whose gift he can fulfil it."[2810] When, therefore, Augustine says that man is unable to fulfil the whole law, and that prayer is the only means given him to obtain help to fulfil it, he certainly supposes that God gives every man the grace of actual prayer, without need of a further extraordinary aid, not common to all men; otherwise, where this special aid was wanting, "nothing would be left to the will" to observe all the commandments, or at least the more difficult of them. And when the saint speaks thus, he certainly cannot mean that "sufficient grace" gives only the power, not the act of prayer; for so far as relates to power, it is certain that "sufficient grace" gives power for even the most difficult works. Hence the holy Father evidently means (as he teaches elsewhere) that easy things, such as prayer, may well be actually accomplished by any man with the "sufficient grace;" and difficult things with the help which is obtained by means of prayer.

But there are two texts of St. Augustine which are peculiarly to the point.

The first is this: "It is certain that we can keep the commandments if we will; but since the will is prepared by God, we must ask him that we may have such a will as is sufficient to enable us to perform what we will."[2811] Here he says that it is certain we could observe the law if we would; on the other hand, he says that in order to will to do so, and actually to do so, we must pray. Therefore all men have grace given them to pray, and by prayer to obtain the abundant grace which makes us keep the commandments; otherwise, if for actual prayer, efficacious grace, which is not common to all, were requisite, those to whom it was not given would not be able to keep the commandments, nor to have the will to keep them.

The second text is that where the holy Doctor answers the monks of Adramyttium, who said that "if grace was necessary, and if we can do nothing without it, why blame when we cannot work, and have not grace to do so? You should rather pray God for us, that he would give us this grace." St. Augustine answers: You must be blamed, not because you do not work when you have not strength, but because you do not pray to obtain strength: "He who will not be admonished, and says, Do you rather pray for me, must on that very account be admonished to do it (i.e., to pray) for himself."[2812] Now if the saint had not believed that every man has grace, to pray (if he will) without need of further aid, he never could have said that these people were to be blamed for not praying; for they could have answered, that if they were not to be blamed for not working, when they had not special grace to enable them to work, in like manner they could not be blamed for not praying, when they had not special grace for actual prayer. This is what St. Augustine elsewhere says: "Let them not deceive themselves who say, why are we commanded to abstain from evil and do good, if it is God who works in us both to will and to do it?"[2813] And he answers, that when men do good they should thank God for it, who gives them strength to do it; and when they do it not, they should pray to have the strength which they lack: "But when they do it not (these are his words), let them pray that they may receive that which as yet they have not."[2814] Now, if these people had not even the grace for the act of prayer, they might answer, "Why are we commanded to pray, if God does not work in us to make us pray?"[2815] How are we to will to pray, if we do not receive the grace necessary for actual prayer?

St. Thomas does not speak expressly of prayer, but assumes the certainty of our proposition, when he says, "It belongs to God's Providence to provide every individual with what is necessary for salvation, provided he puts no impediment in the way."[2816] Since, then, it is true, on the one hand, that God gives to all men the graces necessary for salvation, and, on the other, for prayer,—we require the grace which enables us actually to pray, and thereby to obtain further and greater assistance to enable us to do that which we cannot compass with ordinary grace,—it follows, necessarily, that God gives all men sufficient grace actually to pray if they will, without need of efficacious grace.

Here we may add the answer of Bellarmine to the heretics, who inferred from the text, No one can come to Me, unless My Father draw him,[2817] that no one could go to God who was not properly drawn by him. "We answer," he says, "that the only conclusion from this text is, that all men have not the efficacious grace to make them really believe; but we cannot conclude that all men have not at least assistance which confers the possibility of believing, or, at any rate, the possibility of asking for grace."[2818]

III

REASONS THAT JUSTIFY THIS DOCTRINE

Let us now proceed, in the third and last place, to examine the reasons of this opinion. Petavius, Duval, and other theologians ask why God imposes on us commands which we cannot keep with the common and ordinary grace? Because, they answer, he wishes us to have recourse to him in prayer, according to the general consent of the Fathers, as we have seen above. Hence they infer that we ought to hold it to be certain that every man has grace actually to pray, and by prayer to obtain greater grace to enable him to do that which is impossible to him with the ordinary grace; otherwise God would have imposed an impossible law.

This reason is very strong; another is, that if God imposes on all men the duty of actual observance of his commandments, we must necessarily suppose that he also gives to all men the grace necessary for this actual observance, at least mediately, by means of prayer. In order, therefore, to uphold the reasonableness of the law, and the justice of the punishment of the disobedient, we must hold that every man has sufficient power, at least mediately, by means of prayer, for the actual satisfaction of the law; and that at times he prays without need of an unusual and additional grace; otherwise, if he had not this mediate or remote power of actually keeping the commandments, it could never be said that all men had from God sufficient grace for the actual observance of the law.
